"The Elements of Shooting," by Mr. Eric Parker, Editor of "The Field," is a handsome and informing colour-book, covering much ground. The author's advice to the aspiring sportsman opens with hints as to the right sort of weapon, kit and gear, on learning to shoot, "nerves," and so forth. Then follow lucid chapters treating of the chase of every description of British game—the patridge, pheasant, grouse, snipe, woodcock, mallard, ptarmigan, pigeon, hare, rabbit, etc. Even the humble sport of ferreting is not omitted. Picturesque, as well as practical, and never for a moment tiresome, Mr. Parker is in these pages a guide to the young beginner—"as a man might talk to a boy when taking him out shooting." The excellent colour illustrations of birds and eggs are the author's own work, as also, presumably, the interpretative diagrams

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has written a letter of recommendation for a volume entitled "Scout Pie," which Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Ld., are publishing. It has been edited by Mr. Ernest Young on behalf of the Boy Scouts Association, for the benefit of whose funds the work is being issued. It will form a handsome presentation volume, and every copy sold swells the funds of that deserving movement, the Boy Scouts Association.

In "The Marriage Craft," by D. H. S. Nicholson (R. Cobden-Sanderson) we are given the description of an interesting experiment. A small company of friends embark on a barge at Rickmansworth, and, as they travel along the peaceful waters of the Grand Junction Canal, explore the facts and possibilities of marriage—and its alternatives. As they represent widely divergent types of both sexes, their points of view are continually in conflict, so that few possible attitudes are left unexpressed by the journey's end. Both the usual and the unusual are given a fair hearing, with a result that is of considerable interest to everyone who has experienced, or proposes to experience, the adventure of marriage.

OURSELVES AND THE UNITED STATES

"America To-day and To-morrow." By Sir Charles Wakefield. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.

They are fine ideals, those of the practical idealists on both sides of the Atlantic, the men who are never tired of claiming and of admitting the common Shakespeare and Milton ancestry, and who, politically, get continual inspiration from the Pitts and Fox and Burke. Here, in "America To-day and To-morrow: A Tribute of Friendship," Sir Charles Cheers Wakefield, Lord Mayor in the dark days of 1915-1916, in a plain, straightforward, and yet oftentimes strangely moving manner, exemplifies them well. Sir Charles, with so many of us, looks to seeing Woodrow Wilson's glorious failure gain its eventual victory. And as a beginning he has worked, and is working, for a better mutual understanding throughout the world among the English-speaking peoples. He had the happiness in 1917, on behalf of the Shakespeare Association, of presenting a fine First Folio to Dr. Walter H. Page, great Ambassador and great friend of England. And for the Sulgrave Institution, of which Dr. Page was first chairman of the board of governors—named after, and the guardian of Washington's old home in Northamptonshire—Sir Charles made in 1922 a memorable pilgrimage, of which the experiences are recounted in this book, to the United States. His party was a very happy one. It comprised Lady and Miss Wakefield, Sir Arthur and Lady Haworth, of Manchester, Mr. H. S. Perris, Mr. Harold Spender, Sir William Letts, and on the other side was joined by the Hon. McCallum Grant (Governor of Nova Scotia) and Mrs. Grant, and by representatives of Australia and Canada, and enthusiasts of the American Sulgrave brotherhood. They took offerings of friendship in the form of busts of the elder Pitt and of Lord Bryce, and a statue of Edmund Burke. It is a strange and hopeful world when we can have these displayed in positions of honour in Washington and New York and Pittsburgh, and statues of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln at Westminster.

The missionaries—the famous journalist, the men of business, the publicist, the eloquent Governor of Nova Scotia—made many speeches. The ladies, too, exercised their gracious influence. And everywhere they received the usual American thoughtful and beautiful hospitality. In Kentucky they met our beloved Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, and were introduced to mint-julep, that drink—it is Mr. Harold Spender's description—"that most entrancing of nectars, crystal clear in goblets of silver shimmering with frost." Atlanta gave them good opportunities; and then they dared what no other Sulgrave deputation had ever dared before—they attacked the Middle West. Sir Charles does not wish to beguile us with false music, or to make us believe that that region, with its mixed origins, its intense preoccupation in local and State problems, its isolation from world polities, is ready to fall upon the neck of the Anglo-Saxon. It is not. Its active friendship is yet to be won, but it can be won. Despite gloomy warnings, it was, says Sir Charles, "obviously wise to make the plunge. We were quite prepared to be pioneers. But, happily, we carried the day all along the line. Nowhere were we more heartily welcomed, and as the Middle West appears to be the great forcing-house of American politics, it was extremley encouraging that our ideas should find so much sympathy where so little had been indicated."

It is, of course, heartening to read of the unveilings at New York and Washington and Pittsburgh, with the surrounding enthusiasm and the cordial speeches of tried friends. It is still more significant to read of the party's welcome at the University of Kansas, where the students' journal announced," "Wakefield's geniality pleases;" or at Lincoln, Nebraska, where the hope was expressed that "your visit may do much to forward the formation of an altruistic entente among thinking men of both countries, that the impelling thought will be the just and peaceful advancement of the English speaking peoples, and of all people." It was a long pilgrimage. If it had its fatigues, it certainly had its compensating gratifications to Sir Charles and his friends—gratifications which will undoubtedly be shared by the reader.—"Daily Telegraph."

MR. FISHER ON NAPOLEON

"Napoleon." By the Right Hon. H. A. L. Fisher. Williams and Norgate. 7s. 6d.

The re-issue of this excellent volume at seven and a-half times its original price may be a pleasing or a sinister event. Perhaps it means that culture is spreading from the shilling public to the wealthier classes. Perhaps it means that the new rich want to read. But perhaps it means that the general body of readers must be charged at least the price of a dog licence before they are convinced that a book is good. Certain it is that readers have an odd way of loving their authors.

In the very Home University series that contained Mr. Fisher's original primer, there appeared a very delightful book about French literature by Mr. G. L. Strachey. Nobody made a fuss about it. Then the author had an inspiration. He remembered that he had a name, and in his next volume called himself Lytton Strachey. As Mr. Birrell remarked, it is difficult not to believe in a man called Viollet-le-Duc. So it was impossible to believe that a book by Mr. Lytton Strachey could be other than excellent, and the volume had, therefore, a great vogue.

Thereupon the publishers reissued the little French book at seven-and-six under the now noticeable name, and it was instantly admired. There are several morals to be drawn from the incident, but we leave them to the reader. Mr. Fisher's own book is worth having at any price, for it is perhaps the best account of Napoleon we have produced. Indeed, it is triumph of its kind. Anybody can write a long book; to write a good short book needs unusual talent. You can disguise ignorance in 30 words; but you are found out in three. Mr. Fisher is in full possession of all the material, and has a fine sense of historical proportion. He does not take sides—it would not occur to so clear-sighted a writer that there are sides to be taken; but he writes sympathetically about one of the great figures in the world's mythology, and he writes like an artist and not like an artisan. It would be hard to name a more fascinating volume of its kind.—The "Daily News."

CAN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS HELP?

The Revival of Europe. By H. G. Alexander. (G. Allen and Unwin. 5s. net.)

Since few people in Europe and America give to the League of Nations a tithe of the thought that it deserves, we would draw their attention to this book, whose subtitle is Can the League of Nations Help? The accounts of the League's constitution and methods and the record of its work are satisfactory, and the facts are stated accurately enough. It must be admitted that Mr. Alexander does not approach the subject with an attractive ardour. He seldom praises without some cold criticism, and his expressions of satisfaction with each piece of work done seem to be grudged and only due because worse would have happened but for the League. He gives little credit for obstacles overcome and does not mention the chief difficulty of a League of 50 and more nations, many with no great interest in any one question, namely, the danger of log-rolling. His earnest plea for Germany and her admission are mainly based on the demerits of the Allies, and do not include the one that appeals most to us, that the poacher should have been turned into a gamekeeper as soon as possible. The author's trouble is explained by his chapter on "The International Spirit." He is an internationalist and pacifist without an understanding sympathy with the weaknesses, amiable or otherwise, of those who cannot go so far. He wants us to subordinate patriotism to international good, and we are not all ready for that wider outlook. To urge us to give up Gibraltar, Malta and Cyprus to prove that we are not aggressive in the Mediterranean only shows that he thinks we hold them for aggressive purposes, which is not the whole truth, nor the half of it. Let Mr. Alexander continue to express reasonably the cause of the League as the best hope of the world against self-destruction. The more it is studied and taught, as it is in the greater part of this book, the better. With knowledge support will grow outside the League and will increase that self-confidence within it which is needed for still better work than it has yet done.—The "Spectator."

NEW NOVELS

Love Us All. By A. Nell Lyons. Thornton Butterworth. 7s. 6d.

Though all five of the books that I have to review can quite reasonably be termed works of fiction, only one is concerned with the art of telling a story. Of the rest, one is intelligent journalism, well served up with modern characters and conversation, and quite acute analysis of, and sprightly irritation with, the world we live in. Another is an amusing collection of short sketches of the familiar "types" its author has dealt in before. Another is a lively parody, and none the worse for that. And another is a tract on what is called "the public school question," quite sincere and even sensible in its way, but judged purely as a story a thing of naught.

But one author is a story-teller, and that is something. "When the Bough Breaks" is historical—a collection of four stories all dealing with Rome. "The first story," we are told on the cover, "is about Rome in the far back time, the earliest blossoming of the Bough. The next ones are in the first centuries B.C. and A.D., when the Bough was heavy with leaves and fruit. The last comes at the beginning of the fifth century, at the time of Alaric and the Goths, and in the winter of the Bough-breaking."

All the stories are simply told and they have no moral. They are historical only in the sense that they are about people who lived at a definite time which is far away. They are not concerned with the virtues or vices of the Roman Empire, or of Christianity, or of paganism, or of discipline or liberty or anything else except themselves. Each story is complete in itself. In each there are characters who interest us because they seem to be at once true to the time in which human nature remains unchanged. None of these characters are very complex, nor, on the other hand, are they types. They are simple and often attractive individuals; they are humorous, spiteful, mean, generous, even noble, as men and women are. All these stories move well, they are psychologically reasonable and free from archæology and pedantry of every kind. It is not only that one remembers the animal satisfactoriness of Gersemi, the prim and unpleasant coquettishness of Innocentia, nor even the delightfully humorous character of Onesimus, the Christian whom St. Paul mentions, humble and fussy and immensely explanatory, who blames himself for everything and cannot bring himself to blame others, even when he knows he must. What is still more important is the way these stories work up to definite moments of climax. One such moment in the "Triumph of Faith," where the apparently dead body of a slave is raised by the united and fervent prayers of the disciples of various gods is a really admirable piece of writing. And there are others almost as good. In fact, Mrs. Mitchison is clearly a story-teller, and in a rather lean world there seems good reason to be thankful for her arrival.

Mr. Ford Madox Ford, on the other hand, whom most people know better under the name of Ford Madox Hueffer, seems to have been given all the gifts of the literary gods but this (and that of proof correcting). He is very intelligent, very competent, very observant of amusing details in character. He can write 10 or 20 pages as if they belonged to a first rate story; his tools are excellent. Unfortunately his story is quite uninteresting for some reason or other, and one knows that here is another bright book written to be forgotten, another novel about "Africa" written because its author has something to say about that country rather than a story to tell. "Africa" in this case is England just before and during the War. On this Mr. Ford has a good deal to say that is interesting. If when one reads a novel one wants a mirror of the fairly intelligent side of the times in which we live, here it is. Mr. Ford seems to me to do it much better than Mr. Wells. Both may be journalists, but Mr. Ford's journalism seems to be not only more acute in its comments but also considerably more observant of the details in the world which he is reporting. His characters are less like caricatures, nor are they, at any rate so obviously, mere projections of himself. Indeed, the main character in this book, that of a gentleman, is a really sympathetic study, and one it would have been pleasant to meet among other people as real as himself.

And if "Some Do Not" is journalism, it is not unfair to call "Lifting Mist" a tract. Its author's reason for writing it is so clearly not even the journalist's desire to describe, but the moralist's desire to teach. Mr. Harrison, like many other people, has felt impelled to tell "the truth" about the Public Schools—like many others, he has also considered that the best medium for this purpose was the novel. Why he should have thought the latter or desired the former is hard to say. Enough that people are continually longing to expose the secrets that are shared by all the world, and that Mr. Harrison is one of them. As for the story which results, it is a poor thing. And even the promise on the cover that "certain aspects of school life are dealt with fully and candidly" is very far from kept. But that is what always happens on these occasions. Mr. Harrison's views are often sensible, and if he had written them in reasonable form for the "Hibbert Journal" they might have been worth reading.

Of the last two books, "Love Us All" is a series of sketches quite up to Mr. Neil Lyons' ordinary competent standard. "Gentleman into Goose" is a really good joke, a successful parody on a first-rate book. And that, after all, is rather a rare thing. Actually I think the parody of the story is rather better than the parody of the style—the "forsooths," "withals," and "albeits" and so on being rather clumsy. Yet even in that there are good moments, as that of the metamorphosis:—

> Where her husband had been a moment before was a great gray gander, with a tobacco pipe in his beak, looking at her fiercely with angry eyes and hissing with great violence.

Or when Mrs. Teapot considers the amount of money her husband used to waste on clothes:—

> But now, look at him, thinks she, in his little chequered breeches, with no thought but that he is the fine little gentleman, as well dressed and fine as any. And when these wear out, thinks she, there is more of the old petticoat and no new breeches to be made of it until I please, no, indeed, let him hiss for new breeches as he may.

Even there the repeated "thinks shes" are a clumsiness. Still, the book is a really good joke, and the illustrations are as amusing as the letterpress.—"The New Statesman."

Messrs. Alexander Moring Ld., (the De la More Press) are publishing a new edition of "Siam," by W. A. Graham. Since the first edition was published 11 years ago great changes have taken place in Siam, and her rapid and successful advance in foreign politics and commerce has necessitated the expansion of the work to two volumes. Many new illustrations have been added, and the book thoroughly revised and brought up to date.

...HAT MEN WANT IN WOMEN'S WARDROBES

"Well, just how?" persisted Crockett.

"Why, something in a simple dotted Swiss, or a Scotch gingham for mornings. My mother always managed to look nice without collecting a crowd to stare at her. O, one of those pretty little things that don't cost much but look as if they were worth a million. Short enough to walk in but long enough to be modest. Inexpensive yet unusual. Cool, but not so cobweb-like. Up to the moment in style but mostly assembled from last years clothes. Something you wouldn't forget, but nothing to create talk. O it's easy enough. Now if I only took one-tenth the time women do in thinking about their clothes I could design a wardrobe for them."

"Better design us another drink old man," said Crockett, "you sound as if you needed it."

BANK HOLIDAYS

How to be Happy Though Working

By Elizabeth Pepys.

By the ... bank holidays. Bigger and Better Business ... Blissful and Better ... and how better can they be secured than by a few holidays judiciously inserted in the ...idst of the desert of financial worries? We feel that bank holidays are a step towards the millennium, when working days will come about once a week.

Our only objection to the holiday ...that there is not enough leisure ...go round. The banks, to be sure, ...closed. Most business houses ...low their alluring lead, and we ...that they are literally and ...ically closed, and not, as one ...ness house was unkind enough ...put it in outlining the duties of ...new stenographer: "officially we ...closed at five o'clock." We ...not understand that attitude to...ard life, and frankly, we deplore ...The highest function of an ef...iency expert, as we understand ...would be to figure out how the ...k of the world might be done ...d yet no holidays omitted. Trains ...st carry pleasure-seekers; boats ...ust always arrange schedules to ...t everybody's convenience; but ...the holiday were only regarded ...the essential matter, some system ...extra shifts could be devised ...ich would not work too great a ...dship. We wish, for example ...that the public was not so avid for ...ers on holidays. We know one ...ung man, a highly estimable per...n, who is leaving for a vacation ...n, who pledges himself not to look at ...paper during the whole of his ...ce. May his tribe increase! ...second and prudenter thought ...we cannot have this independ...ce of papers become so general as to lose us our jobs—let this indifference to news be extended to some suitable holidays in summer and autumn as it now covers Christmas and Easter.

Unkind Distinctions.

Just at present social affairs about Shanghai are sadly perplexing because the observance of the summer holidays is not universal. We know of one host and hostess who invited a party for a week-end houseboat trip, counting on a Saturday-Sunday affair, but finding their guests were all confidently counting on the Monday holiday, were hard put to it to stretch the larder's supplies over the other day. And on the other hand there is always the sorrow of parting with the junior clerks, who have been the life of the party, because they have to get back to carry on an unfeeling taipan's business for him.

Minor social annoyances develop when you explain to your favourite Auction player that you didn't ask her over to your bridge tea yesterday because you thought that she and her husband would be out on the golf links, and then hear that she moped at home while Jack was in the office, or vice-versa. Standardization would be a great help along this line, and if there are wretches so unfeeling as to gloat over the sorrow of those who must toil while they make merry, then it is about time for a bit of a revolt. Let's make this question of holidays unanimous!

GUIDE-POSTS OF FASHION

This Way to Chic Town

By Elizabeth Pepys.

It would be rather nice, if after one has painfully or gladly, grudgingly or gaily assembled one's clothes for the summer accordingly to the concensus of opinion gleaned from the fashion books combined with visits to Mademoiselle Modiste, the mode would consider itself fixed for the summer. A sleeping beauty fashion edict would be tremendously appreciated by those whose wardrobes are practically fixed when the last trunk is snapped to and one's back is turned on the shops and one's face to the open.

But—Fashion is not like that. Either it sleeps with one eye open or else it is hydra headed with every separate eye keen to note the effect of its prophecies and pronouncements, to favour one style above another, to relegate some frocks to the hindmost hooks in the wardrobe and to bring others out for the Casino and Hotel. Little changes, imperceptible in themselves, but mightily important in the aggregate, creep in, so that although a girl may bring back the same clothes in her trunks, her attitude toward them will be entirely changed over the summer.

For Instance.

Some of the little straws show that the winds of fancy blow favourably upon light shades for the evening, green, white, pale flesh, and a pinkish mauve which is predicted as the ultimate winner. If you wear black it should be lace, or embroidered in beads. Ostrich, popular everywhere, is being especially affected for collars on evening wraps and scarves, though chiffon is still used for the latter. Paris has plumped for dark blue for general wear this summer, but many prefer black or light beige, while an entire grey costume is in good taste.

New Cravats.

Ladies with necks which look well enveloped in the smart new cravats have been clever enough to select resorts where they may be worn, and so they will be the first to appear in the irresistible neckwear. Others are courting the days on the calendar before the muffled neck will not be a patent absurdity. It would be difficult for a Shanghai person with some of these clever ties in her possession to possess her soul in patience. Those who have such accessories (cravats, my dears, not souls) are no doubt praying for typhoons and cool days.

One of the new fancies is quite possible for hot days, since it may be worn spreading over the shoulders and down on either side the V-necked blouse like a careless sailor collar. Then the moment a chilly breeze arises it is knotted around the neck and tied in an airplane bow, as those dashing, big ends are called. Riding-stocks of linen or silk are worn with lingerie blouses and tailored suits, and crepe collars button up high under the chin, with a jabot-like frill, or some high cravats with fringed ends meet the same needs. A long crepe tie or almost scarf may be tied loosely round the neck to trim a simple silk gown, and tied low in a splashing tie, or pulled once round the throat and then tied low. As we say "Good-bye, Summer," we shall have a welcoming eye out for the scarf.

INTENTION

Opalescent in the sunlight,
A soap bubble floated
Through the crystal air
And broke
Into nothing.
Like a good intention.

—Grace M. Pugh.

NOTE THE LARGE AND SMALL OF IT AND THE STANDING RUFF.

Summer suns have brought out shady hats and wider brims have given greater scope in trimming, the air-plane bow being especially smart, and the brims themselves being slashed at will or moulded into unusual designs. The small hat is departing widely from the spirit of the cloche and the Caroline Reboux version of the Directoire shape—high and narrow in the crown and small in the brim—is frequently seen.

SHANGHAI MOTHER GOOSE

The Good Old Summer Time

The South Wind doth blow,
Thank goodness it's so,
Without it what should we do then,
poor thing?
We'll fly to the Roofs
Cooled for our behoofs
Or fight for seats neath the fan's wings, hot things.

Income Increasers.

See saw, Margery Daw
Peking proposes a surtax.
It shall have but a penny from me
Because its accounting is so lax.
But stay, here's a way
I'd like to manipulate a tax.
Upon icecream and cooling drinks
I'd pile up money like haystacks.
We'd ban every fan
Unless it had paid us full duty.
Cool swims, too, thin clothes as well.
Isn't that idea a beauty?

—By Elizabeth Pepys.

HAPPY SUMMER MORNING

The sun is smiling in the sky
On rosy clouds that pass,
He tells the trees a joke that makes
Gold dimples on the grass.

The flowers are glad to be awake,
The birds are very gay.
Even the gardner croons a song,
It's such a laughing day.

Daddy and Mummy are so queer.
They don't like this hot weather;
But O, we have the best of times,
Trees, sun and I together.

—Elizabeth Pepys.

Peach Water.

Slice 1½ lb. ripe peaches, and put them into a basin with their bruised kernels. Pour over them 3 pints boiling water, add sugar to taste, cover the basin; when cold, strain through a fine cloth and stand on the ice to get quite cold before serving. If liked, a little peach brandy, noyeau, or ratafia may be added.

Oxford Cup.

Toast 3 slices of bread, and put them into a jug with the strained juice of 2 lemons. Rub 1 oz. sugar on to the rind of a lemon, pound it, and put into the jug, add the thinly pured rind of another lemon, 1 pint of sherry, 1½ pints good ale, and grated nutmeg to taste, and if liked a little more sugar, let it all stand for 1½ hours, then strain and serve.

LOOKING BACK

Need We Grumble?

We women of to-day who complain of high prices and so on may cheer ourselves up (or the reverse!) by recalling what our ancestresses in the latter part of the 18th century had to endure. The year 1783 was one of great dearth in Scotland. War taxation was very heavy, and the time resembled the autumn of 1923, there being a desperately bad harvest, so much so that the whole country was threatened with famine.

Meat at 3d per lb.

Lady Mackenzie wrote to a friend —"There is nothing so scarce and ill to be got as oat-meal and flour, and what we get is bad, the size of a loaf of bread so small it is of no service in a family. The cries of the poor are lamentable; they are most distressful to feeling hearts."

Yet meat remained most reasonable at 3d. per lb., when meal was a guinea a "boll" (140lb.).

But the Scottish labouring classes at that time ate very little meat. They lived mostly on oatmeal and salt fish.

A Plaint from Inverness

It was in the towns that the pinch was felt most severely, they being dependent on the farmers for their daily bread.

"There is no meal coming to market," writes one lady from Inverness, "not to be got for any money; such as have any for sale are keeping it, in hopes of getting a higher price at Lammas." Coals were 2s. 3d. a "barrel" (a cwt.), and "Well it is (she writes to a friend) with those in the country who can get good peats."

No Tea in Cromarty

Cromarty was in a hopeless plight; Lady Mackenzie in one of her letters declares—"There is not a pound of tea in the town, and the best flour to be had is last year's, and all very musty; there are no apples or onions, but we procured a few from Edinboro'."

Servants' Wages

In the matter of servants these ladies were more fortunate than their descendants; in those hard years service was cheap and plentiful. "My wife had a line last night,' writes a gentleman, "from Mr. Macleod anent a maidservant. He found her faithful, honest, and obedient, and for wages she had last year equal to 20s. She is but young, but has had charge of the family in the absence of his wife."

A capable housekeeper, who could oversee the making of wine, pickles, etc., and also superintend all household affairs, required £4 a year. A young girl in whom Lady Mackenzie had a direct interest was to be employed in minding the bedrooms and ironing gentlemen's shirts and ladies' fine linens. The "boy" "minded" the table, and went all the errands so "Sallie" would have no outdoor work.

It is remarkable in this old Highland correspondence how seldom letters or diaries refer to the children! The lads and lassies who were the forebears of this present generation lived a retired life in their nurseries and schoolrooms, and were never heard of unless they were ill. Then there was no lack of sympathy or offers of help.

Lady Mackenzie's "two poor lassies were sadly distressed by coughs," but we hear nothing fur- of them except when they were inoculated for smallpox.

Miss Peggy Mackenzie, we are told, "reads, writes, and plays the fiddle every day, but has no spinet, but her father is corresponding for one for her." Of their early sayings and doings, when they began to walk or talk, and of the fashion of their frocks—all the details so loved by mothers to-day—we hear nothing.

The Little Violinist

A child is described as "promising" or "tall of his age," or he may be "interesting," words that fail to convey any definite impression of the boy or girl.

We do not even know if there were governesses or tutors in the lairds' houses, though surely little Miss Peggy Mackenzie must have had some one to teach her how to play the fiddle and her other small accomplishments.

Some of the boys were sent to school early:—

"Our dear little cousins Hugh and George are settled attending school in Edinburgh, and have a fine boy to attend them."—Winifred Cheslyn.

BREACH OF FAITH IN SETTLEMENT OF CANTON CONFLICT

Strikers Led to Believe Police Would Be Reinstated in Defiance of Clearest Understanding to the Contrary: Agitators Still Barring Gates of Shameen

Peking, Aug. 8.

An official telegram from Canton says that it is believed that a settlement of the Shameen strike is within sight. Dr. Sun Yat-sen and the Concession authorities are exchanging views.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Canton, Aug. 8.

Yesterday, an understanding was formally effected between Dr. Sun Yat-sen and the British and French Consuls-General here regarding the settlement of the strike at Shameen. Eastern News Agency.

Hongkong, Aug. 13.

The British Consul-General announced at the Canton Club yesterday evening that the strike had been settled and that the servants would be returning to their employers to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Shameen, Aug. 13.

The strike has been officially settled and the workers will return immediately.

The Shameen Municipal Councils will accept the resignations of the police and grant each a gratuity. They will re-employ such as the Councils may select; the rest will be incorporated in the police force of the city of Canton.

The above terms relating to the police were not published before the settlement of the strike, but were covered in a gentlemen's agreement between the Canton authorities and the French and British Consuls-General.

An apparent misconception by the police and the Chinese community in general as to reinstatement, and the continued intimidation by pickets argue misrepresentation in certain quarters. The councils have taken measures to rectify the misconception and to make the situation clear.

Other terms, liable to withdrawal if the employees do not return on August 14, are as follow:—

The Councils will encourage the re-instatement of private employees and also the payment of wages for the period of the strike, namely for four weeks.

Shameen reverts to the old pass regulations with certain amendments, including passes with photographs, to be enforced on equal terms for all nationalities.

The reinstatement of the police has never been contemplated. The new police have already arrived for the British concession. They are Hakkas (an aboriginal tribe of the province of Kuangtung), who speak Cantonese.—Reuter.

Hongkong, Aug. 14.

The terms of the strike settlemen have not been disclosed here. The British Consul-General at Canton has communicated the terms to the Covernor of Hongkong and the British Minister in Peking, before their publication.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Statement by the Consuls.

Later.

A statement has been issued by the Consuls-General for Great Britain and France in Shameen which contains the terms of the settlement of the strike. They are as follow:

(1) The two Municipal Councils agree that the new police permit regulations shall not be brought into force, thus automatically reverting to the old pass regulations hitherto in force with certain amendments which shall be enforced simultaneously and on equal terms for all nationalities alike;

(2) The Councils agree, in the special circumstances under which they left their work, to encourage the reinstatement of private employees and also the payment of their wages for the period of the strike;

(3) Public employees shall be reinstated and their wages paid for the period of the strike: reservation is made in the case of the police on the question of disciplinary measures, which will be finally dealt with according to the discretion of the Councils;

(4) No reprisals shall be made on either side.

Police Not Reinstated.

In their statement, the Consuls-General state that after protracted attempts to find a formula which should offer a lasting and amicable settlement just to both sides; the above terms of settlement were arrived at. Those relating to the reinstatement of employees are covered by an explanatory statement in the form of a "Gentlemen's Agreement" as between the Cantor authorities and the two Consuls-General.

The terms of this "Gentlemen's Agreement" clearly laid down the non-reinstatement of the police and the measures to be taken.

On August 12, after numerous notes pronouncing in the aggregate the terms to be fair and just, Mr. Luk King-fo of the Provincial Bureau of Foreign Affairs called on the British Consul-General, Mr. Giles, and informed him that he had been sent to announce that the terms had been accepted and the men could be expected to return on August 3. The strike was therefore settled and official notification would follow in the morning

All the parties of the Chinese authorities had been informed that these terms could bear no altering or equivocation. Mr. Luk's message was conveyed to the foreign residents of Shameen and Mr. Giles told Mr. Luk that no equivocation would be tolerated.

Pickets Still Terrorizing.

On the morning of August 13 it was found that the pickets were still at the gates and workers seeking to return in good faith were prevented from so doing. During the day it became abundantly clear from evidences from many sources that the strikers had been deliberately led to believe that the reinstatement of the police had been conceded by Shameen. This point had never been and could not be conceded. It had been made clear that the police had placed themselves in a position where they could not be accepted in their old places.

The non-withdrawal of the pickets argues, according to the statement, a gross breach of faith on the part of someone in the chain of strike negotiations. The presence of pickets at a time when the strike had been declared officially to have been actually settled becomes either an act of simple lawlessness to be dealt with by the City police or a subject of grave import according to the section from which the fact emanates.

Later.

It is rumoured that there had been a resumption of the strike in Shameen over difficulty with the French police. Picketing at the gates is reported to have been redoubled.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A CHEKIANG-FUKIEN WAR SCARE

TROOPS CONCENTRATING ON THE BORDER

Categorical reports of war impending between Chêkiang and Fukien reach us, with Marshal Wu Pei-fu said to be the chief instigator.

It will be remembered that last year there was great alarm over the possibility of war between Kiangsu and Chêkiang. Force of public opinion compelled the two Tuchuns involved, Chi Hsih-yuan of Nanking and Lu Yung-hsiang of Hangchow, to sign an agreement of peace. At that time Wu Pei-fu had his hands full in Szechuan and could take no active part in the quarrel, although he is an antagonist of Lu Yung-hsiang's.

Not long ago two generals in Fukien, opponents of Wu Pei-fu's, Tsang Chi-ping and Yang Hua-chao by name, were defeated and took refuge in southern Chêkiang. General Tsang is said to have 1.5 troops and General Yang 4,000.

Wu Pei-fu, we are told, called upon Lu Yung-hsiang, of Chêkiang, to turn them out and, on his refusing to do so, ordered his lieutenant in Fukien, General Hsun Chuan-fang, to invade Chêkiang. We are told that General Hsun is now concentrating troops at three points on the Chêkiang border, Pucheng, Sungan and Yenping.

It is said that Chih Hsih-yuan of Nanking is not concerned in this general, but that by way of precaution he has begun to move his big guns from Pengpu in Anhui, where they are in a dangerous position to Nanking.

The concluding part of the report is that, if necessary, Wu Pei-fu himself might come to the attack on Chêkiang and that he would be accompanied by General Feng Yu-hsiang, the well known Christian general, who is said to have a fancy for the Tuchunship of Chêkiang.

Immediate Outbreak of Hostilities Not Expected: Northern Warriors Cautious

Gen. Sun (says this newspaper) has reinforced his troops at all points in northern Fukien; but no immediate outbreak of hostilities is expected. It is a question whether the provinces controlled by the Chihli party are unanimous; and it is also doubtful which side will be disposed to fire the first shot. A report has it that both Loyang and Nanking are not satisfied at Chang Tsz-ping and Yang Hua-chao's troops being admitted into Chêkiang province, and that an exchange by messengers has been going between them. Anhui and Kiangsi are said to show hesitancy, because they are afraid, it is alleged, that Chêkiang may be the first to take the offensive, using its whole strength, when either of them, should they disclose their attitude beforehand, may suffer the brunt of its attack.

A foreigner puts the situation in a nutshell by saying that last year it was a case of A being the moving spirit. B, fearing A's ascendancy, thwarted A's plan. It is B who is the primary mover this year, and as he is certainly going to be thwarted by A, who is jealous of his power. Thus there will be no concerted action and the war cloud in the southeast may soon disappear.

THE TROUBLE OVER RUSSIAN ISSUE OF REORGANIZATION LOAN

Scrip of Which Bonds Had Not Been Issued Owing to War Stolen by Bolsheviks and Sold Abroad: Over 31,000 Bonds Untraced Involving £870,000

Peking, Aug. 6.

The efforts recently being made by holders of the old Chinese Reorganization Loan bonds, Russian issue (yellow bonds), to have their claims for validation of these bonds placed before the Hague International Tribunal has revived interest in a matter that has been a source of worry and trouble ever since the Soviet authorities confiscated and seized the unissued bonds in the head office of the Russo-Asiatic Bank in 1917. The revalidation of the German issue of the same loan bonds, the difficulties that have arisen in the first steps towards carrying out the Sino-German agreement, and the conclusion of the Sino-Russian agreement, lend additional interest to this complicated dispute. In trying to arrive at an understanding of the facts concerning the Russian issue, Reuter's correspondent has obtained the following review and suggestions from reliable and varied sources in Peking:—

Russian Issue Split up

It will be remembered that the 1913 Chinese Reorganization Loan of £25,000,000 was divided into equal parts for issue by the British, French, Japanese, German and Russian banking groups. As the Russian bankers thought it unlikely that Russia would absorb the whole portion allotted to that country, as some of the other groups were ready to issue more than their share, and as some banks in non-participating countries desired to undertake some of the loan, provision was made for the Russian group to farm out some of these bonds abroad. In the case of Belgium the issue was made locally, the scrip and afterwards the bonds being received direct from London. Dutch investors, and some British, French and German investors who were, apparently, unable to secure bonds in their own country, made their applications through the Russo-Asiatic Bank and obtained their scrip from Petrograd.

The scrip, which was to be exchanged for bonds when the latter had been obtained from the printing house in London, consisted mainly of large blocks. The scrip documents were receipts for sums paid in advance for bonds but they were not numbered to correspond with the bonds for which they were to be exchanged. If the precaution had been taken of numbering the scrip and exchanging it for bonds correspondingly numbered, a great amount of confusion might have been avodied. The conditions in Europe in 1913, however, appeared normal, and none foresaw the international complications that followed the outbreak of the Great War.

War Delays Delivery

Owing to the war, delivery of the bonds was delayed long after the expected date, and it was not until June, 1915, that the bonds reached Petrograd. Further delay occurred in getting the bonds sealed by the Chinese Minister to Russia, and the bonds were not ready for delivery to scrip holders in that country until the following August. The scrip holders themselves then seem to have been curiously tardy in exchanging their scrip for bonds, for the exchange went on from August, 1915, to December, 1917, and even then, it is asserted, only about 50 per cent. of the bonds had been given out in exchange for scrip. This apparently only refers to scrip holders in Russia of the Russian for outside holders of Russian scrip had not forwarded their scrip for exchange. Their delay in doing so is attributed to the exigencies of War—principally mail difficulties and objection to pay the heavy insurance on account of war risks.

The Red Revolution

Before the end of 1917, while the bonds were still being exchanged on demand by the Russo-Asiatic Bank, the thunder bolt fell on the bank, in the shape of the second Russian revolution, bringing the Reds into power.

With the advent of the Bolshevik Administration the Russian banks were nationalized, and as a first step banking employees were warned against removing any documents from their banks on penalty of death.

Among other securities in the Russo-Asiatic Bank were the unissued bonds of the Reorganization Loan, which were confiscated by the new régime. The exchange of scrip for bonds was, therefore, abruptly terminated.

It soon became obvious that the Russo-Asiatic Bank was not likely to regain possession of the unissued bonds, and various schemes were put forward with the object of meeting the obligations to holders of the provisional scrip. It was fully recognized that great care would be necessary to provide against double payments, namely, payment on the scrip and on the bonds. Consequently the matter was brought to the attention of the Chinese Minister of Finance, but no definite action was taken for some time.

On August 21, 1919, the Dutch Government took up the question of the rights of Dutch holders of scrip, and the Dutch Minister in Peking asked the Chinese Government to safeguard the interests of Dutch scrip holders.

The French Minister in Peking, on July 4, 1920 made similar representations on behalf of French citizens, requesting the Chinese Government to regularize French holdings and pay interest on scrip in French hands. In July, 1921, the Belgian Minister sent a Note to the Waichiaopu in much the same strain as the French and Dutch communications.

Stolen Bonds Offered for Sale

In 1920 Mr. Litvinoff, the Society Representative, placed a parcel of the confiscated bonds on the London market, the British Government apparently not considering that the circumstances called for official objection. Conversations on this subject are said to have taken place between representatives of the British and French Governments. Just what took place here is not clear, but certeimly the action of Mr. Litvinoff was referred to the Chinese Government, and discussion of the whole question of the validity of the confiscated bearer bonds became general in several countries. The common opinion was that nothing could be said against the claims of scrip holders, for where the scrip had been retained there would have been no exchange for bonds. The weight of opinion, however, seems to have been against recognition of the confiscated bonds, for it was thought that the circumstances should be taken into account as against unquestioned validity of bearer bonds. In other words the irregular action of the Reds attached to the bonds they were putting on the market,

In 1921 the Russian bank agreed to pay interest on scrip provided the Chinese Government undertook to relieve the bank of responsibility in the event of double payment.

China as Conditions of Payment.

Faced with the responsibility itself the Chinese Government took up the matter and issued the following notice it "The Times" in December 1921:—

NOTICE.

It having come to the knowledge of the Chinese Government that the Russian Soviet Government has confiscated a large number of the definitive bonds of the loan which were still in the possession of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, Petrograd, awaiting delivery against scrip, and has thus distributed the definitive bonds so confiscated to other persons regardless of the holders of the provisional scrip, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that before paying the coupons of the Russian issue of the Reorganization Loan the paying bank must require from the presenter proof that his bonds were delivered prior to December 27, 1917, together with an undertaking that in case such bonds are subsequently found to be bonds confiscated by the Soviet Government he will refund the amount received. As an alternative to the above procedure an approved banker's guarantee to the same effect may be accepted. Banks are therefore warned that unless supported with such bankers's guarantee coupons of the above issue should be accepted only for collection through the paying agents in London. Paris, or Yokohama, accompanied by documents furnishing the required evidence. In the event of non-payment, the coupons will be returned but the supporting documents may be retained by the Russo-Asiatic Bank, Paris, for later investigation. This notification does not apply to that portion of the issue which was made in Belgium.

The position of scrip holders and bond holders of the Russian issue was thus suddenly reversed, the former being placed on a secure footing and the holders of confiscated bonds being thrown into air.

New Bonds Issued

For a time the new situation was found satisfactory, but a solution of the whole question had yet to be found, and in 1922 another scheme was put forward with the idea of enabling scrip holders to obtain bonds as well as coupons later than the third issue, which they had received owing to the late delivery of the bonds in the first instance. The scheme was finally agreed upon by the Chinese Government and the group banks. It embraced an issue of new bonds, which were to be green instead of yellow. An announcement to this effect was made in "The Times" and the leading papers in other participation countries on December 6, 1922, as follows:—

CHINESE REPUBLIC

The following is a translation of an announcement made in Paris by the Chinese Government, under date December 4, 1922:—

With a view to protecting the interests of holders of bonds of the Russian issue of the Chinese 5 per cent. Reorganization Loan, 1913, the Chinese Government has decided to have the bonds of the Russian Issue of this loan exchanged for new bonds absolutely similar to the old ones except as to colour, which will be green. The original issue will henceforth be cancelled.

The exchange of bonds will take place at the offices of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, 9 Rue Boudreau, Paris. The exchange may be effected on or after the December 4, 1922, in order to enable bondholders to collect without delay the coupon due January 1, 1923, which will only be paid on the new bond. Bondholders are invited in their own interests to forward their old bonds as soon as possible to the Russo-Asiatic Bank, Paris. whose offices are at their disposal for this purpose. In order to effect the exchange holders should deposit, at the same time as their bonds, documents establishing their rightful ownership and give satisfactory proof as to the origin of such bonds which must not have formed part of those seized in Russia. All bonds deposited for the purpose of exchange should have attached thereto coupons from No. 19 due January 1, 1923, inclusive. In the event of an exchange not being granted, the original bonds would be returned to the holders, but the accompanying documents may be retained by the Russo-Asiatic Bank with a view to further investigation. The examination of documents deposited with the bonds sent in for exchange will be undertaken by a representative of the Chinese Government conjointly with a representative of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, who, in this connexion merely lends his assistance to the Chinese Government. Holders of Provisional Certificates are also invited to lodge their certificates which will be exchanged for definitive bonds bearing Coupon No. 19, due January 1. 1923, and onwards. The question of overdue coupons (not yet paid) will be settled later. For this exchange, a charge at the rate of 2/6 (two shilling and six pence) per certificate of one bond will be made to holders of provisional certificates. This notification only applies to that portion of the Reorganization Loan which was issued in Russia—i.e., to bonds numbered 586,668 to 725,556 and to all provisional certificates which have not yet been exchanged for definite bonds. Special notice is given to the effect that from coupon No. 19, due January 1, 1923, inclusive, coupons will only be paid on presentation if same have been detached from the new bond.

THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

This appears to be the last official action taken by the Chinese Government in connexion with these bonds.

It may be conceded that many holders of the confiscated bonds purchased them in good faith, although in some cases at least, the prices paid indicate speculation rather than investment.

Unaccounted For

The clearing house in London by means of recording payments prior to 1917 has compiled a table from which it appears that 138,000 bonds, each of £20 denomination, were sent to Russia and 107,815 have been recorded leaving 31,076 unaccounted for, presumably having been confiscated and sold by the Soviet authorities abroad.

The coupons due on these 31,076 bonds at 10/- each give a total of £248,658 while the value of these bonds is 621,520

making a total of £870,178

This appears to be the amount involved in the possibility of double payment, although it is possible that some other double payments have occurred.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RUMOURED RENDITION OF MIXED COURT

Chinese Draft Scheme for Administration: Assessors Still to Sit in Police Cases

The "Sinwanpao" on Tuesday published what purported to be a draft scheme for the return of the Mixed Court to China, said to have been submitted by the Waichiaopu to the Diplomatic Body which now has the matter under consideration. The principal clauses in the draft are to the following effect:—

The Mixed Court is to be changed into a Special Tribunal presided over by a Judge and a number of Magistrates, the status of this tribunal to be similar to that of a district court of justice. Criminal and other cases involving Chinese only should be heard by the magistrate alone. If foreigners are involved or the police are interested in a case affecting peace and good order an Assessor will sit and cooperate with the Magistrate. Foreign residents who do not enjoy extraterritorial rights will be tried by the Magistrate alone. If a sentence exceeding 10 years' imprisonment is proposed, as for instance in cases of armed robbery or murder, it must receive the sanction of the Minister of Justice. The Municipal Police will issue summonses and execute warrants, but the Magistrate will have the right to inquire into these matters, and in every case an accused person not brought to court within 24 hours of arrest must be released. In all cases involving foreign interests, the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs will act as Judge of the Appeal Court, but in cases where Chinese only are interested the Special Tribunal in the interior must be applied to for a rehearing. A Chinese is to be appointed Chief Clerk of the Court, with Chinese assistant clerks, and foreign clerks appointed must have a recommendation from the Consular Body, and must submit to the orders of the judicial authority.

It is said that a scheme on these lines has been submitted to the Diplomatic Body, with an intimation that it will remain in force as long as extraterritoriality remains.

Another report states that the Judicial Rights Society is pressing for the return of the Court, and is inviting the co-operation of the German Minister, the Russian Ambassador, and the representatives of other nationalities who have no extra-territorial rights.

SOVIET AND MONGOLIA

Parliament's Suggestion of Appointment of Special Commission

Peking, Aug. 11.

A group of Members of Parliament have sent a communication to the Government pointing out that as the formal negotiations between China and Soviet Russia will shortly begin, it is, in their opinion, necessary to appoint a special commission to study questions connected with Outer Mongolia and the restoration of China's sovereignty over that region.

The Cabinet decided to refer the matter to the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, War and the Interior for consideration, with instructions for these Ministries to appoint the commission if they deem it necessary.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

UPROAR IN PEKING'S PARLIAMENT

Opposition's Way of Downing Dr. W. W. Yen's Candidature for Premiership

Peking, Aug. 8.

There were 384 members present at the meeting of the House of Representatives this afternoon when the principal item on the agenda was the vote on the election of Dr. Yen as Premier. The Government supporters moved the vote accordingly.

The Opposition thereupon overturned their chairs and generally kicked up a tremendous row which continued until the Speaker announced his inability to restore order and adjourned the House.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND SOVIET TREATY

Alleged to Have Come to Terms with Karakhan: Under Modifications

Peking, Aug. 8.

It is officially stated that Marshal Chang Tso-lin and M. Karakhan have reached an agreement which accords with the Sino-Russian Agreement with some slight modification and that this will facilitate the forthcoming negotiations in Peking.

The Waichiaopu says that the Sino-Russian Conference will begin between August 15 and August 20, probably on August 15.

The Soviet Government has not yet ratified the Sino-Russian Agreement but the Soviet Assembly passed it on July 31. The Moscow Central Executive Committee is now considering it and it is expected that it will be ratified shortly.

At the meeting of the Cabinet this morning, the Ministry of the Interior suggested appointing municipal bureaux to administer the former Russian Concessions in Tientsin and Hankow but the meeting resolved to allow the existing administrations to carry on for the time being.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

It is advisable to take the statement of Field Marshal Chang's change of attitude with salt.—Ed.

MUKDEN NOT AGREED WITH REDS

Karakhan's Too Previous Optimism: White Russians a Stumbling-Block

Peking, Aug. 12.

The official report issued on August 8 that M. Karakhan and Marshal Chang Tso-lin had reached an agreement which accorded with the Sino-Russian Agreement was based on information which the Waichiaopu received from M. Karakhan who had been conducting independent negotiations with Marshal Chang Tos-lin.

M. Karakhan now admits that an impasse was reached through Marshal Chang Tso-lin's attitude vis-a-vis of the White Russian question and the Soviet Ambassador desires to begin formal Sino-Russian negotiations without further parleys with Mukden. After a delay of some days apparently due to the Mukden impasse M. Karakhan will meet Dr. Wellington Koo to-morrow when it is expected that the date of the Sino-Russian Conference will be finally fixed.

The question of handing over the Russian Legation appears to be going on smoothly. It is reported that all the Legations except the Italian Legation have received instructions from their Governments to comply with the request to hand over the premises to M. Karakhan. It is not anticipated that the Italian Government will offer objection and there seems to be a chance of the matter being settled before the departure of Dr. Schurman, the American Minister, to-morrow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING, Aug. 13.—The railway, telegraph and postal surcharges to aid the flood sufferers will operate from September 1.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING, Aug. 7.—President Tsao gave a luncheon at the Palace today to Mr. Karakhan and his suite. All of the Cabinet Ministers were present and the company also included Generals Feng Yu-hsiang and Wang Huai-ching and Admiral Tsai Ting-kan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING, Aug. 7.—It is reported that the Chamber of Commerce in Shantung Province has telegraphed to the Government objecting to the opening of treaty ports along the Kiaochow-Tsinan railway, as was requested by the Japanese Legation in a Note sent to the Waichiaopu on July 25 reminding the Chinese Government of the promise it made in 1920.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. SUN AND THE COMMUNISTS

Aug. 11.

WITHOUT further confirmation, not available at the time of writing, it would hardly be safe to accept unreservedly the report that Dr. Sun Yat-sen and the British and French authorities at Canton have come to an agreement settling the strike. We hope it may be so, provided there is no loss of face for the foreign community of Shameen. For although there were features in the regulations, which caused the strike, not very wise, sufficient concession had been offered in respect of these by July 21 to satisfy Chinese amour propre; and in view of the general nature of the strike, it was of the utmost importance that the foreigners should stand firm. No one, whether Chinese or foreigner, in Canton is ignorant of the fact that it is the Communist wing of the Kuomintang who are controlling the strike. The leaders of this section are a man named Wang Ching-wei, formerly a resident of Shanghai and with an attempted political assassination to his credit when he was only eighteen; and Tse Ying-po, a former school-master, described as a man of strong and ruthless character. The Communists were only admitted to the Kuomintang party some few months ago, but according to one good source of information, they already exercise a great deal of power and are said even to defy Dr. Sun Yat-sen himself, whose ascendancy generally and physical force personally are reported to be not what they were. We may take it for granted that the Communists care nothing about the losses of Chinese silk merchants arising from the strike. The question of a settlement, therefore, is really an issue between Dr. Sun's personal prestige and the extent to which the Communists desire and are able to defy him.

One thing must clearly be borne in mind. The strike at Shameen is only in name a servants' strike. The boys, cooks and police are merely catspaws. The real quarrel is between the Chinese Communists and the foreigner, a repetition on a smaller scale of the Hongkong strike. The passport regulations question was settled so easily in the first negotiations, that it is quite clear they were not the real bone of contention. Indeed, had any warning been given of the strike and the Shameen authorities been notified that this particular regulation was obnoxious, we have good reason to know that it would have been withdrawn. The fact of the matter is that a great deal of bad blood was caused over the bomb outrage at the Hotel Victoria, the assumption by some foreigners that its author was a Chinese infuriated the Cantonese and the strike was, partly, their retaliation. That it has been kept going so long by the Communists is due simply to the fact that if they can force Shameen to take back the police, they, the Communists, will be able to claim a great victory and much silver will flow into their coffers.

It is naturally believed by all foreigners in Canton that the Cantonese Government has been fully aware of every move in the strike and could have stopped it if it had wished. The first part of this assumption no one will feel disposed to contradict; we find it shared by Chinese who have correspondents in Canton. The fact that electric light—which Shameen pays for—has never been cut off is significant. It is also not unlikely that the Canton Government could have stopped the strike at the beginning. Whether the Communists afterwards got beyond control is what we shall never know for certain. Chinese informants, referred to above, say that Dr. Sun can stop the strike whenever he pleases, and that as the house-boys and other servants are very tired of the fight, we are likely at any moment to get news that it is definitely over. But there remain good grounds for thinking that Dr. Sun's control over the wilder elements of the party is not what it was. He cannot altogether plead innocent to the charge of having called those wild elements into being. He published, it will be recalled, a joint declaration with Comrade Joffe, the former Bolshevik envoy to China, expressing sympathy and fellowship. He harboured a Bolshevik agent in Canton for many months, and has more than once spoken as if Moscow and Canton were natural allies, with the world against them. Among the fiery peoples of the South, where political hotheads of all kinds find themselves in congenial surroundings, this is a dangerous line to take, which may easily end in the creation of a Frankenstein's monster. The Cantonese Government did not attempt to check the Communists who ran the Hongkong strike, for which there was certainly no defence; they appear to have been equally tender towards that in Shameen. So do the Communists gain strength and by and bye, when Canton wishes to suppress them, it may not so easily be able to do so. The fight around Shameen is really a demonstration by the Bolsheviks against all lawfully constituted authority to test their strength; and it is no exaggeration to say that the Canton Government are hardly less concerned than the foreigners in seeing that the agitators do not win.

As regards the foreigners of Shameen, our hope that the strike has been settled is equalled by our hope that there has been no surrender of their stronghold. They have settled down now to the irksomeness of doing their own menial work and we are sure that the overwhelming majority of them—we will say every man of them—would far rather go on doing so than give in. To surrender now would merely mean renewal of the fight a little later under worse conditions. To Shameen the issue is vital. It is a little community, but with rights well established by many decades of treaty and old custom. We are no believers in "gunboat policy;" we believe that more is to be done with the Chinese by conciliation than by pugnacity. But where just rights are concerned we hold that, in the present state of political flux and anarchy, the foreigner should be unyielding; and it is also well known that where the masses of the Chinese know that the foreigner is within his rights, they cannot easily be roused against him. Mistakes were made at the beginning by Shameen, but directly these were pointed out there was instant willingness to rectify them. In the latter stages Shameen has been fighting against the worst elements in Southern China and in doing so it has championed the cause of all orderly and respectable Chinese as much as its own. If the fight is not yet over, we trust that the Chinese will give this view of the matter impartial consideration; and for the foreigners, that their employers in other ports will back them up through thick and thin.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

Aug. 12.

IT would be a waste of time to attempt to answer in detail all the arguments pressed, in our correspondence columns to-day, by Mr. J. C. E. Rye, for taking the Bolshevist to our bosoms. His point of view is such that any reconciliation between Mr. Rye and those who differ from him is simply impossible. At the same time there are one or two statements in his letter which cannot well be let pass and some criticism of our own position, meant, we feel sure, in no unfriendly sense, but none the less calling for an answer.

Our correspondent says that if we left the editorial chair and went to Russia, we should find "that all the Russians (outside a few die-hards) would tell you 'out of two evils Tsarism and Bolshevism, we choose the latter.'" Now in the first place this is no argument for Bolshevism. Accepting for the sake of argument that it is better than Tsarism, the only conclusion is that the latter was much worse than ever supposed. But in point of fact, so long as people kept out of politics, they were free under Tsarism at least to work as they pleased, to enjoy the fruits of their labour, to employ others or take service with others, to marry, to have a home to themselves, to worship. None of these is permitted under Bolshevism. But going further in Mr. Rye's letter, we find that he "does not know one single Bolshevist." If, as seems reasonable, we may deduce from this that he has no more been in Bolshevist Russia than we have, then it is a fair question, Why should Mr. Rye's information as to the perfections of Bolshevism be more credible than our information regarding its imperfections? And it is a curious thing that though Mr. Rye does not know one Bolshevist, he does possess "hundreds of friends amongst the White Russians," who strangely refuse to believe what he tells them about Russia to-day—probably because they have been there themselves.

To take another point, the fact that a man whose brother has been killed by the Germans during the war is willing to shake hands with Germans after the war, is no earthly argument for King George liking to shake hands with those who slew, or share the responsibility for slaying, his cousin and the wife, son and daughters of the latter. The Germans killed in fair fight, and in fair fight the British did their best to kill them. When the fight is over, the proper spirit is that the bitterness of war should be forgotten as soon as humanly possible, and that the two should shake hands. But the Tsar, the Tsaritsa, their son and daughters were butchered in a cellar at Ekaterinburg without provocation and without the ghost of a chance of self-defence. Mr. Rye will find all the facts fully told—they are perfectly well attested—in Francis McCullagh's "A Prisoner of the Reds:" if he has not read the book we recommend him to do so.

Our correspondent goes on to say that "amongst the Russian émigrés there are a vast number of useless, spineless, idle rich, whom Russia can well do without." This appears to us rather a loose statement: we wonder how many Russian exiles can really be described as rich. But accepting it as it stands, for the sake of argument again, the assertion does not touch the worst of the charge in respect of Bolshevist persecutions. If Mr. Rye has read the history of the French Revolution, he will remember that the sufferings of the aristocrats were almost to be called small in comparison with the suffering of the bourgeoisie. The people who were destroyed in Carrier's noyades by hundreds at Nantes were certainly not aristocrats. The same thing has happened in Russia. The worst sufferers by Bolshevist proscription have undoubtedly been the mercantile and professional people, the middle classes, who could not escape from Russia and had to endure the hate, which, by all its published speeches and newspaper articles, Communism specially directs against the bourgeois.

Mr. Rye tells us that this paper has "of late expressed the fervent hope that the Whites will some day come back into their own again." If we really did appear to utter such a hope, and we cannot recall having done so, we can only regret that we expressed ourselves so unintelligibly. We have no special wish that the Whites or any other particular kind of colour should come into power in Russia. But we certainly do fervently hope that the days of the Reds are numbered, because we are convinced that while Bolshevism remains what it is in Russia to-day, that country cannot come into the comity of nations and cooperate with others for the rebuilding of the world. The difference between Mr. Rye and "Shanghailander" and ourselves is that they believe that Bolshevism is a feasible form of government, and we emphatically do not.

Admitting, once more, for the sake of argument, that the men who compose the Soviets are personally virtuous, and of high ideals, it none the less remains that the government they wield is bad, morally and practically. There are, to say the least, very strong reasons for believing that that government practises treachery and deceit as the first weapons of statecraft, and that, so far from being impressed by the sincerity and frankness of others who try to deal evenly with it, it merely congratulates itself that the gods of Bolshevism have delivered such transparent fools into its hands. A government which does that sort of thing is morally a bad government, which it behoves others to keep at arm's length. And it is also a bad government practically, because it is based on the negation of two of the strongest motives in human nature, personal initiative and spiritual aspiration, both of which it does its utmost to suppress. Even if we estimate the idea of an agreement between Soviet Russia and any other country from the lowest possible point of view, namely, that of self-interest alone, it appears utterly futile to expect any profitable cooperation between a state which does its best to destroy private capital and trading, and a state which encourages and depends on them.

Furthermore, when we look into the future, we have to allow for one very probable contingency. Sooner or later, Bolshevism must develop, or suffer some rude shock which will violently convert it, into something quite different from what it is now; and it is by no means unlikely that, just as the Bolshevists have repudiated all the obligations and responsibilities of their predecessors, so will the future governors of Russia repudiate theirs.

THE LACK OF MONEY AND POWER

Aug. 13.

WHEN we read that Peking believes the time has come to bring about the unification of North and South, that it proposes to open an office for that purpose in Hongkong and has instructed the Ministry of Finance to find the requisite money, we all smile. Where will the Ministry of Finance find funds for new bureaux when it is already at its wits' end how to satisfy even a portion of the many bureaux that cry to it? And if there really are grounds for believing that North and South may be unified, what-earthly need can there be for opening an office to manage the reconcilement? Has not Peking enough secretaries and to spare for all the work that might be done? But this is the prevailing feature of Republican life in China. Whatever is to be done, from building a new road to patching up an alliance between two political parties, a special office with a high-sounding name must be set up. When Peking announced that it could not assist in Shanghai's project for an international exhibition because it was at work on a similar scheme itself, the only foundation found for the statement was that an office had been opened, with an exhibition in view, that it had wasted three lakhs of dollars and had had to be closed. One is reminded of the old mandarin's remark to a foreign dealer in machinery: "We don't want things that save labour in China; we want things that make it."

The curse of China to-day is the multiplication of bureaucrats. It is said of the Ministries in Peking to-day that if everyone whose name is on their pay roll attended the office at once there would not be room for them all to sit down. When the Hangchow-Ningpo Railway was taken over by the Shanghai-Nanking Railway a few years ago, just about nine times as many clerks were found in the accountants' office at Hangchow as were necessary. The united revolt of householders in Peking against the police tax is due, not to any animus towards the police, who are said to do their work loyally under most disheartening conditions, but to the well-founded suspicion that the police would get but a portion of the tax, and the notorious fact that revenues are ample for all the employees really required. The penury of Peking has long been notorious, but now the penury of the provinces is becoming equally so, notwithstanding that for years past they have sent not a penny to Peking. Kiangsu is or ought to be exceedingly prosperous. But Nanking is desperately hard up. In each of the two past years the provincial budget has been pared down to the utmost and still there is not money to meet it. Take the case of the cigarette tax. When Kiangsu, in defiance of the Tuchun, decided to follow Chêkiang's example and impose a 20 per cent. tax, the B. A. T. Co., as a last expedient, offered to pay five per cent., which would have amounted to $50,000 each month. This offer was made three months ago. An easy sum in multiplication shows that if the offer had been accepted Nanking would be the richer now by $150,000 which money it would have received. The offer was refused, the twenty per cent. tax was imposed and in three months has yielded a net revenue of $20,000 and even that Nanking has not, or a few days ago had not, received. The remainder had stuck to the fingers of tax-farmers and bureaucrats.

Mr. J. O. P. Bland described the revolution of 1911 as a revolt of the young mandarins—the men who had spent money on a foreign education and meant to get their outlay back—against the old. The truth of this description becomes more and more apparent every day, as every day the demand for money becomes more insistent and taxes and impositions of all kinds are multiplied but still without affording relief. Indeed the young mandarins have got into power and their little finger is thicker than their predecessors' loins. So the question of what is to be the future of China becomes very grave. We have faith in it, because a country so richly dowered cannot "go under"; but she is straining that faith very hard. For from the multiplication of bureaucrats arises not only lack of money but lack of power. The men who fill the principal places as Governors and Tuchuns are helpless in the innumerable claws of their subordinates. We may believe, without "throwing bouquets," that if the Tuchuns really could assert themselves, the majority would be glad enough to govern decently and live at peace with the foreign Powers. But it is abundantly clear that they cannot. The Tuchun of Chêkiang knew nothing of the cigarette tax until after it had been decided upon beyond his power to stop it. The Tuchun of Kiangsu openly opposed the tax but in vain. There is no supreme power in China to-day on which reliance can be put and one does not see where it is to be found. This is why people incline more and more to the hope of an Imperial restoration. But with the myriads of office holders battening on the so-called Republic, the odds against an Emperor are over-whelming, unless he is equipped to fight for his throne, to establish himself in one corner of the country and gradually extend his power, as has been the manner of arrival of so many dynasties.

POLITICS AND LITERATURE

Aug. 13.

A cursory glance at the history of the British Houses of Parliament must convince anybody that literature has not been at all badly represented in those august assemblies in times past. To recall a few of the literary stars that have also shone in the political firmament, there are Mill, Morley, Burke, Macaulay, Bryce, Lecky, Sheridan, to mention only a few of the great names. Nor were these people members of the "dumb friends' league." Their voices were frequently heard and to-day, even, we read their speeches, not generally perhaps for their political significance,—for some of the problems they dealt with do not now concern us,—but as examples of good literature, and beautiful diction; for many of these men were masters of the spoken as well as of the written word.

At the present time, however, there appears to be a lack of literary geniuses in the Mother of Parliaments. True there are any number of writers in both Houses, but it would be wide of the mark to call their productions literature. Most members of the Cabinet have one or more books to their name, but these are works that deal mainly with present day problems and the writers themselves would be the last people on earth to claim for them such literary merit as is likely to make them remembered by future generations or to earn them a place among the classics of the English language. In fact there is something depressing in the uniformity of the representatives of present day democracy. Political geniuses there may be, though they tend to hide their light under a bushel; but men of this type are not always the sort of people whose lives and works can be held up as examples of high endeavour for our children and our children's children to copy. Of men of genius in that most difficult and yet most enduring of all the arts—literature, there may be said to be none.

Nor is it difficult to find reasons for this want. For better or worse we are living in the age of the specialist—the man who attends solely to one particular job, and politics is becoming more and more of a profession for which one must submit to special training, and to succeed in which one must let other things go by the board. Then the amount of "spade work" which has to be done to-day by any man who hopes successfully to contest a constituency makes it impossible for him to secure the quietude and seclusion that are, with very rare exceptions, so necessary for the output of work of real literary merit. The successful business man who can leave much of his work in the hands of his trained subordinates or the labourite who is financed by his union have a much better chance of "nursing" a constituency than the scholarly man of letters. Neither does the latter tend to shine in present day electioneering meetings like the men of the above mentioned types. The person who has spent his life in persuading customers to buy his goods or shareholders to agree to his business policy or he who has forced his way in the face of the opposition or jealousy of his rivals to a commanding position in his trade union are not the sort of men to flinch at the jibes of the practised heckler, or to lose their heads at some rowdy demonstration of the "many headed." Few men whose delight is in the quietude of their studies could be brought to face the mob of semi-educated voters which a candidate for parliament must cajole or hoodwink.

And yet Parliament would be all the better for the presence of a few literary geniuses even if they were somewhat irresponsible and more than a little unpractical. Speeches of literary merit are none so common now but that we might have more of them; and their authors would present a refreshing contrast with the normal type of politician which might even rehabilitate the sadly fallen reputation of democratic government.

MARKING TIME AT WEIHAIWEI

Aug. 14.

Lapse of time does not help one to take a more enthusiastic view of the wisdom of the British offer at the Washington Conference to hand back Weihaiwei to China. Two and a half years have passed since that offer was made and still there is no certainty of what is to happen. One does not precisely perform spontaneous acts of generosity with the idea of being thanked, so that there is no space for commenting on the conspicuous absence, on the Chinese Government's part, of any sign of appreciation of Britain's quixotism. Indeed there has been rather more abuse of Great Britain, more insinuations of her alleged plotting in Tibet, more unrepented violations of her treaty rights, since the promise to give back Weihaiwei was made than before it. And as gratitude does not enter into the question, it would be interesting to know why retrocession was volunteered. The old flaw in the lease, involved in naming Russia as the Power at Port Arthur on whose occupation the holding of Weihaiwei should depend, had long been adjusted. If it be said that we owed a duty to the Chinese Government, much more might it be said that we owe one to the 150,000 Chinese who live under our protection in the Territory, many of whom must have grown to man's estate under the British flag. The only possible explanation was that Lord Balfour's usual clear judgment was temporarily fuddled by the miasma of disordered sentimentality which pervaded the whole atmosphere of the Washington Conference. Born in such superheated and unnatural surroundings, the offer regarding Weihaiwei has proved no less abortive and unprofitable than all other resolutions of the occasion.

These reflexions, common to most of us indeed, are again induced by reading the second annual report on the Territory since retrocession was announced. It is a melancholy tale. No grant-in-aid was given, of course, either in 1922 or 1923; the Treasury is never generous where no votes are involved; and upkeep costs have been pared to the quick. "The estimated expenditure for the financial year 1923-24 was $203,633," says the Officer Administering the Government, "a figure it is hoped to reduce by about $10,000, owing to the very strict economies exercised during the year in view of the proposed rendition of the Territory to China." But these reductions are not won without serious loss to the good of the Territory. The Weihaiwei folk are normally well behaved, but nowhere can a police force be reduced below a given point without danger. As for example:—

The police posts in the Territory, now ten in number, an extra post having been during the year established at Yao-Yao to check opium smuggling over a lonely stretch of coast line, were visited as frequently as circumstances permitted, and the men were invariably found to be at their posts and to have kept their quarters and equipment in good order. Closer supervision and more frequent inspections are urgently needed to maintain the discipline of the force and to protect the public against possible abuse of office, but this, although highly desirable, is an impossibility as the staff is under strength and the remaining inspectors are further required to discharge the duties of other government posts left vacant for reasons of economy.

During the year twenty-one non-commissioned officers and men were transferred to the Hongkong Police Force, four constables, one warder and one detective resigned, one police constable died as the result of a bicycle accident, and one was discharged for drunkenness on duty. This unusual depletion of the ranks at first occasioned some loss of efficiency, as the exigencies of the service gave no opportunity for the effective training of recruits before they were sent on duty, but despite this drawback the police have, on the whole, carried out their duties in a satisfactory manner.

The health of the port has also been endangered by the necessity of cutting Weihaiwei's coat according to its cloth, as the following extract will show:—

The posts of Junior Medical Officer and of Sanitary Inspector which fell vacant in 1922 were, for reasons of economy, left unfilled during the past year, and the sanitary condition of Port Edward has in consequence steadily deteriorated. The Inspector of the Port Police charged with the supervision of sanitation in addition to the performance of his own duties has done all that was humanly possible to keep the Port Edward area in a satisfactory condition. Abuses of many kinds have undoubtedly crept in, as inspections of cattle, bakeries, dairies, houses of Chinese and foreign residents, drains, the slaughter-house and the market, etc., could be made only at irregular intervals, and an outbreak of sickness in the summer months, when the accommodation of the Port is taxed to its utmost by the influx of several hundred foreign visitors, appears only too possible. That no prosecution for nuisances occurred during the past year in no way indicates that the sanitation of the port is in a satisfactory condition, and should the retrocession of the Territory be delayed the appointment of a Sanitary Inspector is of first importance in the interests of public health.

Pity for the thought of the Damoclean sword which hangs over Weihaiwei is augmented by the fact that trade improved, even in these disheartening circumstances. Its total for the year under review amounted to 2,264,688 packages, valued at $12,864,040, an increase of 743,735 packages and $2,973,925 over 1,520,953 packages and $9,890,155, the figures of the preceding year. This is really a remarkable showing, in connexion with which may be quoted the following:—

Should the retrocession of Weihaiwei to China not occur before the end of the financial year 1923-24 it will be necessary to increase the number of police in order to provide effective patrols for the business quarter of Port Edward, which is expanding with great rapidity. Several thefts and attempts at housebreaking have already occurred in this locality, and further police protection must be afforded to the shopkeepers and residents.

Well, the shopkeepers are probably better off even under these conditions than they will be when the Union Jack flies above them no more and republican bureaucrats are let loose upon them.

The report comments sympathetically on Mr. Beer's having found himself compelled, by the uncertainty of the future, to close his school, "one of the few purely British educational institutions in China; the loss will be keenly felt by the British communities existing in the Treaty Ports of China." So indeed say many people: whoever was not entitled to compensation, surely Mr. Beer was. Trade may be carried on. But the school was absolutely dependent on certain things—the most obvious, a resident foreign doctor—which disappear entirely with the flag. We doubt, however, if Mr. Beer expects to get any compensation; we do not think anyone does. The report contains a most interesting paragraph on the negotiation of the terms of retrocession which is well worth preserving:—

That retrocession was unaccomplished last year is in no way attributable to lack of willingness or good faith on the part of His Majesty's Government.

The Anglo-Chinese Commission, appointed in September, 1922, "to study the question locally and make the necessary recommendations" to their respective Governments, sat at Weihaiwei from September, 1922, to January 7, 1923, when the Chinese delegates, accompanied by the senior British delegate, returned to Peking. Considerable progress had been by this time made in the main outlines of the retrocession agreement by the delegates, who had throughout their consultations remained in close touch with their Governments, and it was hoped that an agreement satisfactory to both countries would be speedily reached. At the resumption of negotiations at Peking on March 16, 1923, however, an entirely new set of proposals drafted by the Pacific Conference Committee, a body including members of all Chinese Government departments that had been formed to deal with matters arising out of the Washington Conference, was presented by the Chinese delegates. These proposals, which completely ignored the many concessions made by the British Government, were found to be unsatisfactory by the British delegates, and finally, on May 31, 1923, after repeated and prolonged discussions and further concessions made by His Majesty's Government, the British and Chinese delegates unanimously adopted a draft agreement for submission to their respective Governments. This draft agreement His Majesty's Minister at Peking was, in August, 1923, authorized to sign on behalf of His Majesty's Government and formal notice to that effect was duly given to the Chinese Government. The latter, however, submitted a Memorandum of desired modifications and suggested that a date should be fixed for their consideration. These modifications, which are of so fundamental a nature as to necessitate the reopening of negotiations from the very beginning, have been transmitted to London and are at present under consideration by His Majesty's Government.

The italics in the above are ours, an irresistible underlining. But is not China well described by a contributor to-day as "the spoilt child?" What other Government would be permitted to go on in such a way? On the 23rd of last month a question was asked in the House of Commons as to what stage the retrocession of Weihaiwei had arrived at: to which the Foreign Secretary replied that "negotiations on the subject are now proceeding but they have not yet reached a stage at which I can make any statement." Private information from London, however, is that the British Government has accepted the Chinese point of view, and local report, from quarters not usually ill-informed, says the same. This country not being Mexico, we suppose that the British community of Weihaiwei have long ceased to expect justice and will be the less disappointed at what befalls them. But we are sorry for them and not less for the Chinese of the Territory.

THE FASCISTI OF BRITAIN

Aug. 15.

Some three or four years ago a good deal was heard of the organization of the middle classes in England, and there is at least one well known Shanghai resident who has addressed meetings at Home, to rouse the long-suffering ones who now find themselves ground between the upper millstone of Capital and the nether one of Labour. Judging by the last general election results, however, the middle classes are not yet roused, and interest turns to the creation of a British Fascisti organization, of which one or two pamphlets have reached us. One strong claim made for it is that "it is not a class movement." We read:—

It embraces all grades of society, from peers to the humblest of peasants. Neither is it concerned with Toryism Liberalism or any other shade of party politics, its ranks being open to all who have its objects at heart.

A further emphatic claim is that Fascism "is essentially law-abiding and constitutional, so long as the Government adequately fulfils its primary function of keeping order." In this connexion the following point is tellingly made:

Much of the criticism levelled at Fascism arises from the fact that in Italy it came into power by unconstitutional methods. It should, however, be remembered that constitutional government had entirely broken down in that country before Fascism was born; that is a fact which its opponents find it convenient to ignore.

It is not surprising to read that the "steady growth of the organization" has been followed by "misleading statements in a number of newspapers" and some details of the system are accordingly issued. Among the officials mentioned, the posts which excite most interest are the directorships of Units, of Transports and of Propaganda and Publicity. The duty of the units is "to take active measures against the revolutionary elements in their own districts" and to be prepared for "swift mobilization in the event of a general strike or revolution." The Transport service consists of owner-drivers, motor cyclists, motor drivers, cyclists, and owners and drivers of those vehicles, to maintain communication in event of revolution—otherwise to be attached to local Unit—owner-drivers are expected to render all necessary assistance where a car is needed.

Under the heading of propaganda we read:—

This Department will call the attention of Units to existing Bolshevik activities in their districts which may have escaped notice. The Units will be informed, and the combative measures left entirely in their hands.

The last sentence is somewhat menacing and one wonders what precisely may be the outcome of it. If, for example, a Fascisti unit took upon itself to break up an office which was publishing Communist literature, the overwhelming sympathies of the public would be on its side, but we doubt that the law would be against it. Just as policemen are posted in Hyde Park to see that the anarchist orators are not pulled to pieces by the crowd, the law takes a more lenient view of those who print revolutionary literature than of those who tear it up. For the rest, we read that:—

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the British Fascisti is NOT a "swashbuckling" concern, as stated in certain newspapers; nor does it bear the slightest resemblance in any way to the Ku Klux Klan or any other "terrorist" organization. Its object is the preservation of law and order and the prevention of the terrorizing of this country by the forces of Red Revolution, which are seeking to overthrow society and plunge Great Britain into the same state of anarchy and chaos obtaining in Russia at the present time.

Further while the Fascisti are banded together to fight Bolshevist doctrines, they are also zealous to alleviate those unhappy conditions of life which tend to probuce Bolshevism.

It can hardly be said that there is no excuse for the formation of such an institution. The Communist party would appear to have redoubled their efforts in proportion to the advent of a Labour Government. The British Labour Party is the peculiar object of the hatred of the Moscow Reds who inspire and finance the Communist movement in Britain; and since Labour actually experienced the responsibilities of office, it has tended more and more to sober down and to put away the extremist views which once brought it at least within measurable distance of the Communists. Thus we find MacManus, President of the Communist Organization in Britain, who has been attending the Third Internationale in Moscow, writing in the "Isvestia" that the advent of a Labour Government in Britain provides "a splendid opportunity" to further revolution. This same MacManus has been advocating measures to assist anti-British agitators and secessionists in the Dominions and to endeavour to wreck any bargain with Germany tending to settle the reparations issue. He also appears to have joined with approval in discussion of measures to foment revolution in India. Is it possible that he will be allowed to return to England and go about his evil work unchecked? If so, one cannot think the Fascisti unjustified if they take strong measures to stop his mouth. The chief question, regarding the success of the British Fascisti, is whether they have a real leader. In Italy the movement succeeded as it did, partly because social conditions were already far worse than they have ever been in England, partly because there was Mussolini as leader. The best organization will fail, if run on demoratic lines. Meanwhile one wishes the British Fascisti every success. There is ample scope for their efforts, as shown by the recent transport strike in London and dock strike at Southampton—both unquestionably Communist work. And in these days it is a pleasure to come across people who are not afraid to call themselves patriots.

THE COSMETIC EVIL

Aug. 16.

A few days ago, on our "Woman's Page," a department not wholly devoid of interest to masculine readers, there was an interesting article on the feminine use of cosmetics. The writer made a spirited defence of her sex for adhering to the usage in spite of masculine expostulations. As to the Chinese fashion, she invoked the sanction of "olo custom" for it, by pointing out its universality and antiquity. Certainly cosmetics were commonly used by the women and girls of all the ancient civilizations of the world. In the Jewish Scriptures we read that Queen Jezebel, who lived about 3,000 years ago, "painted her eyes and tired her head, and looked out at the window," a proceeding which failed to propitiate her implacable enemy. At a much earlier period, there is overwhelming evidence of the use of cosmetics in ancient Egypt. Slate palettes have been found on which the Egyptian women mixed the paints with which they touched up their eyes and faces. Our British ancestors painted themselves with woad, and among primitive peoples generally the use of paints and powders was common. But antiquity in itself is no justification for any custom, and in these days cosmetics often are poisonous chemical concoctions that may do much harm. Beginning with the scientists, a movement is under way urging the adoption of legislative measures prohibiting their use.

As we should expect, it is in the United States, the home of radical reforms, that the campaign has started. It must be admitted that the facts are sufficiently serious to warrant careful attention. Statistics show that the trade in cosmetics has reached such proportions in the United States that in 1919-1920, on the basis of taxes paid, G.$205,000,000 worth of cosmetics were sold; in 1921 the actual cost of the cosmetics manufactured was G.$75,000,000, and if the retail prices amounted to ten times as much—a very moderate estimate—the amount spent by American ladies was $750,000,000 gold currency. This surely is very much more than they give to the various agencies for the improvement of mankind. And the worst of it is that, as already pointed out, poisonous chemicals such as lead, mercury, arsenic, etc., frequently enter into the composition of the various face powders, face enamels, hair dyes, depilatories, skin bleaches, toilet creams, "rice powders," pastes for staining the eyelashes and eyebrows, and the rest of the beauty armamentarium. The consequences of indiscriminate and excessive use of these preparations may be very serious. Often the health is impaired, it may be slowly and insidiously, the effects being hardly discernible in a life-time, or the symptoms may be severe; one unfortunate patient suffering from the colicky pains of lead poisoning was erroneously operated on for appendicitis. But we do not wish to make the recital too harrowing. Sufficient to say that poisonous substances cannot for a long while be used with impunity.

What is to be done? The evil cannot any longer be regarded with equanimity. In Shanghai it is a marvel that the feminine organizations devoted to reforms of various kinds have not already taken action. Think of the millions of dollars spent on cosmetics which might be given to the poor, or to philanthropic enterprises. The time devoted daily by women and even very young girls to artificial adornment that ought to be given to their mental and moral improvement; the disregard of parental and marital advice and authority; the hardworking husbands obliged to curtail their own expenses to provide the money for cosmetics, economy which may be willingly borne on the whole, but which is apt at times to mar the serenity and happiness of the home; the impaired health of the victims; the unavailing remorse that should come sooner or later, to prey like a worm in the bud on the damask cheek, for the time and money lost and much else that is to be deplored. Is it not surprising that a vigorous campaign against the injurious custom is not everywhere being waged? If it be said in defence that the artificial adornment, when done artistically, adds to feminine charms; that it gives the users a sense of pleasure and power and, therefore, makes them more agreeable companions; that without it they would be miserable; that the money, if it were not spent on cosmetics, would disappear just the same; that many who use cosmetics reach a good and happy old age—or late period of girlhood—whichever we like to call it; that it is only the reckless and very ignorant who suffer; and that, anyway, it is no one's business but their own if ladies do use cosmetics, it may be admitted there is much that is plausible in the argument. Yet the same or very similar arguments may be urged in defence of certain masculine indulgences which are condemned by feminine reformers.

No partiality should be shown. If the defensive arguments on the one side are untenable, the arguments on the other side are equally so. All who do not live the simple life in its entirety fall under the same judgment. But it is to be feared that the use or disuse of cosmetics is not a matter to be settled by pure logic and argument. The women and girls who need good advice the most will say they care little for what they are pleased to call "silly talk" and will declare their intention to do as they please. Nevertheless, so far as Shanghai is concerned, it is for the various associations of ladies to join in the campaign for the prohibition of cosmetics, and sternly to expel from membership those of their number who do not believe that nature unadorned is adorned the most.

MR. Cheng Keh, Minister of the Interior, recently sent a memorial to the President pointing out that Dr. Wellington Koo and other enthusiasts had started a movement for the establishment of a "Chung Hua Museum." Mr. Cheng requested the President to issue a mandate sanctioning the scheme and giving encouragement to this laudable enterprise. The President accordingly issued a mandate, which was gazetted on Friday, instructing Mr. Cheng Keh to inform Mr. Koo and the other gentlemen concerned in the movement that the plan met with the hearty approval of the President. The establishment of the museum would be an important factor in the life of the people. From the historical point of view it would have considerable educational effect, and it would tend to improve the national spirit. Finally the President trusted that the scheme, which appeared to be thoroughly efficient, would require extension as time went on and that provision for such extension would be made.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Socialization or Nationalization

Views from Australia on the labour question always are interesting, if not illuminating, for Australia was the first country thoroughly to become "labourized," and in Australia Labour has, for some years, had a voice in the affairs of the land that generally has been predominant. In Australia especially has the doctrine been preached of the nationalization of everything that possibly could be nationalized, and though in such matters as shipping, which is under state control and has been for some years, the results have neither justified the experiment nor brought about that ideal condition of affairs so ardently preached by the extreme Australian Labour Party as typified by the lurid, insatiable Mr. Walsh and his satellites, the howl for nationalization still goes on apace. Addressing the students of Sydney University recently, Mr. A. C. Willis, one of the Australian Labour leaders, took upon himself to differentiate between nationalization and socialization, after denying that the Australian Labour Party had in view the nationalization of the whole of industry. According to Mr. Willis,

"Socialization did not mean the same thing as nationalization, for nationalization meant merely handing over industry from the direction of individuals into bureaucratic control, leaving the worker in exactly the same position as he occupied before. No better results were obtained from an employee of a state enterprise than from one under private control; he was still merely a wage-earner. Socialization meant a raising of the status of the worker and an expansion of his functions so that he might be a partner in industry. The working of immutable economic laws must force this on us sooner or later; but it was the method of attaining the ideal which created a cleavage in opinions. The means to be adopted must differ in accordance with the nature of the obstacles to be surmounted. Action which might be appropriate in Russia would be quite inapplicable to British conditions and that which might be successful in France would hopelessly collapse if attempted in Germany."

Apparently Mr. Willis has accepted the law, equally as immutable as the one he quotes, that nationalization tends only to bureaucracy; that nationalization does not go far enough; that the worker must constitute a bureaucratic self, a partner in his own industrial activities and subject to neither state control nor any other. The statement that means which might be appropriate in Russia would be inapplicable to British conditions is obvious, but none the less welcome, coming, as it does, from an avowed socialist. It proves—though there has not ever been much doubt in the matter—that, whatever the British socialist may say and think, there is not and probably never will be any real scope among the great body of the British workers for a counterpart of the departed Mr. Lenin.

The Cost of Cables

It is probable that the majority of foreigners in Shanghai find it necessary at some time or other to send a telegram to friends or relations at Home; and it is equally probable that there are many who receive messages by cable in which the full private address of the recipient has been paid for at so much per word—3/- in the case of messages from Britain. It is further far from improbable that most people who send such messages to people who have no registered telegraphic address feel vexed at having to pay as much as $1.50 a word for an address which may run into four or five words. Firms and individuals with telegraphic addresses are not, of course, concerned with this aspect of cabling, but even allowing that the majority of telegrams between Shanghai and Europe are sent to registered and abbreviated addresses, the number of messages in which an appreciable portion of the cost of the whole message is taken up by the address is large enough to warrant some means of combating this needless expense. The latest issue to hand of the "Corriere della Sera" (Milan) contains details of what appears to be an admirable system that has been instituted in Italy to deal with this manner of swelling the dividends of the cable companies; and the whole thing seems so delightfully simple and practicable that it is strange it has (apparently) not been thought of before. All the sender of a telegram has to put for the address is the surname of the addressee, his telephone number and the name of the town; the telegraph authorities at the point of destination look up the address and the message is delivered. The system was tried for some months between six of the largest cities of the country, and proved so successful that it has been brought into general use from July 1. (It is obvious that where the addressee has no telephone the old method still is adhered to). We do not go so far as to assert that such a system would be an unqualified success in Shanghai or in the United Kingdom; but the fact that, after a genuine trial, it has universally been adopted in Italy would indicate its suitability as the basis of a similar improvement in other parts of the world. The possible objection that in Shanghai (as in many other parts) the telephonic and telegraphic administrations are in private and separate hands, should not prove an insuperable bar.

Egypt and the Sudan

The last issue out of the "Westminster Gazette" contains a note on the Egyptian Nationalist Government's demand, under Zaghlul Pasha, that the Sudan should be handed over to it.

There is no justification whatsoever for this demand (says the "Westminster"). No racial or linguistic affinity links the Sudan with Egypt. The province was brutally conquered by Mehemet Ali in 1820; and the cruelty with which it was bled by its Egyptian rulers during the next 60 years was the main cause of the successful revolt which was headed by the Mahdi and his Khalifas. When Lord Kitchener reconquered the province in the nineties, an Anglo-Egyptian condominium was set up, but from the first Britain exercised the controlling voice, and the whole of the wonderful work of reconstruction which has brought the Sudan a prosperity never known before has been due to British administrators. The Sudanese desire no change as yet, and hate the idea of being put back under Egyptian control. Lord Parmoor, on behalf of the Government, has announced quite definitely that we have no intention of handing over the Sudan, or breaking our pledges to the Sudanese. Thereupon Zaghlul Pasha resigned the premiership of Egypt; but, finding that this heroic act created no great stir, he has reconsidered his resignation; and there the matter stands for the moment. The Egyptian demand for the Sudan is an example of unbridled nationalist chauvinism. Egypt will be wise to prove that she can govern herself—a task she is now attempting for the first time in her long history—before she tries to govern other people.

Coming from a paper which certainly cannot be accused of exerting itself in behalf of British imperial interests, responsibilities and achievements, this may be called distinctly fruity.

A Saturday Evening

What a piece of work is a man; and what a remarkable place is Shanghai becoming. The scene is Jessfield Park on a Saturday evening. Large tripods of lanterns guide one across the park and flares burn on the ponds to prevent people from accidentally walking into them. The trees about the bandstand are hung with fairy lights and several hundred deck chairs are spread out on the sward with the audience reclining in them like rows of corpses in the Morgue. The music is indifferent. Doubtless it is as well performed as Maestro Paci's work usually is; but the acoustics are very bad: if there is any part of the auditorium in which the music can be well heard, the writer has not found it yet. One or two parts come out thunderously; the rest are inaudible. However, the "corpses" appear to like it. When the music stops they come to life and a rustle of handclapping, most curious to hear in the open air, flutters over the park. Now consider that there are several hundred people at these concerts, a very large number of whom have come in motor-cars. Consider also that there are probably eight or nine cinema entertainments, not counting those purely Chinese, besides roof gardens, dancing halls and club evenings, and that all of these will be quite reasonably well attended. That Shanghai is nominally "empty" in the summer time means really nothing: the disappearance of some people to seaside and mountain makes no appreciable difference to the population of any big city. But contrast the modern plethora of places of entertainment with the condition of Shanghai before the war, and the large sums which in the aggregate must be spent at them every Saturday night—not to mention other evenings of the week. One does not suggest that less work is done in Shanghai than formerly, but certainly there is vastly more play. At night time Shanghai has become one great pleasure city. And whereas, a few years ago, one could almost count up, at least one knew most of the names of, the rich people of the place, nowadays everybody appears to have money to throw about, for the maintenance of luxurious houses, abundant servants, motor-cars, frequent entertainment. Yet trade is demonstrably bad. Can anyone explain how it is done?

The World's Spoiled Child

"Scrutator" has an article in this week's issue, in which he deals on sound lines of thought with changes that are coming to China and the Chinese. In his opinion China is the spoiled child of the nations—a title apt enough. He advocates, in common with writers other than those of the propagandist type, a strong centralized policy among the Powers. He also proves, we think, the futility of ever showing the slightest sign of weakness, for Chinese officials are notoriously known for taking advantage of weakness and of playing one foreigner off against another. "I am an Englishman," he writes, "and I deplore the way in which Britain has allowed her influence, which at one time was sparklingly paramount not only in China but throughout Asia, to wane among a people whose unquestioned respect we enjoyed for many generations." We agree that the Chinese are a peculiar people. They appear to have no sense of gratitude as we generally interpret this virtue. They have apparently no strong sense of kindness. They certainly have little sympathy, and consequently almost deify strength, and rule all things on "face." And "Scrutator" is right when he says that we are guilty of malevolence towards the Chinese when we show any sign of weakness, or, put in another way, when we delay showing signs of strength. "So much loose thinking is done in this direction" (we quote from the article referred to) "and altruism is so much abused that certain foreign people imagine that they are doing China a distinct good by surrendering at every turn. But the Chinese true to tradition, merely has his tongue in his cheek, and smiles up his sleeve at the fool over the way who thinks he is doing so much good." These assertions are no doubt easily contradicted on individual cases, but of China officially they are undoubtedly true and it is with official China that the foreign Powers have to deal. Weakness towards that body brings its own reward—for foreigners and Chinese alike, as the bandit outrages show. If the Powers desire to show friendliness to the Chinese people they should begin by being less indolent towards the misdeeds of Chinese officials.

The Canton Volunteers

Thursday's telegram to the effect that Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Government were "sitting upon" a consignment of rifles and ammunition destined for the Canton Merchants' Volunteer Corps is decidedly interesting. The volunteers are said to have threatened a general strike if the arms are not given over to them and generally to be taking a high hand. We are bound to add that there is some uncertainty regarding the original telegram both in respect of the arms on board the str. Hav, and who they are for, while the ship herself has, we believe, been detained at Hongkong. But there appears no doubt that the Canton Merchants Volunteers are beginning to assert themselves. Their organization was started last autumn, as a means of protection against the ill-controlled soldiers of different districts and provinces whose presence in Canton was a burden to everybody. It boasted large numbers of men but insufficent weapons. Now, however the volunteers appear to be growing stronger and we are told to-day of their killing two soldiers who were trying to force shopkeepers to give them silver for worthless notes. Generally speaking the people of Canton are evidently growing restive under the exactions of the militarist party. We read of their storming a gaol in which two men had been locked up for declining to admit that their houses were government property, with such success that not only were the men released, but the obnoxious order was withdrawn. Signs of revolt against the intolerable misgovernment of China are still too few, but there are enough of them to be significant. One wonders what the Canton Volunteers think of the agitators who made the Shameen strike. If they have any sense, they should sit on them soon and heavily.

Protector of Frogs

It is most amazing how China concentrates on the small things and attends to them with complete thoroughness, yet invariably ignores big issues. One would have thought the Chief of Police in a great city like Nanking would have his hands sufficiently full directing new arrivals to the best hotel, telling impecunious people the right time, assisting small children and elderly ladies across busy thoroughfares, and, incidentally, occasionally catching a few robbers, opium smugglers, gun-runners and suchlike Yet he has taken upon himself the duties attaching to the extra office of Protector of the Frogs, as is shown by the following from the "Chinese Economic Bulletin":—

"Frogs are a table delicacy in South China and every summer large numbers are caught by farmers for the market. In view of the fact that frogs protect crops by destroying harmful insects, the police authorities in Nanking have prohibited the catching of frogs, which have now completely disappeared from the Nanking market. Nanking epicures will miss this delicacy for some time to come."

In the absence of Mr. Sowerby we are unable to establish definitely whether frogs do mount guard over growing crops and arrest and incarcerate harmful insects, but we do know that the frogs who reside in Shanghai create a most terrific din every night, and if these frogs are of the edible brand and if the Nanking frog-hong proprietors will come down here and gather them in, then we would say most willingly they can have them. Probably frogs do account for a fair number of insects, but a thousand times the number of frogs already domiciled in China would not make any appreciable difference in the myriads of insects of 10,000 varieties that infest this unhappy country. So far as is known, frogs in Shanghai are perfectly free to come and go as they please, in absolute safety, but the places where they dwell are just the spots where mosquitoes breed, and it has not been noticed that what should be the healthy natural increase in the vital statistics of the frog population has been coincident with a proportionate decrease of mosquitoes. If Nanking is anything like Shanghai, her police would be better employed exterminating mosquitoes than protecting frogs.

THE wedding Mr. M. Reader Harris and Miss Turner, daughter of Judge Sir Skinner and Lady Turner, will take place at Weihaiwei on September 24.

THE U. S. Consul-General at Shanghai has received a telegram from the Department of State notifying him that the following institutions have been approved by the Secretary of Labour for students going to the United States:—

Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N.J.; Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass.; Philadelphia College of Pharmacy and Science, Phila., Pa.; Boston University, Boston, Mass.; Washington Missionary College, Takoma Park, Maryland; West Virginia University, Morgantown, W.V.; Bliss Electrical School, Takoma Park, Maryland; Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y.; The Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial, 61 Broadway, N.Y.; The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.; International Education Board, 61 Broadway, N.Y.; Christian Brothers Academy, Albany, N.Y.; The John Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, Maryland; School for Nurses, Mount Holyoke College. South Hadley, Mass.

Student applicants intending to proceed to the approved institutions who have formerly submitted applications to the Department of State will receive visas immediately. Supplemental lists are expected periodically from the Department.

Those applying for immigration visas under the new law will be required to present a letter or other evidence from the institution which they intend to enter, showing that they will be admitted thereto, and also a medical certificate from a reputable physician known to the Consulate-General.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

CHINESE DREAMS OF RED HELP

To Drive Out the Foreigner and Cancel all Foreign Concessions

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

The Chinese now positively believe that the "Reds" will aid them in driving out the foreigner and demanding the return of all concessions now held by foreigners in China. This belief is based on the Reuter cable from Colombo last week wherein it was stated that a Russian vessel flying the "Red" flag was there and had as cargo over 10,000 tons of arms and ammunition.

Some months ago when the Bolshevik agents (Chinese) came to Shanghai, they stated among other things that the "Reds" were to aid the Chinese Government by giving them arms and ammunition and even assist with officers to teach the army of China. They said that it would be only a short time before it would be proved to the people of China that they meant just what they said. One student, in talking to the writer since the report from Colombo, said:—

"There, you can see that the Soviet government keeps her word and the foreigners will soon find that these arms are not for Vladivostok but for the Chinese. Why should Moscow ship arms and ammunition by steamer to Vladivostok, when they could be sent much more quickly and cheaply by the trains which are now running and the railroad is in good condition? By steamer is much slower and more expensive. But if the arms are for us they could be held on board and sent where wanted quickly. Dr. Sun and his crowd know that this is so, for see how they have changed during the past week. At one time they were very pro-Soviet but now it appears that they have become very much anti-Soviet. Doesn't this look as if he will need the assistance of the foreigner soon?"

The "Red" propagandists are using this Reuter's cable to prove that the Soviets are helping and if they will assist the Moscow Government then China will become a country free of all foreign influence and all concessions and extraterritorial rights will have to be given up by all foreigners as done by Germany and Russia.

From reports from Vladivostok it does not seem as if there were any scarcity of either arms or ammunition there and the "Red" army is said to be constantly drilling and keeping strictly up to date. There is even a large quantity of poison gas there according to reports and the army is being thoroughly drilled in its use. Aeroplanes they have in plenty and it is expected that there are a quantity of these in the vessel now on the way to Vladivostok.

A Chinese business man said to the writer:—

"Why should not the Russians help China? Russia is, like China, a country that the rest of the world wants to control; she, like China, is very rich in all that the world needs and the rest of the world wants to prevent Russia from expanding and keeping a republican government there, but the Soviets, unlike China, are very strong and no country could go there and defeat them. If the Chinese would only do as they have done, then we too could put a stop to other Powers keeping China in a continual turmoil as they have and are doing."

On being asked just how he expected the "Reds" to help he said, "China needs some government that has sufficient backbone to help her defy the Powers. If Russia will help China as she has stated through her representatives both at Peking and at Moscow, then how can the other countries do anything but return to China what they have stolen from her."

Anybody of course can show up the absurdity of this sort of wild talk. But the point is that this is what many Chinese are saying and what Bolshevik agents are persuading them to believe.

PAPER MONEY OF CANTON

Military Notes Called in and Burnt After Causing Four Deaths

FROM A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

Canton, Aug. 7.

Some $450,000 of the $500,000 worth of military notes issued by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's General Headquarters last Chinese New Year Eve have been called in during the last six months and were publicly destroyed on August 5 in the back yard of the Kuangtung Treasury Building. When these notes first appeared in Canton, the exchange shops refused to negotiate them and on one occasion just before Chinese New Year at Wing Hon Maloo, two of Dr. Sun's men were shot down by Merchants Volunteers, when the victims insisted on getting specie for the paper; and a few days later, Dr. Sun's men killed two persons in a shop on Yi Tak Maloo, when that shop failed to accept their paper money. It was subsequently decided that the $500,000 notes should be handed over to the merchants in Canton, through the General Chamber of Commerce, and that they might be legal tender for the payment of the property deeds inspection fee.

The appointment of Mr. T. W. Sun, salt inspector, as managing-director of the new Central Bank in Canton has been formally gazetted by the General Headquarters of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. The Central Bank will supersede all other government departments in the issue of paper money, it is understood. The paper money is in the denomination of $1, $5, $10, $100, and $500 of the usual banknote size and bears a picture of Dr. Sun on the centre.

Mr. Kwok Wei-mit, editor of the "Yin Chiang Pao," who was adjudged insane by the police a fortnight ago in Canton, has been discharged from the John G. Kerr Hospital for the Insane. To some Cantonese, the alleged insanity of Mr. Wei will not do the public any harm, as his comments, especially relating to certain actions of the so-called leaders in Canton, have not appeared to be those of an unsound mind.

Property Owners' Revolt

By 500 persons going into gaol at the arrest of one, the 600 or more property-owners of the 11 streets around Sup Sam Hong and Ching Yuen Kai in Canton succeeded, on August 4, in preventing Dr. Sun Yat-sen's agents from declaring their holdings government property and exacting funds for the support of mercenary troops. Several agents of Dr. Sun were to have taken possession of a number of houses there, when an occupant resisted was arrested and gaoled. Upon hearing of this, the owners of property at Sup Sam Hong and Ching Yuen Kai virtually stormed the gaol at the 9th Police district. Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps local headquarters were notified, but before they could do anything, the Kuangtung commissioner of finance, withdrew his claim that these 11 streets were once public property. On the government yielding to their contention, the residents and property owners affected rescued the arrested and saw him safely home.

The Tax on Matches

Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Department of Finance will not repeal the new stamp duty on matches, as has been petitioned by the manufacturers. Dr. Sun has instructed inspectors at Fatshan, Samshui, Kongmoon, Tsingyuen, and other districts vigorously to enforce the order. Each case of 120 packages of matches shall be stamped with a 60-cent stamp or heavily fined. Inspectors will be given no salary but 20 per cent. of the stamps they may dispose of, and upon fining offenders, one-half of the fines will go to them and to the policemen assisting in the arrest of persons selling unstamped matches.

S'hai Adventuresses in Manila: Only One Resident Falls for Their Charms

Further reports have reached Shanghai of the women who, upon their arrival here from America on May 17, registered at the Astor House and then proceeded to victimize some of Shanghai's prominent residents. Continuing their travels (some one in Shanghai was looking for them) to Manila upon what is believed to be a forged British passport, Mrs. and Miss McKiney, alias many other names, arrived there safely and proceeded to make themselves acquainted with leading Americans in the Philippines port.

It was a gala day in Manila and many of the population had gone to a resort near by, including Mrs. McKiney and daughter, when suddenly it began to rain and a general scattering ensued. Fortune favouring the pair, they hurried, according to the story, to a limousine and stepped inside as if they owned the vehicle. Imagine the surprise of the real owner, who returned in a short while to find his fair passengers comfortably ensconced therein, telling him that they believed his car to be a taxicab! The gentleman could scarcely refuse to offer to drive them back to the city, an invitation which, it is assumed, they more than gladly accepted. Greetings were exchanged and upon ascertaining his identity, the former temporary Shanghai residents exclaimed with joy. It was probably very real joy for them—for they have apparently not had much success in Manila. They knew very well, indeed, a friend of his in Cuba. The new friend being one of the leading tobacco men in the Islands, they thought it fairly sure he would have acquaintances in Cuba. Strangely they forgot for the moment the name of this gentleman's friend in Cuba, but promised to bring a letter of introduction from him to their new found companion at his office next day.

True to their promise, part of it at least, they went to the gentleman's office during the busiest part of the day, but they failed to bring the letter.

Remaining in the hotel, the women made several acquaintances but from all reports emanating from Manila it seems they did not have the success that attended their efforts in Shanghai. It came time for their departure for Singapore on a Saturday afternoon, and a gentleman in the hotel escorted them to the wharf in his car. Going on board the ship, the ladies, suddenly stricken by the loss of their tickets, became frantic and told their tale to their companion. Sympathetic, he attempted to help them to search for the missing papers, but they could not be found. As it was Saturday afternoon they could not go to the bank for more funds. What were they to do? The boat was due to leave shortly; surely something could be done.

"I know that you are good friends of Mr. ———, the tobacco manufacturer," continued their escort, "and I will gladly provide the passage money to Singapore. From there you can attend to the matter." He produced £66, the necessary amount for the two tickets, and the ladies wished him well. He has not seen them since nor heard of them. Mr.——really knew nothing about them.

Their next stop will presumably be Singapore?

REPRESENTATIVES of the Peking Garrison, Peking Gendarmerie, Metropolitan Police and the Governor of the Metropolitan Area held a meeting on Wednesday at which it was resolved that all unoccupied temples in the four suburbs outsides Peking City should be used places of refuge for flood sufferers requiring temporary housing. The Chihli flood Relief Commission has appealed to the Ministry of Communications to give employment whenever possible to men rendered destitute through the recent floods, the idea being that these men could be employed in railway construction work. Mr. Liu Meng-kung, Governor of the Metropolitan Area, has sent Mr. Han Juai-hsiang with 5,000 catties of bread to be distributed to flood sufferers in Kuangtupo, south of Marco Polo bridge.

BOXER INDEMNITY FIGHT

All Sorts of Views As to How the Money Should Be Spent: What Is Education?

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, July 17.

The Boxer Indemnity fight is still going on briskly. You will remember that when the Bill left Committee, the "purposes" originally in the measure had been altered to "educational and other purposes." There is a fierce onslaught now to limit the purposes still further and to cut out altogether "and other." The reason for this is of course that we all suspect that the money will be applied for purposes which do not meet with public approval over here, and frankly we mistrust our own Government. There is an alternative suggestion which one would like to take in the American phraseology and say "educational and cultural purposes." "Cultural" is a vague word which may mean anything or nothing, but it could not very well mean the construction of a railway or anything of that nature. Accordingly meetings are going on in the House almost every day, and the rival forces are marshalling their supporters for the debate which will take place when the Bill comes back to the House on the report stage and for its third reading.

You will also remember that the Statutory Advisory Committee was fixed at 10, and an effort may be made to extend its numbers to 12. The Committee is complete and I know all the members with the exception of one. They are:—

Lord Phillimore, Chairman.
Sir John Jordan.
Sir Charles Addis.
Sir William Clarke.
Mr. Herbert Fisher.
Mr. Bertrand Russell.
Mr. Lowes Dickinson.

Committee to Visit China.

I also know the name of the Chinese representative, if he accepts the offer made to him, though this is not certain. He is not one of the men in the public eye in Chinese life but is connected, so I understand, with patent law. He may not, however, care to accept the post since it requires residence in this country, and the salary attached, £2,000 a year and allowances, may not tempt him. He is apparently the only paid member of the Committee, though when the Committee visits China, as it will do, in the coming winter to take evidence, its expenses too will come out of the Boxer Indemnity Fund. It seems, therefore, to me that the charges upon the fund will be rather high. Not all the members of the Committee will want to go to China. There is no reason why Sir John Jordan, Sir Charles Addis or Sir William Clark should go, but probably the others will.

As the Committee stands, it does not speak for, what one may call, General Education, since Mr. Bertrand Russell's idea of assisting education is merely to benefit the higher education at the Universities. Nor does it touch medicine.

There are singularly few schemes of a concrete nature now in the field, and the Technical Textile Scheme School at Shanghai is probably the only one which is being well-worked out. It is also apparently the only one which is prepared, in return for assistance, to guarantee some sort of equivalent financial response by those who are thus assisted.

Most other would-be recipients are merely "going round with the hat." It seems the depth of bathos to have the authorities of the Victoria University at Hongkong trying to secure assistance for their undertaking on the ground that the British residents in the Far East have all stopped their subscriptions because they say the State is going to put up the necessary sum of money to carry the work on. I do not wish to be brutal, but our idea of using the Boxer money is not to save the British in the Far East any personal effort in the direction of charitable, educational or philanthropic work! Probably the Commissioners will take into consideration the great principle of "helping those who are ready to help themselves."

Violent Squabbling.

Those who think that this whole controversy is a pleasant smooth working one, make a great mistake. I never came across one with so many cross-currents, or with so many people waiting to pole-axe everybody else. It is only when you get behind the scenes that you appreciate that on Chinese matters, at all events, there are the most violent antagonisms, partly of a personal nature, and partly on broad questions of principle.

SAGHALIEN, SOVIET AND JAPAN

Possession of the Island the Great Issue in Russo-Japanese Discussions

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug. 7.

Mr. Yoshizawa is once again closeted with Mr. Karakhan, and so far the only information one can gather on the Japanese Minister's new brief is that the Saghalien issue forms the uppermost layer. In this respect, of course, it differs no whit from the old brief, but diplomacy has progressed up to the point where it can be recognized in its rightful place. On the question of the Sinclair contract, a discreet silence is maintained in both camps; but, nevertheless, it is the thorn in the side of Japan, and probably of Russia.

Little progress is expected as a result of the renewal of the negotiations, at least for some time to come. In addition to the conflicting opinions on the settlement of the Saghalien issue, a delay is presaged by the possibility of an open rupture in the negotiations between Great Britain and Russia. The uncertainty in London will undoubtedly have a repercussion on the conversations in Peking (it is said, also on the Mukden discussions) and if no agreement is reached, Japan might again take the opportunity of staving off the task of coming to terms with the Soviet. At all events, the situation is being very closely watched, and was, doubtless, the reason for Mr. Yoshizawa's visit to Saghalien.

Japan will be in no hurry to settle its affairs with Russia if Britain does not come to any agreement, and if, despite this rebuff, Moscow does not alter its tone; for it knows that in the event of a breakdown in London, the Soviet's international stock would suffer a setback which would have a reaction on all countries now contemplating the re-establishment of relations. This would therefore mean a breach in Moscow's bargaining position vis-à-vis of Japan, which, when Soviet prospects in London were bright, was particularly strong. Whether under the shadow of a breakdown in London, Moscow considers it advisable to meet Japan on the Saghalien issue, is another question. Not many people think that Moscow will change its uncompromising stand.

CAPTURED OFFICERS OF THE YIHYANG MARU

Still in Durance in Kueichow

Peking, Aug. 7.

Accompanied by a representative of the Nissin Kisen Kaisha, the Japanese Vice-Consul at Chungking reached Changteh on August 3 on his mission to bring about the release of the two captured officers of the Yihyang Maru. Arrangements had been made for the local military authorities to furnish an escort to Kueichow, where the captives are, but the Vice-Consul was advised to postpone his departure up the river in view of a telegram from the Defence Commissioner at Chengchow stating that a day or two previously Generals Tan Hsi-mou and Tsi Chu-yu had begun to invade Hunan. It was stated that fighting was going on in the border districts of Feng Huan and Ma Yu.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Aug. 5.—The Waichiaopu has issued a Ministerial Order appointing Mr. Chang Hao-ching as Chancellor of the Consulate-General at Ottawa, Canada.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LOST TRIBES OF CHINA

Strange People of Remote Kansu

Kansu, a remote portion of Chinese territory lying between the Tibetan and Mongolian borders, though the home of millions of people, is as yet as little known to the Western World, probably, as any district remaining on the planet. Hither news of the great Great World War did not come until the Armistice was more than three years old. The province—as large as England, and inhabited by some eight million people—contains among its teeming population Chinese blondes and women who support the men of their tribe. For enlightenment respecting this remote corner of the earth we are indebted to an American expedition headed by Mr. Frederick R. Wulsin, which departed with a string of 27 camels into almost unknown regions of Southern Mongolia, in March, 1923.

A Mythical Monkey.

The expedition was directed by the American Geographical Society, "to search for human traces of East Asia's history before the Chinese came, to hunt for specimens of a monkey believed to be the largest non-athropoid species in the world, and to collect botanical specimens in a spacious region virgin to scientific research."

The monkey in question is scientifically termed the Rhinopithecus brelichi, and the only evidence so far available is the skin of a female, showing a head and body measurement of 29 inches and a tail measurement of 39 inches. The animal is thus one of the very largest of the non-anthropological monkeys, but its actual existence seems as yet to be by no means well established.

Toilsome Journey.

Mr. Wulsin's preliminary report to the National Geographical Society states that at San Chow, capital of Kansu, he met a white man, a Belgian missionary, who had come into that strange land a score of years ago. The Belgian was Father Leon Van Dyke, a descendant, it was said, of the immortal artist of that name. San Chow is 600 miles from a railroad, and is reached by a highway, the sand in which is so deep that at times it required as much as 18 hours to negotiate 15 miles. At the time the report was written the expedition had reached the banks of Lake Koko-Nor, on the borders of which most of the unknown tribes live. This lake is on the Tibetan border.

Chinese with Yellow Hair.

The Wulsin report tells of the meeting with "strange people, the lost tribes of early Asiatic mignations," found in unmapped parts of Kansu, and among these folk he found "blonde Chinese with curly, yellow hair." Mr. Wulsin refers to the infant son of the Regent of Alashan, a practically unknown kingdom on the Mongol border almost directly north of San Chow.

"The infant son of the Regent of Alashan has blonde hair and a white skin," Mr. Wulsin wrote. "His official father looks like a Chinese gentleman, with an unusually aquiline nose, black hair and a yellow skin. The son must be a Russian baby. We know that that particular family has a good deal of Manchu blood in it; from the appearance of this youngster it is probable that there is Russian blood also.

The "Earth Men."

The "To-runs" are, Mr. Wulsin reports, the most interesting of all these strange groups from the standpoint of racial history. The name is the Chinese expression for "earth men," which is taken to mean aborigines or natives. These people flee from a camera as they would from a rifle; they seem to keep no track of their age, the women frequently have woodcutters' hatchets thrust in their girdles, and their most cherished articles of adornment are earrings and a peculiar "head harness."

"I was informed," Mr. Wulsin says, "that unmarried girls wear from 20 to 30 braids which hang loose all around; married women do their hair in a knot at the back of the head, covered with a little brass cap which is held in place by a harness of red or black cloth. What front and side hair is not caught in the knot hangs loose over the cheeks and shoulders."

Idle Menfolk.

Speaking of the women of the Kansu Tibetans, Mr. Wulsin says: "The women seem to do all the work. The men are idle at home. In one place we visited the whole house seemed living because of our hostess, who was always on the run, smiling; first upstairs for fuel, then downstairs for cooking, to the valley for water, and upstairs once more to watch us. She nursed her baby in spare moments. Her husband seemed merely a very idle boarder.

"Monogamy is the nomad custom, but married people can separate at will. Some women prefer not to marry. Marriage means "looking after a husband." Mr. Wulsin will remain a year in this remote region.

SUMMER NOTES FROM TSINGTAO

Changes on the Kiao-Tsi Railway: Many Visitors and Attractions

Tsingtao, Aug. 4.

Kiao-Tsi railway circles here have been profoundly stirred by the transfer of Mr. F. S. Sah, Chief Engineer, and Mr. Si, Chief of the Material Department, to the Ministry of Communications. Both are returned students and generally regarded as efficient and trustworthy officials. Their transfer follows close on the heels of that of Mr. T. C. Chu, former Associate Managing-Director, also a returned student and considered, with Mr Sah and Mr. Si, an official of the modern, progressive type.

There was much dissatisfaction with the order transferring these officials, who were popular with their men.

The French cruiser Jules Ferry is in port and Rear-Admiral Frochot, his staff and the ship's officers have been entertained by Governor Kao En-hung. The Tupan gave a dinner party on Thursday evening.

An opinion was sought from Admiral Frochot over the disposition of France's share of the Boxer Indenmnity Fund. The Admiral said that he was of the opinion France would follow the lead of the United States and return such funds for educational purposes once France's economic problem permitted her to take such a step.

Series of Entertainments.

Band concerts at Strand Beach again have become a regular feature of the summer season, after a lapse of 10 years, or ever since the Japanese took over the Kiaochou territory. In the years of German rule these concerts were an attractive feature. The Naval band started a series of concerts on Wednesday and will play twice a week during the remainder of the summer season.

Summer guests continue to arrive here from Shanghai, Hongkong, Hankow, Peking and other points. There was some doubt as to Tsingtao's drawing power at the beginning of the season, but now all this has been dispelled. The present year stamps Tsingtao as one of the premier summer resorts in the Far East.

The second race meeting of the present season will be held next Sunday. Eleven races are on the programme and a fine card is assured. The first meeting proved very popular and the next one is expected to exert an even greater appeal. Ponies from all over China are arriving to participate and there are scores of local entries.

Champions Winner Sold.

The winner of the Champions' Race in the last meeting, Oliver Twist, the swift Shanghai pony, has been sold by the Powhattan stable to Mr. Allan Mackay, the well-known Tientsin business man and horseman, who rode many winning mounts at the July meeting here. The price was said to be in the neighbourhood of $1,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SERIOUS THUNDERSTORM NEAR MANILA

Dynamite Storehouse Struck by Lightning

Manila, Aug. 11.

Lightning struck the Government dynamite storehouse on Talem Island, 30 miles from Manila, on Sunday evening. Two constabulary guards were killed and several children wounded.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE DEADLOCK IN CANTON

Propaganda by Communist Leaders but Strikers Short of Food

From a Chinese Correspondent.

Canton, Aug. 6.

The situation of the Shameen strike has not changed much the last day or two, and the committee in charge is soliciting the aid of the students for its publicity campaign for a "boycott" of Shameen. The committee asserts that the strikers will be able to hold out longer, as the public is not failing them in its contribution of financial support. It alleges that its daily receipts are $1,000 against expenditure of $400. This is simply propaganda and probably a pure invention. The actual strikers complain that they have not been able to get the meals promised them.

Cantonese as a whole are not anti-foreign, and Chinese I have talked to say that the difficulty in Shameen could have been removed long ago, if the few Chinese merchants who were having informal conversations with leading members of the British Municipal Council regarding the revision of the traffic and police regulation in the foreign concession had been permitted to continue their work without threat from those desiring to have a finger in the pie.

The political party behind the Canton régime is also behind this strike movement, directed at present by leaders who are also delegates to the labour conference of the Kuomintang Political Party, of which Dr. Sun Yat-sen is the head and a Russian, M. Borodin, an adviser. The publicity work for the strikers, as far as English publication in Canton is concerned, is directed by a secretary in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Canton with assistance from one who has done no little propaganda for his chief, whose private secretary he is still.

The stevedores of Canton, in their sympathetic strike with the Chinese employees of Shameen, leaving the large foreign godowns in Canton without workers, are really hurting their own provincials more than the foreign merchants. The rice guilds of Canton have large quantities of goods consigned to them stored in foreign godowns and are quite unable to get possession of them, much as they need them. Their appeals to the strike leaders for special arrangements have so far brought no relief.

A movement is now on foot in official circles to levy a special tax on foreign goods. The Canton officials advance as their reason that such a tax will promote home industries, discourage import, and provide additional income to the Government.

CHEFOO TELEPHONE ADMINISTRATION

Proposed Employment of Girl Operators: The Need for Renovation

Chefoo, Aug. 7.

The Texas Oil Company were the consignors of a considerable cargo of oil which was entirely lost in transit by junk off the coast near Shihtao. The junk foundered in a storm.

The Supervisor of the Chefoo Telephone Administration is negotiating with the Ministry of Communications for the renovation of the Chefoo telephones. It is expected that the present exchange operators will be replaced by Chinese girls especially trained for this work. The Chinese Telephone Administration at Tsingtao have employed women operators with considerable success and the Chefoo Supervisor is desirous of carrying out the venture here.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hankow, Aug. 7.—General Chi Hsieh-yuan, Tuchun of Kiangsu, has despatched here his representative to confer with General Hsiao Yao-nan, Tuchun of Hupeh, upon the question of the reported organization by General Lu Yung-hsiang, of Chêkiang, of forces for the defence of the borders of that province. —Eastern News Agency.

A FLOOD CAUSED BY "BAD GOVERNMENT"

Wuchang Indignant at Employment of Dishonest Contractor

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, Aug. 1.

One of the most important embankments near Wuchang which has given way during the recent rains is the one which bounds the so-called Northwest Lake. This embankment gave way on July 25, letting in the flood water upon a considerable area and rendering a good many people homeless. Three days after the disaster, the leading shopkeepers and residents of the quarter held a meeting in the club-room of an association formed some months ago by them to discuss what measures could be taken to deal with the situation.

The meeting took upon itself partly the complexion of an indignation meeting, the indignation being directed against those whose carelessness or neglect had been responsible for the flood. Several fiery speeches were made, and it was pointed out by one speaker that their anger should be directed, not so much against the workmen who constructed and repaired the embankment (to which I referred last week) as against the officials who were responsible for seeing that the work was properly carried out. It was proposed that a memorial stone should be erected at the spot where the embankment broke, and that it should be called the "Stone of Evil Government." (惡政碑).

Some less hot-headed spirits rather fought shy of such a direct accusation against the powers-that-be, and tried to keep the character "cheng" (政) or the word "government" out of the inscription. They were, however, over-ruled.

The meeting lasted some three or four hours, and in the end two resolutions were passed. The first was to request the officials to make certain persons directly responsible for the proper construction and repair of embankments. The second was to have the stone erected with the inscription as proposed.

Proceedings Against Contractor.

The embankment was originally an earthen one, but last year it was repaired and strengthened with masonry, at a large cost of 225,000 strings of cash, or over $11,000. Before the work was finished, there were complaints that it was being badly done. A lawsuit has now been begun in civil yamên, accusing the overseer, Ch'en Chi-liang, and the contractor, Hu Hsien-ling, of mishandling the money and defrauding the public, as well as causing great misery and loss of life. Fifteen leading citizens of the district have signed their names to the petition, the first being Fu Yi-fu. The latter is he who made the speech above referred to urging the erection of the memorial stone.

Governor Hsiao is making a name for himself as the charitable Tuchun. He has not only shown himself specially interested in the measures taken for flood relief, but it is estimated that already 21,000 strings have already been granted from the yamên for needy cases. The sum was given out in doles of from ten to several tens of strings of cash, according to the urgency of the case. A list has been made of those to whom monthly doles will be given in future. In response to a request for aid from his brother, Tuchun of Hunan, Marshal Hsiao has sent 5,000 bags of flour and 20 piculs of bread to Changsha by rail, to be distributed for relief in the neighbouring provinces. As Inspector-General of "the Hu's" Governor Hsiao recognizes his responsibility for both provinces.

Yellow Crane Tower to Be Rebuilt.

In spite of more urgent affairs which claim immediate attention, the re-building of the Yellow Crane Tower has not been forgotten. When the picturesque old pagoda-shaped Yellow Crane Tower was burned down, Chang Chih-tung replaced it by the unsightly red brick structure, shaped like a church with a steeple, that now stands over the Hanyang Gate. The new plan is to replace the present tea shop by a tower built in the old style, and thus restore one of the former glories of Wuchang. The scheme will be an expensive one, and in order to set it going, a feast was given at the yamên last week, to which leading officials, merchants and scholars of Hankow and Wuchang were invited. A total of 94 guests were present. The Governor himself opened the subscription list with a promise of $3,000. Various other promises were made, ranging from $200 to $2,000, and the noble sum of over $80,000 was raised altogether, which will be quite sufficient to set the work in hand.

FLOODS IN FOUR PROVINCES

Situation Growing Graver Daily: Urgent Relief Measures Called For

Reports arriving from all parts of Chihli, Honan, Hunan and Kuangtung provinces indicate that the flood situation is more serious than was at first realized. Great efforts (says the latest Flood Relief Commission bulletin) are being made to awaken the Chinese public as to the necessity for concerted action, and it is to be hoped that they will give their best support to the activities of the Chinese Red Cross and the China International Famine Relief Commission, both of which are organizing to cope with the possibility of widespread famine in the provinces referred to during the winter months. The China International Famine Relief Commission is receiving daily reports from sources all over the afflicted areas. They have invited Mr. Lawrence Impey, whom many will remember as late engineer to the American Red Cross China Famine Relief and to the China International Famine Relief Commission, to act as Director of Publicity and Statistics, and it is felt that this department will be able to render a great service to the famine sufferers and to the general public in the present emergency.

The following reports as to flood conditions have been received by the Commission for the period August 5-6.

Ching Fung Hsien.—Reports from here indicate continuous rain since the beginning of July, with the result that the rivers in the north-western part of the hsien have broken their dykes in many places. Eight villages are said to be submerged, and five feet of water is covering the fields, all the crops and many buildings being destroyed.

Wanhsien.—Ten days rain here has resulted in a flood at least two feet deep, the damage to the whole hsien being estimated at over $100,000.

Shaho.—Has had ten days steady rain, the water pouring down from the mountains to the east, with the result that many villages are submerged and farms and houses washed away.

Hantan.—Thirty hours' continuous rain caused the rivers to rise very rapidly, particularly the Fu Sin Ho. To the northeast of the hsien floods are serious, and a break 300 feet long has occurred in one dyke, with some 60 villages reported as under water. The weather is now clearing, however, and the water is subsiding, so that it is to be hoped that results will not be so serious as at first was feared.

Yang Yuan.—Has had heavy rains, flood.

Tsing Hai.—Through the breaking of the Chung Ting Ho about 10 villages on the western bank of the Tsu Ya Ho have been submerged.

Fung Jun.—On July 17-18 there was heavy rain and the rivers rose very rapidly. The eastern dyke of the Wei Hsiang Ho was broken and about 34 villages were submerged, many farms and houses being washed away. Some 23,000 people are reported to be affected.

Yungtingho—Another Break.

Heavy rains on August 2-3 resulted in a sudden rise in the river, with the result that the south dyke broke again, and many people are reported drowned.

Hankow, Aug. 7.—Mr. Wu Ai-chen, newly appointed Commissioner of Foreign Affairs of Hupeh, arrived here to-day and immediately took over his business.—Eastern News Agency.

ONLY NORTH HONAN FLOODED

Fear That Yellow River Would Overflow Passed: Continuous Rain all Over Province

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., Aug. 2.

About the middle of the second week of July rain feel in torrents for three days. Kaifeng was one great lake. Water from one to three feet in depth covered the streets. Hundreds of the homes of the poor crashed and the fences throughout the various suburbs were levelled with the ground. Stories came in from the outside world, that similar conditions prevailed in many places. Letters from Kueiteh said that a river from the northwest running southeast had crossed the big famine road, a mile north of the city. This was where no river had been before. Passengers from here to Peking had to break their journey north of Changteh on account of the washing away of the railway bridges in Linchang county. Fears were freely expressed that the Yellow River would break is banks and inundate the country. It was written from Kweiteh that it was Yellow River water.

Flood Fears not Realized

The rain continues by moderately and according to expectation. The fear that after the continued drought the excessive rain would continue and complete the ruin that the drought had begun, has not at all been realized. In some of the lower areas of the province, especially north of the Yellow River, and along the Wei River Valley there are flooded lands. Similar conditions prevail between Si Ping Hsien and Yencheng city and just above the Loh river north of Yencheng. But, as a whole, there is no evil result from the rains more than the mere discomfort. The Honan fields never looked better at this time of the year than they do at the very present time. So far from the Yellow River making any threats, at present there is no great volume of water passing down its channel. This will probably mean that there is still a drought in Shensi. The Loh River at Yuencheng is on the contrary very full, its muddy waters lapping the rails of the great iron bridge of the Chin-Han Railway. This water is from the Hills in the western part of the province, those hills that have harboured the Honan bandit hordes during the past few years.

At present the great fear of ruined crops and the consequent horror of famine has gone, and the whole community is sending up prayers of thanksgiving, either audibly or by shining and grateful faces.

Only N. Honan Affected.

The Civil Governor of the Province has made representations to Peking respecting the need of relief in the north of the province. Saving in isolated places there will be little need to make provision for relief in other parts of the province. The Famine Relief Association for the province, in answer to the appeal of the Commission, has addressed communications to the Marshal of the three provinces and to the Civil Governor of Honan at Loyang, asking for the privilege of soliciting offerings for this purpose.

I reported some months ago that the foreign engineer of the Commission had made special recommendations respecting the survey of the Yellow River. The Honan Committee was prepared to spend some 14 or 15 thousand dollars on this survey, with the prospect of carrying through extended work on the river bed that would reclaim some 40,000,000 mow of land, and make practically impossible any overflow of the river. The Association has not yet received permission to make the preliminary survey. The day may come when this obstructive policy will be bitterly regretted.

Little Known Summer Resort.

I have just spent a few days on Kikungshan, in the south of this province. The Rooster Mountain stands on the borders of Honan and Hupeh. I have visited several of the leading summer resorts in China, and I must confess that the Honan Resort seems to me to have many advantages over the other inland resorts. It is so accessible from both south and north that in a few hours one can be on the hilltop from Hankow, and within 24 hours the farthest distant resident in Honan, north, west or east can be in his bungalow on the Hills. Hsien Tien the station for this resort is on the Chin-Han line. It is between six and seven hundred feet above sea level, and without bother of any kind, the traveller gets into a waiting sedan chair and for about $1 he and his belongings are taken up the hill. From the station to the community centre the climb is about 1,800 feet, which over good roads maintained by the local Chinese administration, the traveller, may, if he wishes, walk in about the same time as the coolies that would otherwise carry his chair. There is a transport company in the station precincts past whose door all baggage has to go, and which is made responsible for the safe delivery of all that leaves the station. It needs but to know the number of the cottage and the marks of the baggage, and nothing goes amiss.

Unlike Kuling, which is in an easy valley surrounded by the riders, the Kikunghan resort is on the tops of the ridges. Thus it happens that there is scarcely a cottage that does not command a good view over one of the various valleys.

Like Kuling, Kikungshan is becoming an all-the-year-round centre. There are now two big schools there—the American School, owned and operated by the United Lutheran Missions and the Swedish School, in which Swedish is taught.

The new assembly hall which was used for the first time last summer, has been considerably improved during the winter by the expenditure of another $1,500.

Gen. Chin Yun-ngoh, who has his headquarters at Sinyangchow, an hour north of Hsin Tien station, has maintained, for several years now, a large company of his troops on the Hilltop. These men are well trained and vigilant, and from their outports along the lines of approach, telephone connexion keeps headquarters always advised of any possible danger to the community. Gen. Chin himself is now interested in the fortunes of the community, for he has a fine imposing house under construction for his own use. Already a number of good houses have been erected for his officers and men. He has blasted a good drill ground for the men out of a hillside, where they get their regular training. He has likewise opened a day school for the training of the children of his men.

CUSTOMS SURTAX FOR FLOODS

Diplomatic Body Not Unwilling: Further Taxes on Railways And Other Revenue

Peking, Aug. 9.

The proposal for a Customs surcharge for flood relief was considered by the Cabinet yesterday. The Minister of Finance, explaining his intention to impose the surtax on lines similar to the 1920-21 surtax, said that the actual surtax would be an additional half per cent. duty for a period of six months. The surtax would also apply to the inland Customs, the Tientsin-Pukou freight tax station and other tax offices.

With regard to the attitude of the Diplomatic Corps, it appears that Dr. Schurman, the American Minister, was informally approached on the subject last week. Subsequently he discussed the matter informally with his colleagues. It is understood that no one particularly objected and it was decided that in the event of a formal request from the Chinese Government the matter would be referred to the Home Governments.

Aug. 6.

A Mandate was issued last night appointing Mr. Kao Ling-wei Tupan of Flood Relief affairs. It is understood that Mr. Kao has suggested the appointment of Mr. Cheng Keh, Minister for the Interior, as Associate Director of Flood Relief.

Another Mandate instructs the Ministries of Finance and the Interior to raise the necessary funds for extending relief work to Hupeh, Szechuan, Chahar and Suiyuan, which are now reported to have been affected by the floods. A personal appeal on behalf of the people of Chahar was made by Gen. Tun-Ching-lin, Associate Director of Military Affairs for the area, who arrived here yesterday and interviewed the President during the afternoon.

Nanyuan Flooded.

Aug. 7.

The Yung Ting Ho overflowed its banks near Marco Polo bridge this morning and parts of Nanyuan were flooded. Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang sent a detachment of pioneers to build up the dykes.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FLOODS REACH TIENTSIN WEST

Tientsin, Aug. 5.

Those who scoffed at the flood "scare" will now find it difficult to justify their attitude says the "Peking and Tientsin Times." The floods are now as close to Tientsin as Tientsin West, and frantic efforts are being made, by means of temporary emergency dykes, to prevent them from spreading right round the North suburbs of the City. The water in the Grand Canal is rising rapidly, as was only to be expected after the Hsi Ho had breached its dykes.

The output of the Haiho continues slowly to decrease. The following are figures, those of the previous day being given for purposes of comparison:

August 4.	August 5.
High Water .....a.m. 14.5 ft.	a.m. 15 ft.
Low Water .....p.md. 13.3 ft.	p.m. —
Max. Velocity .....5.08 ft. per second	4.80 ft. per second
Mean Velocity ....4.57 „ „	4.55 „ „
Max. Output ....42.189 c. ft. per second	38,322 c. ft. per second
Min. Output.....38.594 „ „	34,906 „ „

It is estimated that something like 45,000,000 cub. metres of silt passed through Tientsin in July. Most of it was in suspension, and the silting up of the fairway, therefore, was not serious. It is fortunate for Tientsin that comparatively little of the Hunho water is finding its way out through the Haiho.

The menace to Tientsin will remain until the flood waters have found an alternative route to the sea. This it is hoped that they will do, in the course of the next few days, more or less along the route which the experts urged should be prepared for them, by cutting dykes and embankments, three weeks ago.

Peking City Walls To Be Repaired.

The heavy and incessant rains have again brought forward the need of repairing the gates of the city walls. Sometime ago $30,000 was requested by the Ministry of the Interior for this purpose but nothing has yet been received.

It is now necessary to tear down some of the gates and to repair those which are in a safe condition and attempts are being made to press the urgency of the matter on the government.

Soldiers at Work on Dykes

Great praise is being lavished on the soldiers of Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang who have been working day and night on the dykes which hold back the flooded waters of the Yung Ting Ho and the Grand Canal, says an agency message.

Close to four thousand flood victims are estimated to have come into Peking by way of the Peking Suiyuan Railway. While many of the refugees found shelter in the homes of friends, others are compelled to sleep out in the open. To alleviate that condition, shelters are being erected outside several of the city gates.

Railway Traffic Held Up

The Peking-Hankow Railway Administration announced this afternoon that it was still impossible to handle through traffic on that line, although it had been hoped that a start might be made to-day.

The engineering department is unable to give a definite date when the train service direct from Peking to Hankow will be resumed.

Peking was treated to another half inch of rain during the morning. Beginning at two a.m. by eight o'clock a little more than 10 m.m. or a half inch fell.

MOUNTAIN CHARMS OF SZECHUAN

Summer Resorts with All the Giants of Tibet Spread out to Behold

From Our Own Correspondent.

Chengtu, Sze., July 24.

The summer resorts around the Capital are all flourishing this year. Mount Omei has the largest number of residents and we hear the bungalows are all occupied. The seven tennis courts are kept on the go. Kwanhsien, only a day from Chêngtu, is perhaps the most popular because so easy of access, and also the jumping-off place for trips into the Tribes Country. The bungalows are all full, and the temple rooms modernized by the gentry for the use of foreigners are well patronized this year. Behluhdin the youngest of the resorts, is the highest and most picturesque! This year's wonderful weather has been uncommonly good for sight-seeing. The panorama of Tibetan snow mountains over 20 and 25 thousand feet high is a continual soul feast. The elevation of 6,000 feet renders this resort the most attractive from the standpoint of real ozone. All the bungalows are full and three more in process of construction. Some of our citizens have gone to Douglas Heights, the favourite rendezvous of the people from Tzliutsing and Yuinhsien. From all centres comes word of the best summer ever known on the mountains. Usually July with us is a very rainy month, but this year we had torrential downpours in May and June so July at the resorts is unusually fine.

In spite of the numbers at the resorts, Chêngtu has more people staying at home than ever before. Many from the city are using the large brick homes of the University Campus, and because of the lack of rain tennis is in full swing. Many of the city folk go out late in the afternoon and enjoy tennis and swimming at the University. Our population of recent years has increased so much from a foreign standpoint that very soon adequate measures will have to be taken for securing more commodious summer resorts. The building of the motor road from Chêngtu to Kwanhsien will probably make Kwanhsien the favourite, but it means that other hilltops will be secured and resorts carved out.

Summer Schools.

At the Union University three short courses by the way of Summer Schools are in operation and are well attended. The Summer Normal Course claims about 50 students men and women who are thoroughly enjoying the attempt at co-education. It seems to be working quite smoothly and satisfactory. Miss Brethorst, M.A., of the M.E.M. and Miss Cowan are the chaperones and seem well pleased with the beginnings of what promises to be a movement of far reaching importance in the West. The Summer Course of Religious Education was carried on for only a week, but proved an unqualified success. Students men and women were enrolled from city schools and churches and united in the various courses given. Miss Harriett Smith and Miss Ruth Fraser, secretaries of the Y.W.C.A. were responsible for the Women's work, and the girls from the city schools were housed in the commodious dormitory of the American Baptist Vandeman Hall. The third school was the University Extension Summer School when several options were open to intending students. This is the first year such a school has been opened, and the splendid success of the venture commenced by H. G. Brown, M.A., and Robt. Simkin, M.A., means that the summer Extension courses have come to stay.

Physical Training.

One of the most attractive courses was the Physical Education Course participated in by over 20 keen students Mr. Lu of the Provincial Normal School comes out daily to teach Physical Education, theoretical and practical. The Y.M.C.A. are helping in the teaching of swimming and boxing. The Campus presents quite a live appearance this summer with somewhere in the neighbourhood of 150 students taking the various courses. Popular lectures are spread throughout the course that attract others for night sessions, for instance last night a very fine lantern lecture was given by Professor Lee Hen , B.A., on Astronomy. The sky was exceptionally clear and he was able to point out and explain the rings of Saturn.

In the city the Y.M.C.A. have concluded a successful Student Summer Conference, and now the Mass Education Movement with 10,000 students enrolled is attracting attention.

PEACE ON UPPER RIVER

Lull in Sniping and Wood Oil Transhipped with Incident: No Floods

From Our Own Correspondent.

Ichang, Aug. 6.

Ichang has been fortunate enough to escape the floods which have been so common further down the Yangtze Valley. So far the river has not touched the 40-foot mark, and it has about ten more feet to rise before it can cause any trouble here. We have, however, had our share of rain. During the past month it has rained almost every day. Country people were beginning to despair of getting their rice to ripen. Now, however, we are having abundant sunshine which if, it will only continue for a couple of weeks will ensure a good rice crop.

The river being so low has meant easy and rapid trips for the Gorge steamers. One is making the round trip in a little less than five days, and she, the largest of them, the Wanhsien, is upholding the name of Yarrow in these parts. Freights are low, however, and there is not too much cargo offering.

The question of carrying wood oil down from Wanhsien seems to be settled at last as lots of it is to be seen being trans-shipped here; in fact two steamers made special trips to Wanhsien for it. From all one hears the steamers are for the time being at least free from the promiscuous sniping from the shore which formerly was so common.

DESERTED HUSBAND AND CHILDREN

Tientsin, Aug. 9.

At H. M. Provincial Court to-day, Judge Grain heard a suit by Frederick A. Fairchild for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against his wife, Ethel Mary Fairchild. Respondent did not appear and was unrepresented.

Mr. P. H. B. Kent, for petitioner, said the parties were married at Walthamstow, Essex, on January 6, 1913, respondent's maiden name being Harris. There were four children, of whom three were now living, born respectively in 1915, 1916 and 1921. The first child, born in January, 1914, died in June. In October, 1923, the respondent refused cohabitation, and still refused.

Mr. Fairchild was called and stated that he had begged his wife to return. She was now staying at the Astor House Hotel and had intimated her intention to leave China. She wrote asking him to divorce her, as she had decided to leave him. She wrote that she was sorry for any unhappiness she had caused him and hoped that later on he would find a wife who would restore his happiness.

Petitioner replied appealing to his wife for the sake of the children. She wrote back saying she was sure the children would be well looked after by him, and that she was sorry, but could not continue as his wife.

Mr. Kent said she had been duly served by Mr. McVeagh, the Consular constable, at the Astor House.

The Judge granted the application and made an order for restitution. — "North-China Sunday Times."

STRIKE PICKETS AT SHAMEEN

Impudent Attitude: Lung Shan's Treasure Held Up

Two very interesting stories showing the impudent and defiant attitude of the Shameen strike pickets on the Bund at Canton are related. One day last week a number of coolies were engaged in carrying specie—or ship's treasure as mariners prefer to call it—from one of the Canton banks to the Lung Shan. The coolies were allowed to proceeded to within a few hundred yards of the boat when they were set upon by the strike picket and very roughly handled. The coolies were forced to dump the treasure on the Bund and leave it there unattended. Their hands were tied with rope and large placards with Chinese characters written thereon were placed round their necks. They were then marched through the streets, presumably as a warning to others.

Members of the Compradore's staff of the Lung Shan were despatched in all haste to the spot where the treasure was left on the Bund and at grave risk of assault they succeeded in rescuing the boxes.

Another incident, which was even more impudent than the one related, has to do with the Fatshan. Shortly after the arrival of this steamer in Canton one day last week, Customs Officers came on board with the object of looking for a small quantity of smuggled salt in the firemen's quarters. Whilst they were searching a detachment of the strike picket came along and with great audacity ordered the Customs Officials to stop the search, stating that they were not permitted to search without the sanction of the No. 1 firemen. Naturally the Customs officers took no notice of the strike picket and found what they were seeking.—"Hongkong Daily Press."

ARMS SMUGGLING AT TSINGTAO

Absurdity of Sentences Passed in Some Courts: Japanese in Need of Reform

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Aug. 9.

The police made another haul of arms, ammunition and opium the other day, apprehending a smuggler who was about to transport the contraband to Kiaohsien. The police acted on a tip from the authorities at Kiaohsien and followed the movements of the smuggler until he was arrested on suspicion and the articles were found in his luggage. Two pistols were discovered in a biscuit can, 1,400 bullets in a soap box and ten ounces of opium in a travelling bag. The man declared the arms and ammunition were intended for use by the village volunteer corps in Kiaohsien but the police thought 1,400 bullets were a bit too much for two pistols and that two pistols were a bit too meagre for a volunteer corps. The smuggler is, therefore, still held.

The free handling of fire-arms is a great evil confronting the authorities in this territory and in Tsingtao the business of arms-smuggling is chiefly in the hands of foreign crooks who have been active for months.

It is considered here that the best remedial measure would be for the various authorities to get together and impose one standard of punishment. At the present time if a Briton were caught in the act of bringing in firearms without a permit, he would get anything up to several years, according to he magnitude of the offence, but the maximum a Japanese smuggler would get is 29 days. It has been pointed out from time to time that this Japanese maximum of 29 days is not a sufficient deterrent but, on the other hand, the Japanese authorities here have explained that Japanese courts in China in criminal cases can only impose police court sentences, and Japanese police courts cannot pass a judgment of imprisonment for more than 29 days. The position, however, will be different in the near future when the status of Japanese courts in China is raised to that of local courts in Japan for the Japanese authorities have decided to take this measure in order to cope with the smuggling situation in China. In such an event, the maximum penalty could be anything between two years' imprisonment and a fine of Y.1,000.

3,000 DROWNED IN KALGAN FLOOD

And Over $20,000,000 Damaged in City

Reports recently received from Kalgan by the China International Famine Relief Commission indicate that relief work at Kalgan is proceeding satisfactorily and that the extreme suffering it was feared might occur has been allieviated by prompt measures taken by the Tutung of Chahar and the various relief bodies.

The cause of the disaster is attributed to the situation of the stone bridge across the river close to a bend, with the result that the flood water banked up behind it and over flowed the retaining dykes, flooding the most populous part of the city. Over 3,000 people were drowned and damage is estimated at $20,000,000. The grain and money forwarded to Kalgan by the C. I. F. R. C. have been used to supply the needs of those who are entirely destitute, feeding in particular the women, children and old people. Rations have been fixed at 1½ catties of grain for an adult and 12 ounce for children, while the able-bodied amongst the sufferers are being formed into small gangs for clearing the streets draining ditches and sanitary work. The local missionaries have been working hard at relief organization and much good has been done by such bodies as the Chinese Red Cross and the China Philanthropic Society of Tientsin, who have been administering free relief for the past two weeks.

The Tutung has employed many soldiers in clearing the streets by means of a light track operating trucks. He has also built a temporary bridge across the river to replace the one which was destroyed. This temporary bridge was seriously threatened by heavy rain on the afternoon of August but fortunately the flood abated just as it reached the bridge supports and in a few hours danger was passed. It has been suggested that a diversion channel be built with famine labour to help to take overflow water in future and avert any likelihood of a similar disaster again occurring. This idea was mooted on the occasion of a previous flood and it is to be hoped it is acted upon this time, now that such a tragedy has served to emphasize its bitter necessity.

A letter received from Dr. F. F. Tucker of the American Board Mission Tehchow, Shantung, informs the C. I. F. R. C. that the Grand Canal has broken its banks in several spots, and that some score of villages are already surrounded by water. A local relief committee of foreigners and Chinese has been organized, and they are busy making a survey of the situation with a view to obtaining more exact statistics before issuing a statement to the public or appealing for help. As far as one can gather from the scanty information available up to date the position will be grave in a few months, as the lowlying land there has been flooded for four years in succession, with the result that crops are practically negligable and the farmers are in great distress, being forced to sell their live stock for nominal prices in order to exist. It remains to be seen whether the Red Cross roads built here in 1920-21 are also destroyed by the flood, if not they may well serve as avenues by which supplies can be distributed to the sufferers.

In Formosa the cultivator is compelled to grow sugar and to sell it to the Japanese mills at a price dictated to him. The mills have every advantage of high import tariffs to protect them. And the net result is that sugar costs twice as much in Japan as abroad, and that Japanese sugar is sold abroad cheaper than in Japan. That the Mitsukoshi store, Kobe, should sell it short weight seems to add but very little to the grievance, but a fine of Y.300 has been inflicted, says the "Japan Chronicle."

FLOOD RELIEF AND THE SURTAX

Estimated Yield $8,000,000: Loan to Be Raised for Pressing Necessities

Peking, Aug 12.

The Diplomatic Corps yesterday considered the Chinese Government's request to approve the proposed Customs surtax for flood relief. It is believed that they resolved to recommend approval of the plan to their Governments.

The Chinese Government propose that the surtax should be enforced for a period of from six to 12 months which will probably mean a year before it is lifted. The revenue from the tax for 12 months will approximate $8,000,000. Expenditure will be under Chinese and foreign supervision and a certain percentage will possibly be allocated to repair the dykes and for other flood prevention works. As on previous occasions it is expected that reasonable notice will be given exempting from the surtax goods on the water when the measure is finally passed.

As the relief measures require early large expenditure, it is proposed to raise a loan on the security of the surtax. In this connexion it is stated that the Chinese banks, which have plenty of money available, offer very favourable terms.

The International Famine Relief Committee has new received verified reports according to which the number to those known to have perished as a result of the floods amounts to 13,115, including 3,000 in Kalgan.

The Committee estimates that 15,000,000 people are affected in the flooded areas of Hunan, Chihli, Kiangsi, Fukien, Kuangtung, Shantung, Honan and Hupeh, while $20,000,000 will be required for relief, and expects that the following sums will be available for relief purposes:—

From the Customs sur-tax $8,000,000; from a subscription campaign in China, $2,000,000; from transportation sur-taxes, $2,000,000; from Mission sources, $1,000,000; from Chinese sources, $2,000,000; leaving a shortage of $5,000,000, which it is hoped to raise abroad.

The Committee has not yet been able to estimate the damage caused by the floods.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Ten to Twelve Million People Now Facing Destitution

Peking, Aug. 14.

The International Famine Relief Committee hopes shortly to receive statistics with regard to the damage done by the floods. It says that in the meantime it must be recognized that the recent floods have caused far more damage than the 1920-21 famine which was caused by drought in five provinces only.

The hitherto incomplete reports received by the Committee indicate serious floods in Chihli, Hunan, Shantung, Kiangsi, Fukien and Kuangtung and it is estimated that between 10,000,000 and 12,000,000 people are or will shortly be destitute; so when the losses of property and crops are calculated the figures must run into hundreds of millions of dollars. For instance, in Kalgan alone foreign observers place the damage at not less than $30,000,000 and only a portion of the city is inundated, while in some regions whole towns are under 20 or 30 feet of water.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

200,000 KIANGSI FLOOD SUFFERERS

Peking, Aug. 8.

A brief review of the flood situation in Kiangsi is contained in a consular report from Kiukiang. Out of the 81 hsiens in the province 38 are affected and in Nanchang, Tehan and the districts along the borders of the Hanyan Lake 200,000 people are said to be in distress and needing assistance. A relief committee, upon which officials and representatives of the local gentry are serving, has been formed at Nanchang, but it has not sufficient resources at its disposal to cope with the situation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RENTS SOARING AT KULING

The New Scheme of Taxation Now in Operation: Some Local Improvements

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kuling, July 29.

Kuling is still growing. About 30 new houses have been erected this year. The lots in the West Valley have all been sold. The new auditorium is up.

It is curious to reflect that this now prosperous and thriving community was only 30 years ago a barren mountain top. The story of how Kuling was first acquired as a summer residence for foreigners, and of the obstructions which were placed in the way by the Chinese officials, and of how, after a long and sometimes almost hopeless struggle, those obstructions were overcome—all this is told now in a pamphlet called "The Fight for Kuling," which has been issued by Mr. John Archibald, one of those who took part in the negotiations. This little book should be read by every visitor to Kuling.

It is doubtful if the number of foreign residents this summer will actually be greater than last year; for the addition of 30 new houses is set off by the fact that about an equal number of the old ones are standing empty. The cause of this is undoubtedly the high rents demanded. Rents were artificially forced up during the war, and they have not begun to come down again. It is common to find Tls. 300 or Tls. 350 asked for quite a small bungalow as rent for the season, and the larger and newer bungalows can be let for Tls. 450. A large number of people feel that they cannot afford to spend such a sum on renting a summer house for two or three months of the year, and so some are preferring to endure the summer as best they can at home, while others are going further afield to places such as Peitaiho, Weihaiwei and Chefoo. There is no doubt but things will adjust themselves, and the owners of bungalows at Kuling will be forced to ask less exhorbitant rents than they were able to demand during the years of stress that began during the war and lasted through the first years of the peace.

The damage done by the severe storm of last August, has been repaired, and the estate now shows few marks of the havoc done to roads and streams. A series of dams have been constructed along the bed of the main stream down the centre of the valley. By this means, after a heavy rainfall the rush of water will be more or less checked, and the heaviest loose boulders will be stopped in their course. This will not only protect the banks of the stream and the bridges, but it will also help to preserve the swimming pool and the large dam at the lower end of the valley. This swimming pool used to be choked up annually, and it took a great deal of labour to clear it again.

New Post Office

A new post office is being built in the gap, just opposite the police-station at the very entrance to the Kuling Estate. It is being built of hewn stone, and will be a solid and useful structure when it is finished. The old post-office, just within the Estate boundary is a mere shanty, which is now far too small for the demands which are made upon it. The letter sorting at present is being very badly done and letters are continually being misdelivered all over the valley No doubt this is due in part to the cramped space afforded in the old post office, and perhaps when the new one is completed we shall be able to have a better delivery.

The finances of the Estate are in a better condition than they have been for a number of years. This is chiefly due to the fact that it has been found feasible to sell to the Chinese Telephone Administration the telephone system which was installed on the Estate several years ago. This system, which included communication with Kiukiang, involved an initial cost of nearly $6,000 and laid a considerable burden upon the ratepayers, out of whose pockets the expenses had to be secured. The whole installation has now been taken over at its initial cost, and at the same time the residents on the Estate still have the benefit of being able to use it at the usual charge, while to the traffic department and management in general its existence is of course an enormous advantage.

Tax Survey Completed

The Land Renters' Meeting is to be held on August 8. Probably the most vital subject to be discussed in the new system of taxation, which has been put into force this year. During the winter, the whole of the Estate has been surveyed by Mr. John Berkin, who has put in an enormous amount of work into a precise and detailed estimate of the assessable value of each lot and building in the valley. The land is divided into four classes, with rateable values of $30, $20, $10, and nil per unit of area, the unit being taken as 500 square feet. The tax is to be worked out at a two per cent. rate of this basis with a minimum of $5. Similarly, houses are assessed at values of $120, $100, $80 and $50 per unit, the unit in this case being 100 square feet of ground area, and the value depending on the quality of the building. For buildings of more than one storey, 50 per cent. is added to this value for the first upper floor and 33⅓ per cent. for the second, or 25 per cent. for an attic. The house tax is a rate of one per cent. in this estimated value, with a minimum of $10.

By the above plan of assessment, it is hoped that a more equitable distribution of the burden will be found, and at the same time it is expected that the total revenue of the Estate will be increased by about 50 per cent. No doubt there will be some grousing from members of the community whose taxes have been increased.

But on the whole, the new arrangement seems more equitable than the old one, according to which all land or houses were taxed at one flat rate, quite independently of their intrinsic value. Moreover, if any lotholder feels himself to be unjustly treated, he has a right of appeal, by which he can claim to have any peculiar circumstances carefully examined, and his assessment revised. In order to prevent vexatious appeals, a deposit of $6 will be required from any landrenter who avails himself of the privilege, and of this $3 will be returned in case of the appeal being successful.

A Pitiful Rhymer.

The "Kuling Bulletin" is struggling along with its fifth volume. News seems scarce and advertisements fill up a good half of each number. In order to fill up his space, the editor has had recourse to writing "poetry," which has drawn forth a protest in verse from one of his readers. The protestant delivers himself as follows:

O. is there not some one on the hill top,
Who when he writes doggerel, will suddenly stop,
And think of the pain others feel in the head
When they read such poor stuff and wish he was dead.
Let him write something decent, inspiring and good
Which will cheer up the spirit, as rich mental food.
At present his rhymes (?) and material are rough.

The perpetrator of the "rhymes" referred to, sportingly recognizes that his critic is a true poet, while he himself lays no claim to such a title. He therefore offers to lay down his own pen if only "Tired" (as the critic calls himself) will take up his and begin to feed the "Bulletin" himself.

One incident here, which illustrates Young China in its worst phase, is perhaps worth quoting, verbatim. It is entitled "A Disappointed Holiday Seeker." The story is as follows: A returned Chinese student from American, claiming to be a graduate of Columbia University, visited us on Monday. His English was good, but his lack of wisdom brought him into trouble. He was apparently greatly insulted upon learning that no Chinese are allowed to buy or rent property on the Kuling Estate except those who are citizens or subjects of a foreign country. He protested against the rule, which provides that the road seats are for the use of occidentals only. He demanded ice-cream lemonade and cigars from J. L. Duff & Co.'s clerks, who evidently resented the superior airs of their fellow-countryman. He slapped one of the clerks. This was like putting a match to a bundle of fire-crackers. The compliment was returned. The visitor beat a retreat for Chinese territory, but sprinting up a Kuling Road is not as easy as on the Columbia track. He was quickly overtaken by several of the clerks who took the law into their own hands, and administered a severe kicking and beating, which sent the visitor for repairs

IRONHEAD TSINGTAO'S GOVERNOR

A gentleman well versed in things Chinese, who has recently returned from Tsingtao, after speaking of the unusual popularity the resort is enjoying this summer, went on to speak of the many changes already introduced by Shantung's new Governor Kao (Gow) En-hung, or "Ironhead," as he is nick-named.

When he assumed his duties in March, after having served his country as Minister of Communications and in other offices, he was greeted at the railway station by a crowd of over 40,000 people, who had turned out to see their new Executive, a demonstration never before seen in Tsingtao. Even at that time, however, an attempt was proposed upon his life, which fortunately miscarried. Other attacks have been made upon him, but he has always refused to be escorted by guards or even by civil detectives, and was the first of the Peking Ministers to do away with the custom of armed guards on motor-cars.

Spartan Simplicity

The Governor is extremely popular with the Shantung people and every one has to acknowledge his honesty and patriotism, although some of his virtues must make him rather conspicuous in diplomatic circles, for he does not smoke, drink, or play mahjongg and has only one wife. He comes to his office by half-past seven in the morning and remains there through the day, having a simple noon meal served at the office. Promptly at 6.30 he returns to his home and has his evening meal with his wife and family, after which he devotes the evening to public entertainments.

His custom of invariably eating at home and only attending formal dinners as an onlooker as it were, is sometimes misunderstood, and it is said that some foreign hostesses have been piqued by his disregard of their elaborate menus until he explained that only in this way could he have any home life whatever. When one considers the ceremonial dinners which his official position would ordinarily constrain him to attend one cannot but admire his device which secures him against dyspepsia at the same time that it affords him a little leisure to become acquainted with his family.

Naturally his subordinates grumble at being deprived of the sharks' fins, precious puddings and the million and one concomitants of splendours of birds' nest soup at official banquets, but as they seem to be for the most part an honest, hard-working staff they acquiesce in the rigid régime, although finding their official positions by no means the usual sinecures.

The Dead Hand of Corruption.

Governor Kao had a most unfortunate financial inheritance, since his two predecessors so dissipated the funds of the province that not only was the treasury empty but the credit of the administration had gone. Indeed its resources have been so anticipated that the official receipts for the first month of the new government were only $200,000! Many public buildings have been mortgaged and valuable concessions have passed out of government control. The Forestry Department and Forest Reserves, instituted at great cost by the Germans when in control of Tsingtao, were all but lost to the Chinese people; but by happy chance the Governor found out about it and cancelled the sale.

Another tremendous handicap is the Navy, a cumbersome collection of antiquated tubs, no one of them less than 25 years old, for whose upkeep the Governor is supposed to find $150,000 a month. The public buildings are in a sad state of disrepair and the roads, which received only superficial attention while the Japanese were in occupation, were entirely neglected during the sway of the first two Chinese governors. Since March a great deal of improvement has been made on the roadways, which have also been widened, but much remains to be done.

Money is acutely needed and in order to get funds to carry on the running expenses of the Province, as well as to make the most necessary improvements, the Governor proposed to lease for 30 years some 40 of the public buildings, most of them vacant and falling into disuse. For this he has been much criticized, some regarding the leases as in the nature of a sale, which would, of course, be illegal; others pointing out that, even if they were all sold, the revenue would be but $880,000, an inconsiderable part of their real value. As a matter of fact, few purchasers have come forward, fearing no doubt that the next Governor might reverse the policy of the present Executive and their bargain would not stand.

It is the opinion of our informant that Governor Kao is an upright official of sterling principles and that if he is only permitted two or three years to work out his reforms he will demonstrate his ability. His relations with foreigners are pleasant and he seems generally regarded as a man of fine public spirit.

CHINA MEDICAL MISSIONARY ASSOCN.

Next January's Conference at Hongkong: List of the Delegates

The China Medical Missionary Association will hold its biennial conference at Hongkong from January 21-28, 1925, at the invitation of the Hongkong and China Branch of the British Medical Association. As this is the first time that the Association has met in Hongkong, both bodies are very anxious that this joint conference shall advance medical science in China as much as possible and have therefore invited delegates from other bodies and associations of kindred aims. The sectional meetings of this Conference have been placed under the control of a joint chairmanship, each chairman acting as secretary on behalf of the association he represents. The hon. secretaries of the conference are Dr. Joseph Shellshear, and Dr. James Maxwell. The sections and their representatives are as follows, the Medical Missionary representative preceding that of the British Medical Association. General Medicine: Dr. W. W. Cadbury, Canton Christian College, Prof. J. Anderson, Hongkong Univ; Therapeutics: Prof. B. E. Read, P.U.M.C., Dr. C. W. MacKenny, Govt. Civil Hosp., Hongkong; Pathology: Prof. L. H. Braafladt, Tsinan, Dr. J. Morrison, Union Bldgs., Hongkong; General Surgery; Dr. Oscar Thomson, Canton Hosp., Prof. K. H. Digby, Hongkong Univ.; Ophtalmology; Dr. H. Howard, P.U.M.C., Dr. G. M. Harston, Union Bldgs., Hongkong; Ear, Nose and Throat; Dr. Thacker Neville, Changsha, Dr. S. S. Strahan, Alexandra Bldgs., Hongkong; Radiology; Dr. J. L. Harvey, Canton Hosp., Dr. J. Macgoury Alexandra, Bldg., Hongkong; Obstetrics: Dr. J. Wright, Canton Hosp., Dr. C. Forsyth, Alexandra Bldgs., Hongkong; Anthropology: Prof. D. Black, P.U.M.C., Prof. J. L. Shellshear, Hongkong Univ.; Physiology: Dr. S. Evans, (Jr.), Shantung Christian Univ., Prof. H. G. Earle, Hongkong Univ.; Hygiene & Public Health: Dr. F. Oldt, Canton Hosp., Dr. J. B. Addison, P.C.M.O., Hongkong; Parasitology: Dr. E. C. Faust, P.U.M.C., Dr. E. P. Minett, Govt. Bact., Hongkong; Naval & Military Hygiene: Surg. Capt. Burniston, R. N., Lt.-Col. Fitzgerald, R.A.M.C.

EARTHQUAKES IN RUSSIA AND JAPAN

41 Persons Killed and 800 Houses Destroyed

Moscow, Aug. 9.

Forty-one persons were killed in an earthquake in Ferghana province, which destroyed 800 houses in various villages.—Reuter.

Tokyo, Aug. 10.

Japanese holiday makers on the Boshu coast, and in the towns of Hojo and Tateyama were alarmed yesterday evening by a somewhat severe earthquake which, however, caused no damage. The shock was felt very slightly in Tokyo.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE RUSSIAN CHAPEL IN PEKING

Built at Expense of Chinese Government for Use by Russian Mission

Peking, Aug. 5.

In view of current rumours that the Russian Legation Chapel—probably the oldest foreign landmark in Peking—is to be devoted to other purposes when the Soviet Ambassador takes over the Legation premises, the following historical sketch of the Chapel, which has been supplied to Reuter's Agency, is of topical interest.

Some Russian Cossacks having been made prisoners in the Russo-Chinese skirmishes on the Amur, which led to the Norchinsk Treaty of 1689, they were, on account of their fighting abilities, included in the Yellow Banner of the Manchu Emperor's guard at Peking. One of the conditions upon which these "Albazines," as they are known, agreed to enlist provided that their spiritual needs should be attended to, and a chapel was therefore given them in the north-east corner of the city, where the Russian Ecclesiastical Mission now stands.

Later on, after the Bura-Kiakhta treaties between Russia and China had been concluded by Count Raguzinsky, granting rights of permanent residence to a Greek Orthodox Mission in Peking, another compound was given to the Mission on Chiao-min-hsiang (now Legation Street). This compound appears to have been the place of residence of some of the earliest Portuguese and Dutch Embassies to Peking, then of the early Russian Embassies (including that of Boyar Baykoff in 1657), and later of the first Russian trading caravans.

As the Chinese Government could not permit another Power to erect buildings and maintain paid servants in China at that time, the members of the Russian Church Mission were given official salaries and later grants of land and official rank. A chapel for the Russian Mission was erected, at the Chinese Government's expense, during the reign of the Emperor Yung-Cheng (1722 to 1735)—the very Emperor who so bitterly persecuted the Jesuits.

The Chapel was damaged by fire and earthquake in the early 19th century, but it is quite likely that the double-headed eagle on it may be the very one which was put up when the Chapel was founded under the Russian Empress Anne (1730-1770). An inscription on the quaint belfry attests improvements made in the "Nan Kuan's" (Southern Hostelry's) property in the 18th century, as also do inscriptions on the bells.

When a Russian Legation was established in Peking after the Tientsin Treaty of 1858, Count Ignatieff took over the "Southern Hostelry" for the Legation's use, the Ecclesiastical Mission going back to its original quarters in the "Northern Hostelry" (Pei Kuan). Both were substantially enlarged after 1900. The Chapel thus became de facto the Legation Chapel, although there was no arrangement by which the Ecclesiastical Mission relinquished its rights over it—rights granted, legally speaking, to an independent clerical body.

The old Nan Kuan included a portion of the Russian Legation between the drive to the Minister's house and the First Secretary's House, comprising the Chapel, Dr. Soudakoff's house and the red "T'ing 'erh" in the garden.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A dramatic story of how Holbein's famous picture, "The Duchess of Milan," was secured for the National Gallery was given by Sir Robert Witt at the annual meeting of the National Art Collections Fund at the Hotel Victoria recently. Forty-thousand pounds was still needed when he received a telegram:—"Will give forty-thousand pounds." Fearing it was a practical joke, he asked for a banker's reference, and found that the £40,000 would be paid by the Bank of England. "The only condition was that the gift should be anoymous," he added. "I can only tell you this, the gift was made by a woman who was a lover of art, and that that gift represented one-third of her total fortune."

THE GREAT RICE EXPORT QUESTION OF HUNAN

A Province that Grows for all China: The Restriction of Export in Times of Shortage: Provincial Government Flagrant of Local Welfare to Catch Dollars

FROM OUR CHANGSH CORRESPONDENT.

Onboard S. S. Tungwo, July 31.

This is really my first day of furlough—and steaming ahead against a fairly stiff breeze, what could be more enjoyable. The difference between the final agonies of packing indoors yesterday and the first fruits of holiday in the shape of a long chair on a steamer deck are marked.

Before handing on may pen to my successor, I should like to take a last use of it for the time being.

The Tungwo arrived in port yesterday about midday. Under ordinary circumstances, at midday to-day it would have started for Siangtan; it would have got back to-morrow morning and just before dawn on Saturday morning it would have been off to Hankow. The stay has been shortened by 48 hours—and, incidentally, the final stage of my packing. Why is this sudden upset of plans—for the final decision to get outside port limits before daylight was only made at 2 p.m. yesterday? The answer lands us into the discussion of one of the most knotty problems of government in Hunan—that of the control of rice export; a problem that is pressed upon consular and customs officials and forms the very basis of any work of famine relief.

Everyone who know anything about Hunan knows it is a great rice producing centre. It is less widely known that the rice-producing area is actually smaller in extent than that which cannot grow rice. In the centre and all round the south and the west of the province and to a less degree in the east, are mountains in which only narrow steep valleys, hardly one per cent. in extent, can grow rice. But as these valleys widen out, rice becomes increasingly the staple of agriculture. In the great Siang valley which occupies almost the eastern half of the province and, most of all, in the north-eatern section of the province in lands which border on the Tungting Lake, immense tracts, indeed, having been seized from what used to be lake, by means of huge embankments, the rice crops are enormous.

Gold and Silver Prizes

The hill country, large as it is in size, is sparsely inhabited and out of the "thirty millions" which Hunanese credit their fellow provincials to number, considerably over 20 milions occupy the rice-producing lands. They reckon their crops on the basis of an ideal "ten-tenths" which is never acknowledged to be attained to. At least never acknowledged by the farmers themselves, who, in China as in England, always have the power of pointing out some flaw in the conditions imposed by the clerk of the weather. But in the bad drought of 1921, I was told of certain parts of Hengshan which yielded "fifteen-tenths." The perennial springs of the great Nanyoh range continued to pour out their waters in spite of two, and in some places even three rainless months, and the well watered fields, blazed on day after day and week after week, by the sun from a cloudless sky, produced unheard of abundance. The official report of the whole country, which contained large tracts unaffected by these springs, sent to the Famine Relief Committee was that the harvest was "three-tenths."

In such counties as Siangsiang and Liuyang, which in Manchu days were famed as the "golden" and "silver" prizes of county magistrates in the whole province, a three-tenth crop provides amply for the needs of the very large population of these counties. Everything above that has to be exported unless the labour of cultivation is to be in vain. From time immemorial, streams of rice boats must have been crossing the Tungting lake and pouring its treasures of rice into Hankow and thence to all parts of northern and eastern China. With the advent of foreign steamers, came a more convenient and speedy way for handling possibilities of export. The possibilities have become actualities largely through the addition of rice-growing lands by the embankments along the borders of the Tungting lake.

The Tientsin treaty of 1858 secured the right of foreigners to export rice and engage in the transport trade from any one of the treaty ports to any other.

Two or three times in every 10 years, there would be an interference with the bounteous crops by reason of either drought or flood. Of the two, excessive drought worked the greatest harm, but floods have always been more frequent. It may be doubted whether the highest flood ever known has affected half the rice fields of the province, but excessive drought has certainly withered up much more than half the crops.

What the Treaty Says

Hence a modification of the treaty which in general terms gave British ships a right to transport any rice that was put on board, became obviously fair and just. In the British Commercial Treaty, known as the Mackay Treaty which was signed in 1922, article XIV stands thus:

"Whereas under Rule V appended to the Treaty of Tientsin of 1858, British merchants are permitted to export rice and all other grain from one port of China to another. . . . it is now agreed that in cases of expected scarcity or famine from whatsoever cause in any district, the Chinese Government shall, on giving 21 days notice, be at liberty to prohibit the shipment of rice and other grain from such district.

"If, during the existence of this prohibition, any shipment of rice or grain is allowed by the authorities, the prohibition shall ipso facto be considered cancelled and shall not be re-imposed until six weeks notice has been given.

"When a prohibition is notified, it will be stated whether the Government have any tribute or army rice which they intend to ship during the time of prohibition, and if so, the quantity shall be named. Such rice shall not be included in the prohibition.

It was in the early days of July that the recent exceedingly high floods commenced and within a week or so it became evident that the disaster was not confined to a small locality here or there but was almost provincewide. The Government was somewhat dilatory in waiting till July 9 to proclaim the expectation of "scarcity or famine." For the three succeeding weeks export went on, not merely as usual, but with doubled or trebled energy: steamer after steamer, lighter after lighter, loaded to their utmost capacity took immense quantities of rice. It must be noted that the buyers and sellers are for the most part Chinese, the foreign share is confined to the matter of transport; noted, also, that every picul of exported rice paid a dollar in tax to the Hunan Government. Doubtless sooner or later we shall hear of the greed and "oppression" of the foreigner, who has in reality, merely seconded the demands, clamorous demands of his Chinese partners in the trade.

The regulation of the Mackay Treaty concerning the exceptions to the embargo was not overlooked by the Government. Though it is noteworthy that while the proclamation concerning the embargo was posted all over the city and published in every daily paper, the proclamation concerning the exceptions was unmentioned by any paper, and although I have met with one Chinese gentleman who tells me he saw one copy posted up, it is generally unknown.

The Governor's Huge Exception

Here is a rough translation of the notice communcated to the Commissioner of Customs by his Chinese colleague the Superintendent of Foreign Affairs in the form of a proclamation from Governor Chao Heng-ti countersigned by his four principal colleagues in the provincial Government.

"A Notice in regard to the embargo on rice export from Hunan sent on July 21 by the Chang (sha) Yo (chow) Superintendent of Customs to the Commissioner of Customs.

"An exception to the embargo on rice export from Hunan is to be made in the matter of tribute and military rice which it is necessary to allow for and which I, the Governor will regulate, sending directions from time to time to the Commissioner. Military men from every province are making requests for Hunan rice. The amount we shall be able to sell to those who come to buy will have to be determined by the amount remaining in stock. Probably they will want to have about 200,000 piculs a month. The export of such rice is not to be included in the embargo which is about to be put on the export of rice and which will continue for a period which it is not now possible to define. It is necessary, however, to fix a limit to the amount of military rice that may be exported: it must not exceed 200,000 piculs a month, each picul weighing 150 catties.

"I, the Governor, will keep watch on the amount of rice that is needed by the people of the province and permits for the export of military rice will be regulated in accordance with these needs; the exact amount will be communicated to the Commissioner of Customs.

"In addition it may be necessary to sell a quantity of tribute rice not exceeding 200,000 piculs in a year and this figure is accordingly fixed as the limit. Special permits will be shown for the military rice. The Changsha Superintendent of Customs will communicate this Notice of exception to the embargo in accordance with the Treaty to the Commissioner.

Note must be made of that "150 catty" picul. That is the standard for Hunan rice. But, of course, Customs statistics would be unmanageable if some of their piculs were 100 catties and others 150; in Customs statistics, therefore, the only recognized picul is the smaller of the two. When, therefore, the Hunan Government has issued its permits for 600,000 "piculs" to be exported, the Customs will return 900,000; and for the Government 200,000, 300,000 will appear in the Customs report.

An Impossible Exaction

The Commissioner of Customs was obliged to point out to the Governor that the "naming" of the amount to be expected must be made at the actual time of the embargo and not subsequently arranged from time to time after the embargo had commenced.

The Hunan Government has reason to recognize in the present British Consul a man who knows what the treaties say and who takes them to mean what they say. At one time, the Government was altogether successful in raising the embargo "for 24 hours;" but the Consul was equally successful in keeping it raised for the following 42 days. It was doubtless the realization that any attempt to export an "unnamed" quantity of rice, whether denominated "tribute" or "military" would involve a six weeks lifting of the embargo that induced the Governor on the last day to "name" 600,000 piculs as the amount of military rice allowed and 200,000 as the amount of "tribute" rice.

The figures of the first notice were, of course, not actual, but only possible limits. Let it suffice, therefore to point out the ridiculous nature of such amounts 200,000 large piculs a month, amount to 2,400,000 in a year; i.e. 3,600,000 ordinary piculs, to which must be added 300,000 ordinary piculs of tribute rice—a total just short of 4,000,000 piculs to be exported from a district in which export was to be prohibited on accounted of expected "scarcity or famine." When it is remembered that it is only in prosperous years that the exports exceed 2,000,000 piculs it is difficult to find any respectful language in which to describe the position assumed by Governor Chao and his colleagues. The figures now stand at a definite statement that the Government is assuming the responsibility for the export of 1,200,000 piculs (i.e. 800,000 large piculs) of rice from a flood-devastated province.

What Is Tribufe Rice?

A word must be said about "tribute" rice. The Chinese phrase is "ts'ao mi," and, if pressed, the word "ts'ao," it must be allowed, means "transport" rather than "tribute." One of the names that used to be applied to the Grand Canal, which, in the days before foreign steamer traffic, was the main route for bringing "ts'ao mi" to Peking was the "Ts'ao ho"—which nobody would translate "Tribute River." Nevertheless, if such a meaning of "ts'ao" is to be pressed, it is difficult to understand the phrase as it stands either in the Mackay Treaty of 1902, or the Governor's notice of July 1924. All exported rice must be "transported." How can you except rice that is to be transported from an embargo forbidding the transport of rice?

Now the Mackay Treaty is one which contains the clause found in many others, but unfortunately not in all, that in case of dispute as to differences of meaning between the Chinese and the English texts of the Treaty, the English text is to rule. The English text reads "tribute rice." It is beyond cavil that that is the correct phrase for the "ts'ao mi" with which the treaty was, in this clause, concerned. Peking merchants were then, as now, in the habit of getting Hunan rice for sale. The route of transport and even the means of transport for merchants and for the Court coincided. But it would have been high treason to have called such mercantile rice "ts'ao mi." The Hunanese would have resented such a use of the term as keenly as the Imperial Court itself. It meant only what we call in English "tribute rice."

Flagrant Dodge for Dollars

With the fall of the Manchu Government all such "tribute" ceased at once. No one ever gave a thought or spoke a word of transferring such obligations of "tribute" from the Manchu Government to the Republican Government. Now in this 13th year of the Republic, and, be it specially noted, this 4th year of the Independence of Hunan, what is "tribute rice?" The only answer one can get is rice that will ensure the Government a tax of a dollar a picul.

Governor Chao is no worse than most of his colleagues in occupying provincial governorships, and in view of this bungling bit of clumsiness, one may add not so clever as some of them. But he is at one with the whole lot except only the Governor or Shansi: his love of money exceeds his love of truth. If he can get $200,000 by calling 200,000 piculs of rice "tribute rice" when he and everybody else knows it it not "tribute rice" he will call it so.

Meanwhile the agitators against "unequal treaties" might have a subject to think about—only they do no thinking. It is easy to see how they can foam at the mouth over the iniquity of a foreign language controlling such a sovereign right as that of the internal transport of rice. But while this incident demonstrates the need of such a stipulation, it also, alas, demonstrates how "unequal" treaties always will be when one side does its best to observe the letter and the spirit of the treaty, and the other confines its activities to an untruthful conformity to the letter to cover up its deliberate contravention of the spirit. Last night on the stroke of 12, the Tungwo stopped working cargo and rigidly observed the letter of the law. It is by no means impossible that on her next trip she may be loaded as full as she is today with "tribute" rice.

The Hungry Sheep Look Up

Allow me, Mr. Editor, this last chance of garrulosity, and let me add one more paragraph to an already too lengthy letter. The Hunan Branch of the International Famine Relief Commission is being overwhelmed with accounts of heart-rending distress from innumerable places in the province. Actual starvation has not yet become fatal, but the reports show that apart from relief it soon will be. The starving poor have absolutely nothing to do with this exception to the embargo on the export of rice. 1,200,000 piculs would be more than ample to relieve the distress. What ought the Famine Relief Commission to do? Ought it to say we cannot relieve your distress which is made as bad as it is by the callous neglect of your government? Or, ought it to relieve the distress and thereby inevitably confirm the indifference of the government? It is not one whit less certain that the relief of the Government in the consequence of its greed and selfishness will confirm that greed and selfishness, than it is that the inevitable consequences of greed and selfishness are poverty and misery.

GEN. Yang Ci-teh, chief of the Tientsin city police, and his chief of the road construction department have been impeached by the members of the Chihli provincial assembly for alleged negligence. The members claim that no less than $150,000 were subscribed by people for road-construction purposes in the Tientsin city; but whenever any heavy rain occurs, the roads are all impassable and there is always five or six inches of mud. The members demand thorough investigations of the alleged corruption and inefficiency on the part of the road-construction department officials by Gen. Wang Chen-pin.

HONGKONG'S TYPHOID SCARE

Everybody Being Vaccinated and Chemists' Stocks Running Low

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hongkong, Aug. 4.

Now that the third week of the typhoid "epidemic" here has commenced, one can look back on the past fortnight with an analytical mind, and despite the tragedy that it has meant for so many persons the outbreak has not been without its lighter side.

The question of the day for about a week has been: "How's your arm?" and no-one has tired of comparing symptoms and discussing the scientific aspect of inoculation. Following the illness of several prominent European residents being diagnosed as enteric or else paratyphoid, the big "hongs" sent circulars round to their staffs informing them that any who wanted to be inoculated against the disease could attend at the firm's medical advisers' offices for the operation, and within a few days there were scores of the European population crowding the waiting rooms of local doctors. For about a week it was a common experience to have to wait an hour or more before the overworked medicos could give one the necessary "shot" of vaccine. A few ingenious persons sent in their names, went back to their offices for about three-quarters of an hour, and returned in time for the operation!

At one time it seemed as if the supplies of vaccine would run out, and many people were told to obtain their own stuff from the dispensaries One chemist, having sold nearly all his stock, kept two series in case of real emergency. The stock vaccine of the dispensaries is usually in a series of three injections, whilst the stuff supplied by the Government bacteriologist is being used in two "shots."

Chinese Curiously Immune.

The most remarkable feature about the outbreak has been the comparative immunity of the Chinese population. For a few days, the number of European cases was four and five daily, whilst the Chinese were one or two. Naturally, everyone began to scout the theory that the water supply was affected, as, had that been so, the native cases of typhoid would have numbered hundreds daily. The only explanation that offered itself was a contaminated milk supply, especially as children of very tender years have been affected, but it has since been pointed out that the Chinese consume large quantities of milk. There has been a great deal of theorizing, with references to possible carriers, to exhumation of the germs during excavations, and so forth. Finally, last week, the Medical Officer of Health made a statement practically amounting to an accusation against the Dairy Farm Company. This was the sensation of the day. The company concerned lost no time in denying, very convincingly, these suggestions that their supply was responsible, and have challenged any medical man who desires to, to prove the alleged contamination. They have asked the local Medical Board to appoint impartial investigators.

Meanwhile, the disease seems to have taken a decided downward course, and probably in a few days will be no longer a menace. It is difficult to say how much the special precautions in the way of boiling milk and water, and the wholesale inoculations, have had to do with this decline.

"It is an ill wind——," as vendors of patent milk mixtures and bottled waters have discovered. They have not been slow to seize upon the opportuniy of making special appeals to the public through extended advertising, and the results have been immediate and evidently gratifying. Meanwhile those of us who have only sore arms to nurse are glad that things have not been much worse.

A big bronze bell, 32,000 pounds in weight, has been cast at Hangchow, by a subscription of 1,000,000 Buddhist priests and 40,000,000 lay Buddhists throughout China, for presentation to Japan for memorializing the tragic death of the tens of thousand unfortunate people who fell in the earthquake of last year. The present, when accepted, will the second of the kind from a foreign country.

FORMER ROYAL YACHT AS DYNAMITE RUNNER

Queen Victoria's Wedding Gift To Spanish King: Capture in China Port

A yacht that was once the wedding gift of a queen to a king, and is now transformed into an ugly "tramp," figures in the latest gun-running episode.

The story is sent by the Tientsin correspondent of the Central News who writes:—

A battered and worn yacht, rush stained and weatherbeaten, is lying at Taku Bar, a North China port awaiting her fate. A vessel of but 150 tons burthen, she arrived there after an 83 days' voyage from Christiania, laden with a cargo of dynamite.

Her Past.

But travel stained as she is, the graceful of the Elly reveal that she was not born to the life of the ocean tramp. Formerly the Jacinta, this inconspicuous member of the unkempt fraternity of tramps, was the wedding gift of Queen Victoria to the late King Alphonso of Spain.

Built in a British shipyard, the Jacinta was as smart a craft as sailed the seas. She was fitted with luxurious State-rooms, manned by a goldbraided naval crew, and for some time was a proud royal yacht.

During the Spanish-American war the Jacinta carried ammunition to the West Indies, a useful if less showy occupation, but with the conclusion of the war she fell on evil days.

For years the Jacinta, her name changed, her state-rooms gone, and stripped of all fittings, plied as a freighter between Norway and the Eastern ports of England. On the outbreak of the world war the Elly again did her bit, and carried cylinders of poison gas to France.

Norwegian Crew.

Laid aside again she recently commenced what may be her last voyage, when she left Norway for China, carrying a full cargo of dynamite. The crew, a handful of Norse fishermen, are to work their way back to Europe, while the Elly waits her fate. She may be scrapped, or she may be bought by some Chinese merchant, to end her days ignominiously on the China coast.

Mauser pistols from Continental ports have been landed in Tientsin and other northern ports, and presumably retailed to Chinese.

 We are informed by the master of the yacht that the Elly certainly brought out dynamite, but under Government huchao; and so far from any gun-running, there was nothing of the kind and three of the crew, all Norwegians, were recommended, as we understand by the Customs, for local employment. —Ed.

AMUSEMENTS OF HONGKONG

Performing Water Buffalo shortly Due to Appear in Shanghai

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hongkong, Aug. 4.

Those who have been for any length of time in Shanghai and some other parts of the East, are inclined to vote Hongkong exceedingly dull, but occasionally there comes something our way apart from the routine visits to the cinemas or hotel Cinderella dances.

The present attraction is an Annamite circus, which is performing to full "houses" every night, and is giving very popular matinees as well. A circus of this description is something of a novelty, and many went to the opening show prepared to be disappointed, but were agreeably surprised by the entertainment. The menagerie includes such unusual performers as pigs and a water buffalo. There was also a tiger, which died just before the show left Indo-China, and a bear which fell into a pond and got drowned. Apparently the circus is inclined to be unlucky with its animals, for a few days ago the water buffalo went amissing. It was feared that it would never be recovered, and had permanently exchanged the hazards of the ring for the prosaic existence of the rice field, but it had only strayed, and was found grazing on the lawn of a neighbouring military mess the next day. The elephant introduced himself to Kowloonites by wandering on to some waste land where the community's washing was hanging out to dry, and when he left there was not a pole standing, and very few clean shirts for the Kowloon dandies to fall back upon that week. This circus will probably pay Shanghai a visit in the near future.

Two picturesque Americans are paying us a visit in the persons of Capt. and Miss Wanderwell, who are roaming the world in freak Ford cars, with a cinema photographic apparatus and a pet monkey as their chief impedimenta. They are showing films of various interesting parts of the world they have visited, in the course of what appears to be an endurance test, and are also taking films locally. The lady dresses very unconventionally, in riding breeches and shirt, with unbound locks, and the "whole outfit," to borrow a Transatlantic flavour, is causing not a little amused interest. The Wanderwells are inclined to be optimistic—they intend to attempt a trip overland to Shanghai from Canton. But perhaps they might decide to do it by steamer in the end.

KIAOCHOU-TSINAN RAILWAY

Excellent Showing on Past Half Year: Good Harvests Mean Good Earnings

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Aug. 9.

Figures compiled by he Kiaochou-Tsinan Railway show that during the first half of this year it has earned $717,838.64 over and above the same period of last year, and if conditions do not change until the end of this year, it is estimated that the gross earning will be $10,490,600. Below will be found the earnings of the first half of last year and this year:—

Months	1923	1924	Increase
Jan.	657,260	852,854	195,589
Feb.	479,864	691,156	211,291
Mar.	822,103	947,556	125,452
Apr.	825,493	950,039	124,545
May	901,911	953,814	51,902
June	724,189	733,248	9,058

One of the reasons for this excellent showing is the period of prosperity this province has enjoyed during the past few months. The crops have exceeded all expectations. It has been observed that during the past two years the rate of increase in the railway's earnings has been 12.2 per cent. annually. Coal transportation is constantly increasing and it is predicted that when the through-traffic arrangement between Peking and Tsingtao is completed the number of through-passengers will help increase the passenger traffic on the line which at present takes care of 30 per cent. of the gross earnings.

LEGALIZED OPIUM

The following significant paragraph appears in the report for 1923 made by Mr. T. Ebara, Commissioner of Customs at Wuchow:—

"Reports are current that opium is practically legalized in Wuchow, the Opium Suppression Bureau being virtually an Opium Tax Bureau. The traffic in this drug is carried on a large scale under military protection and furnishes the military with a fruitful source of revenue and the merchant with a handsome profit. There is no gainsaying the fact that the prosperity of the opium business accounts to a large extent for the sudden revival of trade in the third and fourth quarters of the year. The amount of the drug seized by the Customs during the year was 14,551 taels.

HONGKONG POST OFFICE

Effect of Closing of China Agencies

The report on the Postal Department, Hongkong, for 1923 was laid on the table at the Legislative Council meeting last week. It is noted that "no appointment was made to the post of Assistant Postmaster General." There were, however, additions to the subordinate staff.

The new office of Inspector of Postmen was brought into existence from August 1 in place of the old Postal Inspectorship.

The number of mail receptacles of Hongkong origin despatched during the year was 39,459, a decrease of 2,266. Receptacles in transit which were handled numbered 133,498 as against 135,505 in 1922.

These decreases were due to the closing of the British Postal Agencies in China at the end of 1922.

The number of registered articles handled amounted to an increase of 25,673. The figure for insured articles showed an increase of 409. Parcels, ordinary and insured, which were dealt with reached an increase of 74,035.

The figures in each of these three cases were the highest on record.

Revenue and Expenditures

The total revenue was $714,340,03, an increase of $57,477,92 over the previous year. The balance of revenue over expenditure amounted to $91,639.77.

The increase of revenue from the sale of stamps in .1923 over 1922 amounted to $82,083.71.

There was a decrease of money order transactions during the year of £22,522, owing to the loss of business since the closing of the British Postal Agencies in China at the end of November, 1922.

There was a decrease in the British and local postal order business.

In the Chinese section, there was an increase in registered and insured packages. The ordinary Chinese letters handled during the year numbered nearly two and a half million.

Radio Telegraphs

The telegraph staff of the Cape D'Aguilar and General Post Office stations were transferred to the control of the Public Works Department on 1st April last year, the Post Office contining the delivery of messages received at the General Post Office station, and the collection of revenue derived from messages.

The revenue collected during the year from radio-telegrams amounted to $46,113.24 an increase of $14,060. 25 on 1922. The balance of revenue over expenditure amounted to $2,180.71.

The increase in radio telegram business has been chiefly due to the establishment of communication with Canton and Swatow. These two stations—the one managed by Dr. Sun's Administration and the other by a clique of his political opponents—are not registered at Berne under the Wireless Telegraph Convention or recognised by the Central Government of China. Hence no reciprocal working agreement could be made with either. Despite this, communication with each has been effetively carried on, each station collecting its own charges independently of the others.

Miscellaneous

Twelve extra pillar and wall boxes were erected in the Colony during the year, including three in the New Territory. A courier service was also instituted in the Territory.

The Postmaster General, Mr. R. E. Lindsell, notes: The "extra-postal correspondences" mentioned in the 1922 report have been of much the same type. It included one request from a lady in Berlin to be supplied with one Chinese stamp (unused) of every denomination current, for which she enclosed payment in the shape of a 1000 mark note, and an appeal from another lady, in America, calling on me to annihilate "broadcasting" in the Colony."

Admiral Wen Shu-teh, reports a Tsingtao telegram, has contracted to purchase five submarines from America at the price of $100,000 each. He certainly needs a few modern units for his fleet. But where is the money to come from? At present there are insufficient funds available to repair the old vessels.

MACHINE-MANUFACTURED TEA IN CHINA

A Chekiang Firm's Endeavour to Bring the Production of Tea up to Indian Standard

It is a curious fact that in spite of China's ancient traditions as a tea producing country until 18 months ago no attempts had been made to manufacture tea by factory methods. This seems strange in view of the universal application of machinery in India. In China the methods widely used are of the most primitive from. This may be due to the different nature of this industry in China as compared with India. In that country tea is grown on large estates on a large scale, while in China it is left to the country man to cultivate and manufacture tea to some extent as a side line.

A Complicated Process

In India the process followed is an elaborate one for which a large plant is necessary, but from the plucking stage onward the tea is untouched by hand. As a rule the opening buds and two leaves next to them are taken from the tree. During the season these are plucked every seven to 10 day. They are placed in baskets which are emptied frequently and their contents are removed to the factory. Here they are spread on trays of wire netting under cover for some 18 or 30 hours, according to weather conditions until they are in a soft flaccid state ready for rolling. The rolling process consists of breaking up the leaves in order to liberate the juice. This takes place in a revolving drum. A fermentation or oxidation process then follows in which the leave are spread in a cooling house to a thickness of one to two inches. This causes them to undergo a chemical change by virtue of their condition. The process again varies in length of time according to atmospheric conditions ranging from two to three hours. A brief rolling follows prior to the first firing. This process (except in the case of green teas which will be discussed later) must be a gradual heating. Hot air is passed over the leaves which is gradually raised in temperature to 240 degrees Fahrenheit. Usually the leaves are placed on wire trays and they become quite crisp. So far the leaves, the stalks and the buds are together. They therefore require separating which is done by means of a mechanical sifter. They are then sorted into the various grades, and are again fired and packed while warm in lead foil packages. That completes the process and the tea is shipped abroud, or elsewhere.

The Simple Chinese Way

As compared with the process that has been described that practised in China is extremely simple and primitive. For the manufacture of brick tea drying takes place in the sun, while the leaves are spread out on the ground or upon mats. An important product of China is the green tea. This is not a different variety of shrub as is frequently supposed, but is produced from the same leaves, the difference being that of process. In the case of green teas the leaves are first boiled after they are gathered. As already stated in the case of red teas the firing must be very gradual. The boiling destroys certain bacteria so that the fermenting does not take place. The rolling process in China is also most primitive being performed with the hands or even with the feet which if more widely know would probably not increase one's relish for China tea.

A Venture in Chekiang

The introduction of modern methods in the manufacture of China tea is one which is long overdue. This, however, it is interesting to note has already been done by a Chinese firm who bear the name of the Tsing Wah Machine Tea Company. This firm have already set up three factories at Hangchow, Shaohsing and Yuhang respectively. Altogether by machine methods are produced some nine different grades of tea, partly green teas and also brick tea. The process followed is similar to that already described though simpler. In the case of green teas the leaves are first boiled after which they go through two rolling processes and are then dried by artificial heating usually charcoal. The production of tea by machine manufacture proves equally economical as compared with the old-fashioned Chinese methods and can be done at the same cost. Manufacture is quicker, and the important advantage is the cleanliness which to some degree accounts for the preference for Indian teas in England over those from China. So far the sale of manufactured teas from China has been a small one. Most of the output of this firm has been sent to England and America in the form of samples. Whether machine manufactured teas in China will rival the already existing teas in quality and flavour remains to be seen. There will doubtless be many who will hold that the very choice green teas of Hangchow or the brick teas of Keemun and Ningchow will take a good deal of beating.

The uses of scientific methods have made great strides in the manufacture of cotton goods in China of late years and it is not less than probable that the same transition will take place in the manufacture of tea.

JAPANESE COALMINERS ENTOMBED

Tokyo, Aug. 10.

Fifty miners were entrapped in the Iriyama coalmine in Fukushima province yesterday evening when a gas explosion occurred. It is feared that all have been killed. Nine bodies have been recovered up to the present.

The mine, which is in the centre of an important coalfield, has recently been unfortunate, this being the third disaster in 12 months, 20 miners having been killed by an explosion in August, 1923, and 13 miners burnt in a fire in February this year.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, Aug. 11.

Fifty-six bodies have so far been recovered from the Iriyama coal mine, where a gas explosion occurred on Saturday evening. It is estimated that 72 persons have been killed. The mine is stated to be undamaged.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Farmers in the villages round Shanghai are continuing their ceremonious appeals to the god of rain, and some of them have petitioned the City Magistrate to order that there shall be no slaughtering of pigs for the next three days.

JAPANESE STR. AGROUND IN UPPER YANGTZE

Hankow, Aug. 11.

The N.K.K. Unyo Maru grounded in the Upper Yangtze above Wanhsien on the 9th instant. The Japanese gunboat Hotsu has gone to her rescue from Chungking. The N.K.K. Giyo Maru also went from Ichang.

The Unyo Maru has now been beached as there was a danger of her sinking owing to heavy leakage. —Eastern News Agency.

SMUGGLING OF ARMS TO CHINA

Two Arrests at Marseilles

Marseilles, Aug. 11.

The police have arrested two Greek navigators who are alleged to have bought arms and ammunition which they intended to ship to China.—Reuter.

NEW NAVAL RACE ON PACIFIC

Mr. Hanihara's Belief that American Asiatic Fleet Will Be Brought Up to Maximum Strength Permitted by Washington Treaty: Anti-Japanese Feeling Subsiding in U.S.A.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Aug. 8.

That questions like the immigration tangle will never be satisfactorily settled by diplomatic notes or by exchanges of courteous ambassadorial letters, but that these will be settled, if at all, by the people of the nations concerned; that the Pacific coast states of America are beginning to realize that there is grave danger pregnant in taxing the patience of Japan too much and that, therefore, a diminution, rather than a recrudescence of anti-Japanism might be expected for a while; and that a new naval race is on, although within the limitations of the Washington treaty, were some of the statements made by Mr. Masanao Hanihara, Japanese Ambassador to Washington, on his arrival here.

Mr. Hanihara, whose name will go down in history in connexion with the words "grave consequences" and the dramatic sequel to these words, arrived to-day by the Korea Maru.

"Don't tease me with regard to the phrase 'grave consequences,'" he commenced with a smile to the reporters. "These words, as you know, have been distorted from the meaning that they were intended to convey. Mr. Hughes, the U. S. Secretary of State, did not see anything wrong in the phrase; on the contrary, his subsequent notes to me rather give the impression that he was in sympathy with the stand I took. I don't see any reason why I should be expected to be on the defensive in regard to these words."

The smile that lit up his features, a smile that comes so frequently and lasts so long that Mr. Hanihara has been called "Smiling Hanni" in the United States, suddenly vanished. The Ambassador grew serious as he continued: "Questions like the present immigration issue between Japan and the United States cannot be settled satisfactorily by the exchange of diplomatic notes or through ambassadorial channels; if they are to be settled, it must be by the peoples of the countries concerned."

May Not Return.

"Matters in regard to the immigration issue are not necessarily in a hopeless condition. All's well at Washington, and the issue can be taken up by any successor of mine, without any obstacles through my tenure of office, when the time is ripe for such action to be taken."

This is the first reliable intimation we have had that Mr. Hanihara may not return to Washington as Japan's representative. There have been many rumours to that effect, but these have been as quickly contradicted through semi-official channels. Whether by a slip of the tongue or intentionally, Mr. Hanihara did leave an impression that he is not particularly desirous of returning. While the Japanese Government will undoubtedly stand officially by every word and action of Mr. Hanihara, there have been indications that the private consciences even of usually adamant officials are inclined to censure Mr. Hanihara for having translated the Japanese words judai naru eikyo (Mr. Hanihara got his cabled instructions from Tokyo in Japanese) to mean "grave consequences," while the Tokyo authorities meant it to be rendered "painful impression," which these words also mean.

Anti-Japanism Subsiding.

Rabid anti-Japanists on the Pacific coast, according to the Japanese Ambassador, have awakened to the realization that too much Japan baiting is liable to lead to serious trouble. He believed that the wave of anti-Japanese feeling in this part of the United States has reached its crest and from now on will subside for a time. "There is dawning a consciousness," Mr. Hanihara said, "that it is neither the part of wisdom nor of good policy to goad Japan too far, and that justice ought to be done to Japan and the Japanese."

I asked Mr. Hanihara whether it was true that efforts are being made in America to deprive Japanese born in the United States of American citizenship. Mr. Hanihara said he had heard that attempts of this sort were being engineered by a coterie of persons who regard the exclusion clause of the immigration bill as only a part of their general anti-Asiatic campaign, but added that he did not think these people stood the slightest chance of success. "Such a thing would necessitate an amendment to the American constitution," he said, "and so elaborate and so tortuous are the steps that have to be taken to do this that it is not likely ever to be effective—at least not unless the Japanese population in America shows a startlingly rapid increase."

Fresh Naval Race.

In reply to a question Mr. Hanihara said that the United States generally entertained an impression that its naval defence was weak and that she was perfectly within her rights in augmenting her fighting forces on the seas so long as the additions made to her navy did not conflict with the stipulation laid down by the treaty signed at Washington for the limitation of naval armament. "Yes," he said gravely, "there is great danger of a fresh race for naval armaments, and this is a problem pregnant with much trouble for all the world."

In the absence of Mr. Hanihara, Mr. Yoshida, Counsellor of Embassy, will be in charge of the Japanese Embassy in Washington. Mr. Hanihara has not been recalled, it is emphasized, but chose to return in order to make his reports on the spot, so that there may be no further cause for garbled cables or misunderstanding of written documents.

Press Blames All.

The press generally thinks that Mr. Hanihara cannot be held solely to blame for the swift passage of the immigration act with the Japanese exclusion clause. The blame is apportioned to all—the Imperial Government, Mr. Hanihara and the people, on the ground that had the Government a more definite American policy and had the people been better prepared to carry out such a policy, there would have been no need for Mr. Hanihara to have used the words that are now so strictly taken exception to, these words being the strongest used in diplomatic correspondence between friendly nations. "Grave consequences," is a phrase which, the Japanese now realize, means in diplomatic English just one thing—a threat to resort to force.

COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA IN PHILIPPINES

Scheme to Incite Labourers Against Landlords and Employers

Manila, Aug. 8.

It is officially announced that secret documents from Chicago Communist associations, believed to be affiliated with the Russian Soviet, have been received here, outlining a plan to incite Filipino labourers to rise and make war against their landlords and employers without distinction of race. The documents state that the Filipino landlord class is the chief obstacle to the freedom of the workers.

It is understood that the names of prominent Filipinos against whom direct action was to be taken are contained in the documents, but these have not been divulged officially.

The news created a sensation here. It is now thought that the recent scout mutiny may have originated from radical influences in the United States.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

IT was officially announced in Hongkong last week that Commodore E. Grace, R.N., will be relieved in December by Capt. A. J. B. Stirling, C.B.E. Capt. Stirling was in H.M.S. Barfleur in China during the Boxer Rising in 1900. From 1910 to 1913 he served at the Admiralty, and during the European War with the Grand Fleet Flotillas. He was present at the Battle of Jutland, being in command of the Destroyer Flotilla. In 1905 he married Miss Margaret Grierson, daughter of Sir Philip Hamilton Grierson.

THE BIG SWORD MEN OF ANHUI

By No Means Defeated Yet: Not Bandits But Defenders of People from Militarism

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Luchowfu, An., Aug. 6.
(Written from Kuling).

At the time of my last communication this city was quieting down in its alarm over the bandits who were then in possession of Liuanchow. The soldiers seemed to have got the best of the situation. This did not continue long, for the people inside the city were astonished to find themselves besieged at about four o'clock on the morning of Wednesday, July 23. The attackers made their headquarters at a village about three li outside the north gate and attacked the north and west gates. A rain of bullets descended on the buildings in the line of their fire. A number of bullets struck our hospital, one entered at a window and struck a patient who was in the ward. Many people sought protection within our hospital walls and the big brick buildings.

The bandits raised a banner saying they would enter the city that afternoon at five. A very heavy rain delayed their attack which did not succeed. Gen. Ma, Tuli of Anhui Province, arrived with his soldiers and drove off the attackers, but when Gen. Ma went to another part of the district the bandits reassembled.

The bandits as they are called by the people inside the city do not wish to be called "bandits." They still maintain they intend to drive out the militarists. As their numbers are increasing and the military seem unable to cope with the situation, their efforts may be more successful than one would think.

During all this turmoil business is completely paralyzed throughout the district. Such conditions are new to this city and the people have not yet learned to regard bandit outrages with the complacency achieved in other parts of China.

SUPPLIES OF ARMS FOR CANTON VOLUNTEERS

Canton, Aug. 12.

Large quantities of arms and ammunition, viz., 5,000 rifles with 1,200,000 rounds of cartridges, 4,500 Mausers with 2,000,000 rounds of cartridges, and 600 revolvers with 1,140,000 rounds of ammunition, were brought here on board the Norwegian str. Hav on the 8th instant and are now being strictly watched by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's troops. These arms and ammunition were, it is reported, imported in conformity with a contract by the Cantonese Merchants' Corps, but in view of the fact that the Canton Government are disposed to seize them, the leaders of the Merchants' Corps last night convened an emergency meeting at their headquarters. As a result of this meeting, it has been decided that the Vice-Commander and the leaders of the Corps shall interview Dr. Sun and demand the release of these supplies.

In the meantime, the Merchants' Corps last night proclaimed martial law in Canton and made a demonstration. They have adopted a threatening attitude and declare that they will carry out a general strike throughout the city of Canton if their demands are not accepted.

As the Government authorities have disarmed a portion of the Merchants' Corps, the situation has, since this morning, become more threatening than ever.—Eastern News Agency.

ALL goods intended as exhibits at the Third Provincial Industrial Exhibition to be held at Nanking in October may be transported free of Customs and likin duties, says the Chinese press. Local tax offices have received a specimen copy of the shipping forms to be used in transporting such articles. One wonders if enough will be printed, for likin stations are now swarming along local waterways.

ELUSIVE BIG SWORD BANDITS

Farcical Attempts at Capture by Anhui and Hupeh Forces: Launch Robbers Taken

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Aug. 7.

Two of the robbers, who took part in pirating the launch Yinkiang on its way down from Tienmen on July 27, have been apprehended by the police in Hankow.

The military expedition, recently sent up to Macheng and Lotien to deal with the Big Sword Robbers, have not been successful in their enterprise. The reason given is, that when the robbers encounter the soldiers on the Hupeh side of the Hupeh-Anhui border, they retire back into Anhui; and when they meet Anhui troops they retreat back into Hupeh. Because there is no proper co-ordination between the military of the two provinces, the robbers are able to carry on a game of "I'm on Tom Fiddler's Ground" with both sides. It is reported that Governor Hsiao has already communicated with the Tuchun of Anhui, requesting that arrangement may be made, by which their respective armies may co-operate, and so be able to deal with the robbers in an effective manner.

An incident has occurred in Hankow which brings a public company into conflict with the civil authorities, and it will be interesting to see how the issue will be decided.

Ferry Boat Fracas.

Two members of the police force, having occasion to cross the river from Hankow to Wuchang, refused to pay their fares on the ferry boat, which is one belonging to the Ho Ch'uin (Hamonious Spring) Co. A wrangle with the ticket-seller ensued, and on hearing of the affair, the chief of the police ward, Mr. Hsu Feng, sent to have the ticketseller arrested. The managers of the company refused to give him up: and on hearing this Mr. Hsu sent 30 odd men, who arrested two of the managers, and an attendant who serves in the Ho Ch'uin tea-shop. It is said that the men were beaten and insulted before being carried to the police-station, and that a good deal of damage was done in the tea-shop by the breakage of furniture both upstairs and down.

The Ho Ch'uin is a fairly powerful corporation, and they do not intend to take this lying down. They have telegraphed to Peking a full account of the affair, and have also communicated with the Governor, and also demanded that the matter shall have full investigation. Their claim is that the two policemen were in plain clothes, and that their employee had no means of ascertaining if they were really in official employ. On the other hand, Mr. Hsu Feng declares that his men were crossing the river on public business, and that in such a case payment ought not to have been required of them. So far as it appears from the native press, the arrest was illegal, and was moreover a brutal exhibition of the improper use of authority. It remains to be seen whether justice will be done.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND OPIUM

Import Under Licence: More Control of Pharmacies Called for in China

Geneva, Aug. 9.

The Consulative Committee of the League of Nations, dealing with opium and other drugs, today discussed the measures of certain Governments whereby consular agents are authorized, on receipt of telegraphic advice from their Government, to deliver import certificates for opium and other drugs.

The Committee considered these measures permissible and applicable to all Governments. The Committee decided to ask the Governments holding concessions in China to enforce in foreign concessions the provisions of the temporary Chinese regulations for the registration of pharmacies.—Reuter.

CANTON-KOWLOON RAILWAY

An Unfortunate Year: Much Damage by Chinese Troops: Scarcely an Engine Running

Last year was a most unfortunate one for the Kowloon-Canton Railway, according to the annual report just issued. This account states that political unrest in Kuangtung Province continued throughout the year. Naturally the Chinese section was by far the greater sufferer of the two, but as the working of both sections is so interdependent, the misfortunes of either reflect on the other, with the result that the receipts from through traffic compare most unfavourably with those of previous years instead of showing a steady improvement.

Trouble commenced on the Chinese section with the departure from Canton of General Chen Chiungming on January 15. His troops in a panic made a rush for Shek Lung. About 3,000 were got away by rail when all arrangements were upset by retreating troops stopping trains and forcing the drivers to take them where they willed. Chinese Section engines were left standing wherever they happened to be when coal and water gave out.

From this time onwards there was spasmodic and intermittent running of trains until October 27 when all through traffic ceased. There was no express service from April 16 to the end of the year. Conditions gradually went from bad to worse. Chinese section locomotives were run, or kept in steam, night and day by the soldiery without proper attention or repairs, derailments and collisions were frequent until there was scarcely an engine in running order on the Chinese section. Much damage was done to stations; doors and windows being torn out, electrical instruments stolen or smashed, and tickets and documents wantonly destroyed. Of 1,460 tabled express trains only 264 ran and of 730 slow through trains, only 409 ran.

British Section Hampered.

There were occasions when it became necessary for the British section to withdraw from Shum Chun Station and make Lo Wu Siding the terminus, where the Hongkong Government stationed police or military patrols to prevent Chinese soldiers from crossing the border. It was also once necessary to withdraw from the Sha Tau Kok terminus for the same reason.

During the year the British section suffered considerable inconvenience by the retention of its goods stock by the Chinese section. Owing to the commandeering of the Chinese section rolling stock by the military for the transport of troops and military stores, and the general interference with the working of the Chinese section, the British section wagon stock was held up on that section with the result that goods destined for Canton accumulated in the railway goodshed at Kowloon to such extent that many remunerative cargoes amountings to thousands of tons had to be turned away, and several consignments already loaded were eventually withdrawn.

Claim Against Chinese Authorities.

Through and joint sectional traffic receipts amounted to $153,447.25, or $347,367.65 less than the previous year. The fall in receipts, says the report, is entirely due to the conditions prevailing throughout the year on the Chinese section, and a claim for compensation on account of the suspension of the through and joint sectional traffic will in due course be presented.

The local traffic earnings show an increase of $108,304.24, compared with the previous year.

The gross receipts for the year were $474,721.78, or a decrease of $235,573.97. The working expenses exceeded the revenue by $48,791.35.

Maj. and Bt. Lieut.-Col. R. H. Darwall, who has been in the light cruiser Hawkins, flagship of the China Station since August, 1922, is to be relieved in October by Maj. and Bt. Lieut.-Col. A. S. Cantrell, serving with the Portsmouth Division. That officer will become Fleet Royal Marine officer in succession to Lt.-Col. Darwall.

SOUTHWARD HO!

"East, West, Home's Best"

By W. Bruce Lockhart.

Hongkong, Aug. 8.

The day I arrived I thought it would be pleasant to go up to the Peak for a cup of tea. Seated in front of me in the Peak Tramway were a couple of charming ladies whose conversation I really could not help overhearing, and it ran thuswise:—

"Oh, do you know Mrs. Brown?"

"No, erh I don't seem to know the name—By the way, my dear, is she married, or does she live in Kowloon?"

I mentioned this delightful way of putting it to a friend of mine, a Hongkong man, and he smiled wearily—he happens to live in Kowloon—and said, "Yes, some of them are like that!"

They both looked pleasing to me, and later on in the evening when there was a gala night at the Hongkong Hotel with a rather noisy brass band experimenting with foxtrotting melodies I muchly wished that the two charming ladies of the Peak tram had been with me to make Hongkong's idea of an hilarious evening less tedious.

Oh, yes—it was a great gala night and at 11.30 of the clock I counted no less than six couples foxtrotting like anything, and two of the sweet ladies were wearing white cotton stockings, just like any Shanghai transient millionairess! Ah, they have high jinks in Hongkong on their gala nights. A parental government puts the lid on everything at midnight, and these sweet Cinderellas of the Crown Colony hurry home like the good girls they are, taking their white cotton stockings and their nice white canvass ballroom shoes with them ready for the next (Gala-di-dah!)

When the Laconia passed through Hongkong some months ago with her giant freight of globe-trotter peculiarities one of them was overheard in the hotel lobby:—

"Say, d'you know where I can get a dollar's worth of coppers?"

"What in the world do you want coppers for, inquired the patient victim of Messrs. somebody-or-others' enterprise!"

"Waal Sir, I guess I've got to give some tips!"

Fleshpots of the Australia.

Talking of great ships I have never travelled in more luxury and comfort than when I had the good fortune to take passage here by the Empress of Australia. She is a wonderful ship and, to me, possesses the advantage over the other three "Empresses" of being built to do two or three knots an hour slower speed, the happy result for me being that instead of racing down here at 19 knots and landing me in this exciting colony in precisely 48 hours from Woosung, it took about 55 hours, thus giving us a whole morning and afternoon longer on board to enjoy the profound comfort, cleanliness and luxury of the C. P. R. service.

At my time of life things for the stomach have an even greater appeal than affairs of the heart and as there were not any ladies on board who gave me the slightest encouragement anyway, I specialized on the wonderful coffee and fresh cream and the big British Columbian lettuces and spring onions which the C. P. R. people provided for our sustenance.

Oh that coffee and cream—what coffee and what cream! I have always bought never-mind-whose best quality during the years I have inflicted my newspaper lucubrations upon the denizens of Shanghai and have always thought that that particular coffee could not be beaten in the Far East, but sitting at an open window in the Australia's dining room, misty mountains in the distance, sunshine on the quivering azure sea, a cool zephyr wafting in the perfume of the brine—and, a Yarmouth bloater—and, C. P. R. coffee and cream—and toast and butter—and, raspberries and more cream—who wouldn't be a sailor and gladly spend 80 beans on 55 hours of these and other delights?

But, dear people, when you do arrive in Hongkong, and when you once get on shore—then, yes then you wake up—and the only thing to look forward to either in things for the stomach or affairs of the heart is the return trip to Shanghai and a happy celebration of the wanderer's return at the Carlton the same evening!

Eminent Counsel.

By the way, there is a great lawsuit going on here. The International Banking Corporation are bringing an action against their compradore to try and establish his responsibility, under his agreement, for a matter of $200,000 which seems to have disappeared from the bank in September, 1922.

I looked in for half an hour at the hearing of the case and had the extraordinary felicity of hearing eminent counsel examining the young cashier of the bank who was in charge of the cash at the period of the vanishing act.

Eminent counsel was examining him on one of the bank's cash books and persisted in referring to the debit and credit side of the book as "the left hand page" and "the right hand page," and being a former employee of this bank myself I had the greatest sympathy for the somewhat bewildered young man in his efforts to satisfy eminent counsel.

As the book was held upside down, which was the right and which the left became more debateable than ever, likewise the happy expressions "balance in" and "balance out"—so I left them hard at it.

In my time we called them debits and credits, and balances were "brought forward" and "carried forward"—but then we had not become modernized, nor had we enjoyed a course of "business system" training by mail, or had our earning capacity improved by Pelmanism—but, yet, benighted as we were, no doubt, old fashioned slow going Englishmen as we must have been—yet, we seldom totted up the cash book and found a little matter of two hundred thousand dollars had vanished into space!

An Immense Felicity.

I wonder if, on my return to Hongkong, a giant passenger liner happens to have vanished overnight from the harbour and cannot be found when you call her—and the shipping company are bringing an action against the Number One Chinaman who supplies the crew—I wonder if I shall have the great, I may say the immense felicity of hearing eminent counsel in his efforts to describe the stem and the stern of the ship for the enlightenment of the learned judge refer to them as,—I only dare whisper it—as, "her front and her behind, m'Lud"!

That will be all for to-day, thank you.

FOREIGN MAILS ROBBED IN SZECHUAN

Fresh Bandit Activity near Mienchow

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mienchow, Sze., July 13.

The time for holidays has come, and I am writing these notes on the road. We are making our way to Behluhting (White Dear Top). The roads seem quite quiet now, but we have been advised by the Consul-General to acquaint local officials with our movements.

Bandits have still been very active. Below Suining just recently they robbed the mails. A parcel which reached Mienchow on the 14th instant from England had been broken open. It contained toilet requisites and was intact for the most part. One tube of toothpaste had been broken open, four others were left intact and seven had been taken. Six parcels of school materials had been battered or torn open: but as they came so close upon leaving home it was impossible to see whether the goods were intact. Unless Gen. Yang Seng will make the roads safe, the post office may as well give up business.

Means of communications on the West River are becoming normal since the floods have practically subsided. Junks and steamers plying between Canton and Shiuhing have resumed their service. Other vessels on the West River run are also beginning their usual service again. Damage on the Canton-Samshui line has been repaired and the trains are running again between Canton and Sainam.

A VOYAGE IN AN OCEAN-GOING STEAMER FROM HANKOW TO SHANGHAI

From Our Changsha Correspondent.

Judging by the number of ocean-going steamers that were lying in Hankow during the few days we were there, it must be a somewhat commonplace thing to journey in one from Hankow to Shanghai. Nevertheless, in the uncounted number of journeys that I have taken since 1886, I have never had the opportunity of merely having a passing look at Chinkiang and Wuhu (in those days it was a passing look at Nanking) and at Kiukiang. In 1886, I travelled by what was then the oldest boat on the River, the Kiangfoo. For a good many years she was the only steamer that was running in 1886 and still continued to run (if one except entirely reconstructed boats). One of the engineers told me that one of the parts of the machinery bore the date 1842 on it.

I took my place on the Hugo Stinnes boat Emil Kirdorf at Hankow bound for Naples. She turns out to be a fine boat of over 9,000 tons, capable of carrying some 50 passengers, all first class. Some of the passengers came on board in Japan and have had a free side-trip to Tientsin and Hankow—just as those of us who got on at Hankow have just had from Hankow to Shanghai.

We started at dawn on Thursday, August 7, having been delayed some time in Hankow for extra cargo—all to the good of the company, and when the company is so good as this one has been to us, who would grumble? Of course, passengers who travel by cargo boats expect delays. The boats make their money on cargo and not on passengers.

It was just after three when we steamed past Kiukiang, with a head wind stiffened to a pleasant breeze by the ship's motion, and no one who knows the sweltering heat of the Kiukiang Bund on an August afternoon regretted the merely waved good-by. Long before dark we had passed the Little Orphan and so had been able to make the whole of the really beautiful scenery from the iron works below Huang-shih-kang to the Little Orphan in full daylight. Although there was some haze, we were able to get a complete view of the Lushan, and with glasses could pick out many of the Kuling bungalows. The Big Orphan, some little distance inside the Poyang Lake, with the magnificent Lion Precipice, came out quite well.

We had to anchor soon after dark so that we have hardly made better time than the river steamers.

I managed to miss Anking and Wuhu, but we had a fine view of Nanking with the afternoon sun full on it. It was dark before we got to Chinkiang and the row of lights had a very pretty effect.

It certainly is some advantage to get somewhat settled down before putting out to sea—and, if one may draw inference from the exasperating state of Shanghai after 2 p.m. on Saturday afternoon, it is a very great advantage to have no luggage to move in Shanghai.

Nichts Verboten.

We find the boat very comfortable. Most of the officers and stewards speak English; all are most courteous and obliging. Of course, there are regulations; but, such as there are, not inconvenient to the individual and to be clearly recognized as needful for the community. The food is abundant, well cooked and in sufficient variety neither to compel this man to have cheese at breakfast, nor that man porridge, though either may have his choice.

We selected the boat because it calls at Naples and so gives us a chance of working our way up through Italy. But it certainly gives one money's worth for the journey to England: it is more expensive than second class mail, less than first.

We have an orchestra of piano, violin and cello to perform during dinner. On Friday evening we had the overture of "Der Freyschutz" followed by a well rendered cello solo.

TWO YEARS FOR YOUNG FORGER

Tientsin Cheque Case

Tientsin, Aug. 9.

Indicted on two counts for having forged and uttered a cheque for $50 and obtaining goods by false pretences, a young man named Charles Lawrence Clarke alias Hadji Mohammed, was found guilty by the jury at H. M. Provincial Court today, and sentenced by Judge Peter Grain to two years' imprisonment with hard labour and deportation.

In his opening statement for the Crown, Mr. H. P. Wilkinson said prisoner, while employed by the International Express Co., Tientsin, abstracted a leaf from Mr. A. H. Mackay's cheque book, filled it in for $50 with a signature purporting to be that of the firm, and sent it across to the Imperial Hotel asking the manager to cash it, on the ground that the banks were closed. Counsel pointed out to the jury the artfulness of sending the cheque by the firm's coolie. The hotel manager did not know Mr. Mackay, but cashed the cheque, and the money was given by the coolie to the prisoner. The latter, however, had stamped the name of the firm after Mr. Mackay's signature, as though drawing on the firm's account, but the International Express Co. had no account at the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank. The cheque book related only to Mr. Mackay's private account. The irregularity of the signature in this respect facilitated detection of the forgery.

The forgery took place on or about May 1. It was alleged that on May 30 the prisoner obtained five rolls of paper value $150, from a Chinese at Peking, by false representations.

Mr. Alexander Hirsbrunner Mackay stated in evidence that the accused had been employed by the International Express Co., of which witness was manager. He knew prisoner before, when he was in the service the Grimes-Mackay Co. He had a private account only with the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, and usually kept his cheque book locked up in a steel safe, but on May 1, about the time of the Peking races, he rushed away to get to Peking, and could not remember whether he locked the cheque book in the safe or not. He missed it on his return, but it had not been seen since.—"North-China Sunday Times."

THE REAL SECRET OF KEEPING YOUNG

Not Goat Glands But Your Own: The Latest Methods of Recovering Spring-time by Surgery: One of the Operators Now in Shanghai

When recently some articles in our columns raised an interesting correspondence with regard to internal glands and the modern science of transplantation for the purpose of rejuvenation, it was little the writers imagined there was in their midst one of the greatest authorities on the subject. For the moment, however, it is not with a man in our midst that it is intended to deal, but rather with the subject.

One can envy the clever artist who conceived the idea of the rejuvenated grandfather as an advertisement for a now well-known brand of health salts and doubtless all the rival manufacturers are very envious of the firm who secured the artist's services. There is something most appealingly humourous about a very young old man and there must be thousands of people who, when they receive the latest edition of a magazine, run quickly through the advertisement pages in order to see "grandpa's" most recent exploit with the same eagerness that they search the picture section for Bateman's or Heath Robinson's excruciatingly comical productions. Thus is a double purpose served, for we laugh at the advertisement pictures and some of us are tempted to buy the article they advertise and if that article is good then we benefit.

So with the internal glands idea. We all have had our laugh, but the comical side so attracted many people that they studied it possibly without knowing that they were acquiring knowledge on the subject. Humourous artists had their way for a time and pictured the world peopled a generation hence with goats and monkeys with mankind's ideas, or mankind with goats' and monkeys' ideas.

Transplanting Out of Date

What few people seem to realize, however, is that surgical science in this matter has moved very quickly and the transplantation of glands long ago ceased to be the real issue. It was a preliminary step and though it still may play a part in the new treatment, it is not up-to-date now to debate whether a certain revitalized old gentleman has taken some goat or monkey glands into partnership, but whether he has been "steinached," for that is the new verb. One of the best testimonials "steinaching" has received has been the institution by the very businesslike insurance firms in America of a reduced scale on the policies of people who have undergone the treatment.

Dr. Eugen Steinach, Professor of Biology at the University of Vienna, was one of the first biologists able to demonstrate successfully that sex could be materially changed. He took animals, operated upon them and proved beyond question that in many essential functions male could be turned to female and female to male. That as it stood was of no direct medical or surgical benefit to the human race, but it did satisfy Steinach that the theory he was following was correct. This theory perhaps is best explained by a quotation from "Rejuvenation" (Thos. Seltzer, New York, or Kelly & Walsh, Shanghai), a book written by George F. Corners, a student of the system, after consultation with Steinach:—

"We must familiarize ourselves with the importance of the endocrine system. We are what our glands make us. Man is as young as his glands. He is, in fact, the slave of his glands. Modern science teaches us that the growth of our body, the process of metabolism, the shape of our bones, the rate of oxydation, the function of the digestive system, the tone of our nervous system, the action of our brain, are influenced by our glands."

Thus we have it that if the endocrine system is all right the rest of us will be in good order. It is not for a layman to attempt to explain in detail a very delicate surgical operation such as Steinach evolved to put the endocrine system in the order it would be if we all lived perfect lives, but it may be said that the results have gone far beyond Steinach's expectations.

The Secret Let Out

It is known that when the results of observations on the first few cases were reported to Steinach, he exclaimed, "Whatever you do, don't publish those statements. We should be laughed to scorn and all the work would be ruined." But as the cases increased and there were no failures, whilst the joyful subjects themselves were spreading the news, of course the secret was let out and one wonders now what will be the ultimate result. In Steinach's system there is no attempt at restoring health and strength by borrowing from other people or animals—at least not in the first instance—but his is a process of rejuvenation by a reconstruction of what already is there and amounts really to a setting back in years. Steinach expected—or at least hoped for—renewed strength and health: it has been found in addition that hair grows on the bald, eyesight improves, hardening of the arteries, diabetes, gout and various diseases vanish, the chests of lawn bowls players are restored to their proper places and the over-thin fill out to the correct proportions.

Blood Pressure

One can imagine the thoughts of a disciple of Steinach taking a constitutional in a great city. Knowing his power, he could not help mentally remarking:—"Look at that man! He has everything in the world a man could want, except health and a good figure and if only he would come to me I could give him both." It seems that most of our ailments are associated with excessive blood pressure and it is because "steinaching" reduces the blood pressure to something approaching the normal that these marvellous results are obtained. Most wonderful of all is the fact that, although, as previously stated, the operation is exceedingly delicate, it takes but a short time and is performed with the use only of a local anæsthetic, whilst the patient is not inconvenienced at all. As far as present observations go it should be effective for about 10 years: it then may be repeated with equal effectiveness for another 10 years and it is only after the expiration of the second period that there need be recourse to the transplantation of glands. So, provided a man is careful after dark to avoid those roads where the Tramway Company are relaying the track, for Dr. Steinach cannot mend a broken neck, it may even be possible for a fairly young man of to-day who undergoes all the courses in succession after he has passed 55 years, to attend the celebration on completion of the relaying.

A medical work records that Prof. Chetwood, a noted New York biologist, who had performed vasoligation (the surgical term for "steinaching") for a decade with lesser ends in view, reviewed his operation cases after Steinach's discovery, to ascertain any regenerative effects. A number of these cases were passing advanced old age, with unusual vigour and absence of illness. One case was most instructive. The patient was 83 years old when operated upon and Chetwood himself apparently thought the old gentleman was no more, but to complete his investigations he wrote to the family doctor and asked when the patient had died. To his surprise, he was informed that the patient "had just gone south to celebrate his ninety-second birthday!"

An Example of Youth

As mentioned at the beginning of this article it was remarkable that, at the time Shanghai chose to become interested in gland treatment, one of the foremost authorities on the subject should be in Shanghai, no less a person than Dr. Peter Schmidt, of whom it can be said that he really has brought "steinaching" to its present advanced state as regards human beings. Whilst Steinach was experimenting on animals, Dr. Schmidt transferred the results of the knowledge so obtained to human beings and he has secured the biggest collection of clinical material in the world. A representative of the "North-China Daily News" heard of this and called upon Dr. Schmidt with a view to learning more of the subject. Expecting to find at least a man of about 50, serious and studious in appearance, he was surprised to be introduced to a smiling, vivacious young man, who was most pleasantly entertaining, but who promptly closed up at the suggestion of an interview. Dr. Schmidt takes his profession very seriously and made it very plain that he would not depart from medical etiquette. Everyone knows how strict is the medical code and apparently it cannot be relaxed even with regard to such a matter as this, which is so startling and so revolutionary that it advertises itself, even though a doctor cannot issue handbills proclaiming: "If you are over 50, come to me and you can secure a place in the next Interport Rugby team."

When We Are All a Hundred

The only information our representative could get out of Dr. Schmidt was that the science of "steinaching" for some years had been well known on the Continent and now is being taken very seriously in the United States. British people, however, are rather more conservative, but recently at Home they, too, have become interested in the rejuvenation idea. Dr. Schmidt's latest work, "The Theory and Practice of the Steinach Operation," shortly is to be issued by the famous London medical publishing house of Wm. Heinemann. This book has been edited by Dr. J. Johnston Abraham, of London, and included in it is the history of Dr. Schmidt's first 100 cases, also references to 135 medical publications by doctors all over the world in corroboration.

Dr. Schmidt allowed our representative to study a remarkable collection of photographs and to draw his own conclusions. Dr. Schmidt is a great lover of animals and nothing pleases him more than to get a really old, decrepit and thoroughly broken-down dog, "steinach" him and send the old fellow out with a new lease of life.

The interviewer pressed for further details, but Dr. Schmidt politely intimated that he had gone quite far enough and the caller was sent away wondering who he would be interviewing 60 years hence, being at present over 40.

"CALM BEFORE THE STORM

American Admiral on Present Conditions in the Yangtze: Brigands Lying Low

Admiral C. B. McVay, J.R., commanding the American Yangtze Patrol, was the guest of the American Chamber of Commerce at luncheon at the Astor Grill on Tuesday, Mr. V. G. Lyman, acting President of the Chamber in the absence of Mr. P. P. Whitham, who is on leave, presided.

Responding to an enthusiastic greeting by the Chamber, the Admiral said that America could be proud of the advance guard of her business men in the Orient, proud of the progress of American commerce in China and the ever-increasing goodwill in the relations between China and her sister Republic across the ocean. It would be of interest to local business men to know that he felt certain that the river patrol would be augumented as soon as Congress met again to provide the funds for construction of the needed vessels. The Department of the Navy urged that two ships, speedy, of shallow draft, and 150 ft. in length should be assured for the upper reaches of the Yangtze, while closer to Hankow, four were proposed, of a length overall of 200 ft.

Paying a tribute to the splendid efficiency and loyalty of the river captains to their employers, the Admiral went on to remark that he knew they would rather take out their boat half an hour or an hour before the fixed time, than win $50 at poker—which was not usual for a sea-dog who loved poker—and navigation. One master had made this year more than 25 trips—a worthy achievement.

Admiral McVay felt rather insulted, he added, that all the American ships had been fired at but his flagship. Why in all these years bandits and maruders had spared the first of the fleet, he could not understand.

The situation, along the great river had been exceptionally quiet and for the past seven months one would hardly have known that bands of ruffians had formerly lain in wait for the ships to pass. It was so surprisingly still and peaceful that it almost seemed to be the calm before the storm. The U.S.S. Palos, 200 miles above Suifu, and the others at Ichang and Wanhsien all reported ideal conditions.

SERBIA READY TO TAKE RUSSIAN CADETS

Telegram Received by M. Wilden: But Now Unlucky Delay in Raising Money by Lotteries on Which a Large Tax Is Imposed

The French Consul has received intimation from the Minister at Belgrade that the Serbian Government has now agreed to admit into the country the Russian cadets now in Shanghai. The news is very welcome, but unfortunately the International Committee which has interested itself especially in the Cadets is not at present in a position immediately to act upon it, a hitch having occurred in the arrangements made in the matter of funds.

It will be remembered that in April of last year the French Consul-General suggested the establishment of a lottery to provide funds for repatriating the Cadets. An International Committee was formed, and drawing of the first lottery took place in the following September. It was the Committee's original intention to use all available funds in repatriating the cadets, together with their instructors and their families, the group then numbering 560, and Serbia was the country to which it was proposed to send them. At first it was understood the Cadets would be received into the Serbian military schools, but the Government witheld its sanction, and the Cadets had to remain in Shanghai, the result being that the greater part of the lottery proceeds were spent in their maintenance here.

Hitch with Chinese.

At the outset, the lotteries were very successful, there being but little Chinese competition, but the position latterly has not been favourable; for, whereas in the beginning there were only two or three Chinese concerns operating, there are now, or were until quite recently, some 16 or 17, and they tend to increase. In face of this competition, the sale of tickets has substantially decreased. In the first lottery between 80 and 90 per cent. of the total number of tickets was disposed of, but the figure fell to a little over 30 per cent. in the last lottery held, Added to this difficulty, the Chinese authorities have twice stopped the lottery, on each occasion allowing it to be resumed after a good deal of discussion.

The Committee was placed in a further difficulty recently, when the Chinese authorities once more issued an order prohibiting the holding of this lottery. Further interviews took place, and it would seem that the Chinese action was based on financial considerations, permission to resume the lotteries being offered on condition that the sum of $1,000 for each lottery is paid over to the authorities concerned in, or concerning themselves in, the matter. This demand was alternative to others put forward and declined. At the moment, the position remains indefinite, but no doubt satisfactory arrangements will be made for carrying on with the scheme. It is extremely unfortunate that these difficulties should have arisen just at the time when the way is open for repatriating the Cadets, especially as transport arrangements may now more easily be made and at less cost than was the case some months ago.

Many Already Sent Away.

It will be noted with satisfaction that the original number of Cadets for whom the International Committee undertook to provide has been decreased by 165, some of them being sent away and others finding employment here. Independently of the Cadets, 359 persons have been able to leave Shanghai by means entirely provided by the Committee, and 300 more left with some assistance from the same source. It will thus be seen that extremely useful work has been done, and it is to be hoped that, where so many obvious difficulties exist, the Chinese authorities will in future refrain from making the work of the Committee still more embarrassing.

"SAFETY FIRST"

Educating the Unwary Pedestrian by Films

The Traffic Department is always devising schemes for the instruction of Chinese in the gentle art of negotiating Shanghai's ever-growing street traffic. There is a collection of elaborate apparatus at Gordon Road for the instruction of chauffeurs, and eloquent posters and a variety of pictures are used for the purpose of showing pedestrians how to cross the road without disaster, but the process of education is slow.

On notices that the Chinese are beginning to exercise more caution, and greater agility, but there are still numbers among them who persist in regarding the middle of the road as an ideal spot for meditation, who will casually walk from behind one vehicle bang into another, and who also persist in jumping on and off tram cars in full motion.

These little foot-faults will be cured in time, no doubt, and another excellent means of instruction has been adopted. On Monday evening, between the hours of 8 and 10 o'clock, a "safety first" cinema picture, illustrating the perils of the road and ways of avoiding them, was shown on a piece of vacant ground in Markham Road. The exhibition was intended principally for the edification of mill hands coolies, etc., and it is estimated that about 4,500 people saw this excellent free show. The display will be repeated at other suitable places in the Settlement.

MR. Shih Shao-tsen has been elected Chairman of the board of directors of the Chapei Electricity & Waterworks Co., Ld.

MORE ARMED ROBBERIES

$10,000 Haul at Hangchow: Young Woman Carried off

About 7 o'clock on Thursday morning five Chinese, three of whom were armed with pistols, entered a house in Wuchow Road and in five minutes collected money and valuables worth nearly $800.

Late on Wednesday night a gang of seven men raided a small shop in Ward Road, one man with a pistol standing on guard in the roadway, two more with pistols taking up their position at the counter, and the rest, one with a pistol and another with a knife, going to work in the usual way. They first of all demanded to know where the money was kept and, on being told there was none in the place, ransacked the premises, getting together $35 and clothing worth $65. As the thieves were leaving, the proprietor of the shop blew a police whistle, whereupon the robbers fired a couple of random shots, to prevent pursuit, and so got away.

Details of a robbery at Hangchow which resulted in a wealthy family having $10,000 carried off from their home are reported by our Hangchow correspondent.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Aug. 11.

A gang of men entered the residence of a Mrs. Yu, the watchman admitting them and finding the family had not then retired for the night, they bound them all up and covered their heads with cloth. Jewellery and money to the value of some $10,000 was then collected, making eight catties of loot. Before leaving, the robbers are said to have chloroformed and carried off a young lady of the household, but she afterwards escaped. A reward of $1,000 has been offered for information leading to the arrest of the gang or any members of it.

"NEW Shanghai Life," a Russian organ, also complains that the income accruing from the Russian lotteries has been considerably reduced by the action of the Chinese authorities in stopping the sale of tickets in Chinese territory. It is emphasized that money was used for the upkeep of Russian cadets, and the result is that the position of these men and youths is being rendered increasingly difficult.

SEARCH OF ALLEGED GUN-RUNNER

Former U. S. War Vessel Now Chinese Owned: Rumours of Vast War Stores

In the expectaton of finding arms and ammunition on board the S.C.1 formerly a vessel in the service of the American Navy, during the Great War, a party of Customs officers armed with a warrant, searched the vessel, lying, under a Mixed Court injunction, near the Standard Oil Wharf. Though the vessel was gone over thoroughly not the slightest indication was found that arms were on board or that any had ever been on the ship. The U. S. S. Pigeon, by order of Admiral McVay, proceeded to the vicinity and stood by for 48 hours, but when questioned on Monday afternoon, Admiral McVay said that he had no information on the subject of the arms, which might have been on the vessel.

Rumours have been current that as much as $3,000,000 worth of contraband arms and ammunition was involved in the actions of the vessel, but there has been no real foundation for such a supposition. Whether contraband of war had been brought to China to be sold to Wu Pei-fu or to Chang Tso-lin or to Dr. Sun Yat-sen in Canton by the crew and owners of this ship, is not known, and until the truth has been ascertained, fiction will not be of value in determining justice.

It has been definitely stated that the master of the C.S.I, Captain Krebs, has been living in the Savoy Hotel for nearly a month, though whether he returned to his ship at any time or for how long, no one seems to know.

There is a story to the effect that the C.S.I. on approaching the China coast from American shores put into Amoy, where repairs are thought to have been made to the engines. While in that port, the report is, about 8,000 Krag Jorgensen rifles were landed with no less than 1,000 rounds of ammunition for each gun. Scores of rapid fire guns with correct ammunition as well as numbers of machine guns are also alleged to have been sent ashore under cover of night. Wireless equipment of powerful range for use by armies in South China is said, further, to have been part of the cargo.

According to Chinese reports this immense quantity of illegal munitions of war was for none other than Gen. Sun Chang-fang, who at present controls the port of Amoy with the hinterland, and is a thorn in the side of Dr. Sun Yat-sen.

Further rumours are to the effect that a rendezvous was made after the S.C.I had reached Shanghai, and that on the occasion of her departure (for a few days, about a week ago) she proceeded to the vicinity of the Saddles and transferred the remainder of her cargo to henchmen of Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, Tuchun of Chêkiang.

Naval officials, however, point out that even if the S.C.I. had engaged in such contraband trade, she is far too small to have carried such quantities of munitions.

There is no question, however, of the sale of the vessel to Chinese interests in Manila by the American Government, in pursuit of its policy to dispose of ships, which could not be economically used commercially, and the C.S.1, with the 200 or 300 submarine chasers procured during the war from any source possible, was sold. It seems that some difficulty arose between master and owners, and Captain Krebs procured an injunction from the Mixed Court, restraining all persons from moving the ship, prior to the judgment in a civil suit in which he was plaintiff.

"The Mixed Court hereby issues this injunction restraining all parties from moving S. C. No. 1, flying the flag of the Republic of Nicaragua, from its present moorings in the Huangpu River.

"A copy of this injunction is to be sent to the Superintendent of the Customs.

"Another injunction also is issued restraining the second defendant, Ong Che, from disposing, selling or dealing in any way with the said steamer, pendente lite."

DREDGING SOOCHOW CREEK

Much Needed Work At Last Inaugurated by Chinese: Four Dredgers Expected

The work of dredging the Soochow Creek has at last been started, according to the Chinese press.

At 10 a.m. on Sunday, say the newspapers, Mr. Chen Lan-sen, the contractor, had the two dredgers in operation, at the Garden Bridge and the other at Sinza Bridge. Four such dredgers were expected, but two are undergoing repairs, and will join the dredging party in a month's time. Over 40 boats have been engaged for the transport of mud, the boats being divided into two fleets, one carrying the silt to Chataiko, Jessfield, and the other to beyond the Woosung Kiang (the Chinese name for Soochow Creek). The amount of silt the two dredgers can remove is about 150 fang a day.

Officials and others present "at the opening ceremony of the work" were Mr. Fei Chen-lu, Director of the Woosung River Conservancy Office, Mr. Li Yun-sen, Chief Engineer, Inspector Li Shou-peng, Lu Chun-ku and Fan Li-sen, engineers, and Messrs. Chen Wei-hsin and Ho, Huang, Pang and Lu, work overseers. Mr. Fang Chiao-peh, Chairman of the Woosung Irrigation Society, was absent owing to indisposition.

ARMS RUNNING A CAPITAL OFFENCE

Chinese Report of New Law Framed by Peking

It is reported that the Ministry of War is advocating the infliction of exemplary punishment upon smugglers of arms, and that a new law has been framed providing the death sentence for any smuggler that has supplied arms and ammunition sufficient to equip a force of 200 or more men (says the Chinese press). The provincial officials will, it is said, be authorized to apply this extreme penalty in a few days.

In this regard, a Peking telegram confirms the above report by stating that the Waichiaopu is negotiating with the Diplomatic Body on the question of controlling the import of arms and punishing offenders more severely. It is also reported that the Ministry of War and the Ministry of Interior are jointly framing certain regulations, which will enable the military and police authorities in the provinces to search for and dispose of smuggled arms.

As regards foreigners, the Federation of the Street Unions at Shanghai has requested the Waichiaopu to negotiate with the Diplomatic Corps with a view to bringing into force as severe a penalty as possible in cases of arms-smuggling within the Settlement.

U. S. DIPLOMATIC SERVICE REFORM

The passage, on May 24, 1924, of the Rogers Bill, described as an Act for the re-organization and improvement of the Foreign Service of the United States, provided for a uniform salary scale, interchangeability between diplomatic and consular services, representation allowances and retirement. In commenting upon this legislation Mr. Charles E. Hughes, U. S. Secretary of State, says that the service is now "democratized and Americanized through a scale of compensation allowances which eliminate the necessity for private incomes, and is definite in its assurances that men who have spent their lives in the service will not be left devoid of resources when the age of superannuation arrives." In conformity to its regulations on July 1, 32 officers were retired from the Diplomatic and Consular Service. There remain in the Foreign Service 28 representatives of Class I, in which Mr. Nathaniel B. Stewart, Consul-General, at Tokio is included; 19 in Class II, in which Mr. Edwin S. Cunningham, Consul-General, Shanghai, is included; 44 in Class III; 50 in Class IV; 60 in Class V; 81 in Class VI; 90 in Class VII; 115; in Class VIII; 2 in Class IX, and 140 unclassified.

GOLD MEDAL FOR A BANK COOLIE

Reward for Capturing Armed Robber on Bund: Six Months Wages Also

The Chinese Bankers' Association presented last week to Chien Nan-san, bank coolie, a gold medal as a token of their appreciation of his successful attempts to prevent the theft of $6,000 from his person, as he was conveying it from one bank to another. It will be recalled that Chien was the leading character in the attempted daylight robbery on the Bund several weeks ago, when a well-educated Chinese youth, who had been viewing "crime" motion pictures, took a pistol, he said he found it, and stuffed silver foil covered pellets of paper into the barrel and chambers to resemble bullets. The plucky coolie-messenger has, in addition to the medal, been given six months' wages by his firm.

The following is a translation of a letter addressed to the Commercial Bank of China by the Chinese Bankers' Association, Shanghai:—

Shanghai, Aug. 7, 1924.

Commercial Bank of China,
Shanghai.

Dear Sirs,—With reference to the case of attempted robbery in the middle of last month from your messenger Chien Nan-san, while he was on the way to remit money to the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, it was due to his daring and vigorous struggle that the public money was safely protected and that the robber was caught. His brave action is worthy of praise.

As cases of robbery have been increasing by leaps and bounds recently, our bankers feel afraid of the risk of transporting money to and fro. Although the necessary precautions against robbery have been arranged, it is expected that if better co-operation exists among the different members of the community, more satisfactory results will be achieved. If the servants of every bank will act and fight as bravely as Chien Nan-san the hearts of the robbers will be frightened at least to some extent, and it will cause a real good impression on the people in the locality as to their safety.

For the sake of encouragement, this Association especially made and presents herewith a gold medal to your messenger on account of his faithfulness and courage.

DRY WEATHER AND THE FARMER

Processions of Priests Praying for Rain throughout Shanghai District

The Chinese farmer, like his brother of the West, is a confirmed meteorological pessimist. He is always grumbling about the weather. Apparently, this is a farmer's special privilege, since the fortunes of his house are so closely connected with sunshine and rain, or the lack of either at appropriate times

Local agriculturalists seem to be getting anxious about the scarcity of rain these days, and appeals to the deity of the clouds are increasing in number—and dignity? In the countryside round about Shanghai processions are taking place almost daily, organized with the object of notifying the rain god that the crops are in urgent need of moisture. One notable display of this character was observed a few days ago in the Kiangwan district, the main feature of it being a huge figure, somewhat resembling the giants drawn on little trolleys which are given prominent places in funeral processions, and this strange celestial intermediary had a host of scarlet robed priests in attendance. The giant was drawn miles around the country bordering the race course, and at one point came into quaint contrast with modernity, in the form of a motor lawn mower. The clash left science and superstition supremely indifferent.

The ceremony has not yet produced rain, but obviously the priesthood and that strange rag-tag-and-bob-tail which follows the ecclesiastical profession in China have benefited, and perhaps this fact may to some extent account for the number of ceremonies held.

A glance at the rainfall record shows that there has been no striking difference as compared with the same period last year. July was, as usual, a very dry month, there being 27 days entirely without rain, and only .33 inches for the rest of the month, while the rainfall for August has so far been .24, with seven fine days out of 10. In August last year, nine days out of the first 10 were dry, with a slight fall of rain on the 10th, but a fall of 7.83 was registered during the preceding month.

So far as the local crops are concerned, the farmers' seeming anxiety has not yet been reflected in the Shanghai markets. Supplies of all kinds are adequate and fruits and vegetables are plentiful and cheap. It has been a great season for melons—Pootung's special product—and there has been a fine crop of tomatoes. Prices are quite normal all round, and no shortage is anticipated provided the present dry spell is not prolonged into an abnormal drought.

A CHINESE SPECIAL CONSTABULARY

Street Unions' Latest Suggestion for Dealing with Robber Menace

A proposal to enrol Chinese special constables to tackle the robber menace, made by the Federation of Street Unions, is stated by the Chinese press to have been favourably received by Major A. Hilton Johnson. The acting Commissioner of Police having, it is said, asked for further details of the scheme, the Federation has drawn up the following conditions of service:—An applicant must be from 25 to 45; he must be strong and healthy; he must not be addicted to any bad habit; he must be docile in nature and courageous in action; he must be able to read and write a little; he must be engaged in legitimate trade; he must be able to furnish shop security of an approved description.

A petition on this question, signed by the street unions and bearing also the chops of other public organizations, is in course of preparation for submission to the Municipal Council.

Each union has been asked to submit a list of candidates with the above qualifications.

FOREIGNER ATTACKED BY CHINESE

Unpleasant Affair in Shanghai Lodging House

An incident of interest to the foreign population of the Settlement, in which some 10 or 12 Chinese employed at the Central Buildings, a lodging house combined with a dining room, assaulted a foreigner, a guest, occurred on Monday, morning and night. It seems that the gentleman, who had been staying there for some time, had been recently in the hospital undergoing an operation in both ears for mastoids, and naturally as a consequence, was weak, unable to defend himself, and probably a bit irritable.

What the trouble was on Monday morning has not definitely been ascertained but an assault took place, in which the foreigner was severely beaten about the lower limbs and chest and back, but at night, matters became worse and the gentleman left his quarters in a hysterical condition and proceeded to the Chocolate Shop and went to pieces entirely. He struggled to pull himself together and called up the manager of the company where he was employed, and in a frantic manner tried to describe to him what had happened. Not making himself at all clear, except that he gave the impression that he was afraid that someone was going to beat him to death, he aroused the interest of the man holding the receiver, who hurried on his clothes, (he had been preparing for bed) ordered his car and drove to the Chocolate Shop. He found his employee in a bad state, nerves all gone and partially unconscious. A youth on his motorcycle went for a physician and afterwards the injured men was thought fit enough to return to the Central Buildings, just a square distant.

Accompanying his assaulted friend, the gentleman, returned to the lodging house and took him to his room, where he left him. He had hardly got to the lower door, when he heard screams; he dashed up again and found the servants again attacking the sick man. A general mêlee ensued in which the Chinese got the worst of it.

He gathered up his friend and took him with a few belongings. At the foot of the stairs a chunk of wood was thrown at him, but that was the end of the trouble.

Reports on Tuesday afternoon indicate that the injured man is resting quietly in his new quarters.

ARMS SEIZED IN CAFE

Italian Charged: Quantities of Mauser Ammunition Found

Early on Wednesday morning a party of police raided the Broadway premises known as the Café Geneva, the proprietor of which is an Italian named T. S. Lelli, suspecting that smuggled arms and ammunition were to be found on the premises. The following seizures were made:

Seven automatic pistols, with 3,209 rounds of ammunition, three .32 and four .25 pistols, with 398 rounds, and 2,820 rounds of Mauser ammunition.

Later in the day Lelli was brought up at the Italian Consular Court, charged with trafficking in arms. He was remanded in custody.

It was announced last Friday in the "Sinwanpao" that, upon representations by Mr. Hsu Yuan and Gen. Ho Feng-ling, the Peking government has decided to provide $100,000 for the purpose of rapatriating the 600 Russians marooned at Woosung.

The local foreign lawyer who, readers may remember, some time ago addressed an inquiry to the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce regarding the custom usually observed in dividing jewellery bequeathed to members of a Chinese family by a deceased member, has been told that there is no established custom.

AVIATION IN BRITAIN

London, Aug. 12.

Ten famous fliers competed in the 950-miles flight round Britain for the King's Cup, starting at Martlesham, Suffolk, passing Edinburgh, Dumbarton and Falmouth and finishing at Lee-on-Solent.

Mr. Cobham, who was second last year, piloting a Siddeley-Puma, won with an average speed of 105½ miles per hour. Mr. Bulter, on a de Havilland, was second, and Mr. MacMillan, of world-flight fame, piloting a Fairey seaplane, was third.

Lieut. Jones, R.A.F., on a Siddeley-Siskin, accomplished the flight in the best time of 7 hr. 20 min. 52 sec.

Four competitors retired owing to accidents, including Mr. Courtney, last year's winner, who, flying a Siddeley-Siskin, crashed his under-carriage at Newcastle. Mr. Baird, flying a seaplane with two passengers, had a thrilling escape; he lost his propeller in mid-air, but manage to descend safely at Durham. Mr. Barnard collided with a hayrick and broke his propeller at the Ayr race course.

Lieut. Jones was scratch, Mr. Cobham received 3 hr. 4 min. 12 sec., Mr. Butler received 2 hr. 6 min. and Mr. MacMillan 2 hr. 29 min. 12 sec.

Colonel the Master of Sempill's late arrival at Lee-on-Solent caused some anxiety. His handicap was 3 hours 32 min. and his flying time 13 hours 0 min. 43 sec. His machine was a super-marine Napier Seagull amphibian.—Reuter.

HEAVYWEIGHT BOXING AT WEMBLEY

American Wins with Knockout in Third Round

London, Aug. 9.

The spectators numbered 64,000.

In the first round, Gibbons rushed in with heavy blows to the body but Bloomfield more than once steadied him with powerful lefts.

In the second, while the American was raining short-arm blows to the body Bloomfield was going for the head. Near the end of the round Gibbons floored the Englishman with a left hook to the jaw. He staggered to his feet at the count of six, but was again floored, the bell saving him from being counted out.

In the third, Bloomfield came out very groggy. The American sent a right and lefts to the head which floored him. Bloomfield rose, but another punch knocked him out.—Reuter.

COMPANY MEETINGS

COMPANIES WINDING UP

Pengkalan Durian Estate, Ld., and S'hai Sanitary Laundry Co. in Liquidation

The final general meeting of the Pengkalan Durian Estate, Ld., was held at the offices of Messrs. J. P. Bissett & Co., Ld., 12 The Bund, on Tuesday, for the purpose of examining the account of the liquidator showing the manner in which the winding up has been conducted, the company being in voluntary liquidation, and the property of the company disposed of. Mr. A. E. Stewart, the Liquidator, presided.

The Chairman, having laid the account on the table for examination, read a letter from Mr. R. F. le Mesurier, the Official Receiver, stating he had received the account of the winding-up of the company and had no comment to offer; he had no objection to the final meeting being held.

The Chairman then proposed:

That the account submitted to this meeting showing the manner in which the winding-up has been conducted, and the property disposed of, be received and adopted.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

This concluded the business.

Steam Laundry Co.

The final general meeting of the Shanghai Sanitary Laundry Co., Ld., also held at the offices of Messrs. J. P. Bisset & Co., 12 The Bund, for the purpose of examining the account of the liquidator, showing the manner in which the winding-up of the company (in voluntary liquidation) had been conducted and the property disposed of Mr. A. E. Stewart, the Liquidator, presided.

The Chairman laid the accounts on the table for inspection, and read a letter received from Mr. R. F. le Mesurier, the Official Receiver, in which the latter stated that he had received the Liquidator's account of the winding-up of the company, in accordance with the Hongkong Companies' Ordinance, and saw no objection why the final meeting should not be held.

The Chairman then proposed:

That the account submitted to this meeting showing the manner in which the winding-up has been conducted and the property of the company disposed of, be received and adopted, and that the books and accounts and the documents of the company be retained by Messrs. J. P. Bisset & Co. (the late secretaries and general managers of the company), 12 The Bund, Shanghai, they undertaking to destroy the same on dissolution of the company, excepting that they undertake not to destroy the register of shareholders until all of 12 shareholders mentioned in the Liquidator's account as not having claimed warrants in their favour for return of capital, have such return of capital.

Mr. G. M. Hummel seconded and the resolution was carried.

This concluded the business.

CHINA ASSOCIATION MEETING

Powers' Duty to Offer Mediation in China: No Surrender Yet Possible of Treaty Rights: What League of Nations Has Done for Other Countries

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

The annual general meeting of the China Association was held on Wednesday, July 23, at 3.30 p.m. at the office of the P. & O. Steam Navigation Company, 122, Leadenhall Street, E.C., who again placed their board room at the disposal of the Association.

Mr. David Landale took the chair and was supported by the Rt. Hon. Sir John Jordan, P.C., G.C.M.G., Mr. Byron Brenan, C.M.G., Mr. G. B. Dodwell, Mr. R. H. Hill, Mr. H. D. C. Jones, Mr. H. H. Joseph, Mr. L. N. Leefe, Mr. D. C. Rutherford, Mr. F. Salinger, Mr. A. M. Townsend, Mr. T. H. Whitehead, and Mr. R. C. Wilcox (members of the General Committee for 1923/4). The following gentlemen were also present: Mr. F. Anderson, Mr. Robert Kerr, Mr. O. T. Cousins, Mr. H. W. Dalby, Major R. B. Denny, Mr. E. A. Dent, Mr. W. N. Elcome, Mr. W. Fisher, Mr. J. S. Haskell, Mr. W. B. Kennett, Sir James H. Stewart Lockhart, Lt. Gen. Sir George Macdonogh, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., Mr. H. A. J. Macray, Dr. O. Marriott, Mr. J. R. Michael, Mr. S. H. Michael, Mr. W. Adams Oram, Mr. H. A. Ottenill, Mr. W. G. Pratt, Mr. G. A. Richardson, Mr. H. G. Simms, Mr. R. A. Stanton, Sir Gershom Stewart, K.B.E., and Mr. H. J. Stockton.

After the Secretary had read the notice convening the meeting, the Chairman, in proposing the adoption of the annual report and accounts, made the following speech:

The report and accounts have been in your hands for some days, and with your permission I will take them as read. Your committee regret that they are unable to record any improvement in the political situation in China. No steps, as far as we know, are being taken by the three military leaders to compose their differences and establish a Central Government. Trade generally has been much hampered by piracy and the general unrest in the country. That so large a volume of business is transacted in spite of the existing conditions speaks volumes for the energy and perseverance of Chinese traders and foreshadows what might be done in more favourable circumstances.

The Great Powers' Duty.

In addressing you last year I pointed out that I believed that an offer by the Great Powers to mediate would be welcome. Since then we have had more than one instance of a European country being set upon its feet by the assistance of the League of Nations, but these results have been attained by the acceptance of the advice given in the spirit in which it was offered. It is to be hoped that the Great Powers concerned will before long turn their attention to China, for I know of no larger nor more promising field in which to find employment for the many factories of this country. But in advocating mediation on the part of the Powers in order to hasten the establishment of a Central Government in China, it is necessary to sound a note of warning. We do not think that the time has come for any modification of the Treaties under which foreigners reside in China and under which foreign trade is carried on in that country. Our views upon extraterritoriality are clearly set out in the Report and I cannot too strongly emphasize the concluding paragraph, which reads:—

"If China wishes to modify her present international status, her first duty is to put her house in order, and then, following the example of the neighbouring Empire of Japan, to undergo a long course of preparation, not merely in remodelling her legislation, but in training officials who can be trusted to have it honestly enforced."

Crown Leases.

As you will gather from the report, an unfortunate position has been reached in the negotiations for the renewal of Crown Leases in certain Treaty Ports. We were led to believe that the officials at the Foreign Office recognized that H.M.'s Government, in acquiring the original lease of the land from the Chinese Government, were merely acting in a fiduciary capacity in the interests of those who wished to acquire land for the purposes of the conduct of their business.

Since the accession of Mr. MacDonald's Government to power, however, a decision has been arrived at that full advantage should be taken of the wording of the present Crown Leases and as large a sum as possible be extracted from the lot-holders for renewal of their leases, and whereas the British Government originally assisted traders to establish themselves at the Treaty Ports in order to facilitate their business a considerable portion of which was the marketing of British goods, the Government of to-day is by this recent decision greatly hampering the expansion of such business.

In the House of Commons on Wednesday, the 16th instant, Mr. Jowett, the First Commissioner of Works, in replying to Mr. Foot Mitchell, stated that 64 per cent. of the leaseholders had expressed their willingness to accept the new terms, that 29 per cent, had said nothing, and that only 6½ per cent. were opposed. I am not aware from what source Mr. Jowett obtained this information, but we telegraphed to Tientsin to inquire how the matter stood, because, at the instance chiefly of the Tientsin Committee, we have been actively negotiating with the Foreign Office in this matter. The reply that has been received this morning from Tientsin reads as follows:—

Referring to your telegram of 17th, estimate that Tientsin alone represents fully 30 per cent. total value involved; as far as we can ascertain only one application for renewal made from here, remainder opposed to. Stop. With regard to Hankow, their interests equally large; they have informed us nobody has accepted, therefore we estimate Tientsin and Hankow alone represent 60 per cent dissentients."

I do not think that many of the lot-holders in the smaller ports have agreed to the terms offered by the Government, though one or two may have done so in order to enable them to rebuild for urgent reasons. It would appear as though Mr. Jowett has transposed the figures, but as he is willing to receive a deputation on the subject the opportunity will be taken of asking him to explain his statement. It is to be hoped that eventually some reasonable terms of renewal of those leases will be offered.

Trademarks.

The position as regards the registration of trademarks in China is also a very unsatisfactory one. The Chinese Government have promulgated a law which the British Government is unable to recognize until some essential safeguards are introduced. The chief objections to the law as it stands are that the provisions for dealing with the settlement of disputes encroach upon our extra-territorial rights under existing Treaties, also that registration by a Bureau which is not properly equipped with expert knowledge would afford little if any protection. The fees are very high and in time to come are apt to lead to registration for revenue. It is much to be regretted that the Chinese Government does not place the registration of trademarks under the supervision of the Inspector General of Customs as agreed under the Mackay Treaty.

Mr. H. H. Joseph then seconded the motion that the report and accounts should be passed, which was carried unanimously.

Officers and Committee.

The next item on the agenda was the election of the President, and it was proposed by Mr. David Landale that Sir John Jordan should be elected for the coming year. The proposition was seconded by Mr. F. Anderson and carried unanimously. Mr. F. Anderson then rose to propose the election of Mr. L. N. Leefe as Chairman; Sir Gershom Stewart, K.B.E., as Vice-Chairman; and Mr. R. Chatterton Wilcox as Hon. Secretary for the ensuing year. Mr. H. D. C. Jones seconded the motion, which was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

The election of a General Committee was next discussed. It was proposed by Mr. W. Adams Oram and seconded by Major R. B. Denny and the following gentlemen were elected:—

Viscount Inchcape, Sir John Jordan, Lt. Gen. Sir George Macdonogh, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., Sir Walter C. Hillier, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sir Alfred Dent, K.C.M.G., Sir Gershom Stewart, K.B.E., Sir J. Stewart Lockhart, K.C.M.G., Sir Frederick Bourne, C.M.G., Major W. S. Nathan, C.M.G., Mr. F. Anderson, Mr. Byron Brenan, C.M.G., Mr. J. S. Bruce, Mr. Geo. B. Dodwell, Mr. W. Fisher, Mr. J. S. Haskell, Mr. Robt. H. Hill, Mr. W. B. Kennett, Mr. H. D. C. Jones, Mr. H. H. Joseph, Mr. David Landale, Mr. L. N. Leefe, Mr. H. A. J. Macray, Mr. C. H. Pearson, Mr. H. W. Robertson, Mr. D. C. Rutherford, Mr. Charles V. Sale, Mr. F. Salinger, Mr. H. G. Simms, Mr. H. A. Stewart, Mr. A. M. Townsend, Mr. A. G. Morey Weale, Mr. T. H. Whitehead, Mr. R. C. Wilcox, and Mr. A. G. Wood.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Unburied Coffins.

The following letter has been addressed to the Consular Body:—

Council Chamber,
Shanghai, August 1, 1924.

SIR,—I have the honour to allude to the Council's letters of March 23, 1920, January 13 and December 19, 1921, to your predecessors on the subject of the nuisance caused by the dumping of unburied coffins close to the Settlement boundary off Kiaochow Road.

The Council is informed that the practice of dumping coffins on the site in question has again been resumed, and that coffins to the number of 100, approximately, are so deposited at the present time.

I have the honour, therefore, to request that you will be so good as to arrange with the Chinese Authorities for the removal and burial of coffins as heretofore, and to prohibit in future the depositing of coffins in this locality.

STIRLING FESSENDEN,
Chairman.

E. S. CUNNINGHAM, Esq.,
American Consul-General and Acting Senior Consul.

Excerpts from Minutes.

Tramways — Overcrowding.—Attention is drawn to the unsatisfactory state of overcrowding on tramcars, and it is not considered that the Company is making any effort to cope with the situation. After discussion, the view obtains that strong action should be taken to bring home to the Company its obligations in the matter, and the following remedial measures will be suggested for adoption, namely, the appointment of foreign supervisers to make frequent inspections of the cars, and the fixing of a maximum number of passengers to be carried, the maximum to be shown in the interior of each car. It is also decided that in the event of the Company failing to satisfy the Council that it is taking all possible steps to meet the requirements laid down, proceedings against the Company will be resumed.

Armed Robbers—Services of Volunteer Corps.—In connexion with the detailing of a certain number of the Corps to assist the Police in rounding up armed robbers, a member inquires whether such parade is entirely voluntary, or whether a section of the Corps is compulsorily mobilized for the purpose. As this is the first occasion on which the services of the Corps have been utilized for a purpose such as this, he considers it desirable that the position should be clearly defined. After discussion it is agreed that the attendance of the Corps must of necessity be voluntary, but that such Volunteers are understood and intended by the Council to be definitely called out by the Council in aid of the Civil power.

A report by the Commandant on the calling out of the Volunteers for the recent round-up has been circulated to members.

Smuggling of Firearms.—The Chairman informs members that he has had an informal discussion with representatives of the Shipping Companies and the Consular Body, and the Commissioner of Customs, to consider what action can be taken to improve the present position with regard to the smuggling of firearms. As a result of the discussion it was agreed that a Committee should be appointed to go into the whole question, following which he has received a recommendation from the Acting Commissioner of Police as to the constitution of such a Committee. It is suggested that the Committee should consist of a member of Council, a member of the Watch Committee, a member of the Consular Body, the Commissioner of Customs, two members to represent shipping companies and a representative appointed by the French Consul. A member's suggestion is approved that Mr. Harold Dollar and a representative of the N. Y. K. be asked to represent the Shipping Companies, and it is also considered that a Chinese should be asked to serve on the Committee. The Chairman consents to act as Chairman of the Committee, and it is considered desirable that the Committee be constituted with as little delay as possible.

Silver.

After having been as low as 33 1/8d., ready and forward, the price comes to-day as 33 1/8d., ready and forward, against 34 3/8d. ready and 34 1/16d. forward a week ago, showing declines of 1/16d. and 1/4d. on the respective prices. India and China have been reported as operating both ways, whilst the Continent bought.

Bars in stock remain unchanged at 2,622, including silver Y. 10 lakhs. Stocks of sycee and dollars amount to Tls. 397 1/2 lakhs and $433 lakhs, against Tls. 392 lakhs and $433 lakhs last week, and Tls. 228 1/2 lakhs and $297 lakhs on August 14, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation at T.T. 3/3d., where it remained until shortly after opening on Tuesday, when it dropped 1/4d. to 3/2 3/4d. On opening on Wednesday morning, it dropped another 1/4d. to T.T. 3/2 1/2d., where it still remains. Bills have been offering rather more freely this week than for a long time past. For the past few days the Chinese speculators have been very active, but yesterday they were quiet, doing practically nothing. The market all forenoon was quiet and steady, with sellers at T.T. 3/2 13/16d. August, 3/2 7/8d. September, 3/3d. October. Gold $ T.T. 73 3/8 August, 73 1/2 September and 73 5/8 October. We closed for the tiffin interval at these quotations, with practically nothing doing.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Better Business in Piece Goods and Indications of Further Rise in Italians

Aug. 16.

There has been a slight improvement in the markets during the past week and piece goods were noticeably brighter. Also there has been more doing in cotton and yarn, though the markets are closely following the New York fluctuations. The produce markets remain quiet.

Piece Goods.

The total of business actually done by indent firms during the week was not great, but there have been considerably more inquiries about and Szechuan has been buying fair amounts. Newchwang also has come forward and now that the floods are believed to be subsiding, merchants from the Yangtze ports are taking a little more interest in business. Generally speaking, not only as regards indent, but also auction business, the time has arrived when interest chiefly is centred on future happenings and how the estimates of the new crop are going to affect prices all round. Dealers who do business only with indent houses are somewhat fearful at the moment about engaging in any definite transactions, in anticipation of a further drop in cotton. In New York it fell another 61 points on Thursday, which made a total drop of 550 points in four weeks. Prices at the beginning of June were regarded as reasonably cheap in the event of the crop being about the size now estimated, but many things have happened since then to make the outlook less favourable. Certainly there is not an over-supply of cotton, so further violent fluctuations would seem to be unlikely. The effect on auction values of the recent drop has been only slight, which may be attributed to the small supplies offered and the healthy state of some of the markets. Really the principal feature of the week, both with indent and auction firms, has been the remarkable improvement in deliveries. The largest shipment to Korea since Febraury is recorded and the figures as regards Italians and Venetians are very much higher all round.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—Business still is confined more or less to speculative operations in line with American quotations. Due to American reports, local cotton and yarn both declined during the week, but yesterday there was a rise of 40 to 50 points in cotton. Quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—August, 49.5; September, 44.50; October, 42.90; November, 42; December, 41.30; January, 41. There has been insufficient business to justify spot quotations.

Yarn.—The market remains steady. With local stocks very much reduced, higher prices have been quoted and occasionally paid. Quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange yesterday were:—August, 179.30; September, 178.30; October, 174.50; November, 170.40; December, 168.40; January, 168.10.

American Cotton.—New York quotations have continued to decline and, even though they advanced on Thursday, still they are below last week's level, the latest figures, on a steady market, being:—Mid-American, October, 27.65; December, 27.05; January, 26.97; March, 27.20; May, 27.30; spot, 30.20. Highest October, 27.90; lowest, 27.25. On the same day the Liverpool market also closed steady, at the following quotations:—Fully middling, October, 15.53; January, 15.22; spot, 17.08.

Indian Cotton.—Thursday was a holiday and the market was closed, so that the latest quotations are Wednesday's, which, on a firm market, were:—Fully good Broach, April/May, Rs. 528; fully good Bengal, December/January, Rs. 451; fine Oomra, December/January, Rs. 505.

Sampin.—The latest quotations on the Osaka Exchange are:—

	Thursday Afternoon	Yesterday Afternoon
August	Y.325.90	Y.327.90
September	318.90	319.40
October	312.50	313.00
November	306.90	307.00
December	302.90	302.80
January	301.00	300.90
February	300.90	300.60

Messrs. A. B. Rosenfeld & Son, in their weekly report, issued yesterday, state:—

China Cotton.—The market has been unsettled, with violent fluctuations, causing considerable nervousness throughout the world cotton markets. At the close, Mid-Americans declined some 118 points for October and 115 points for spot, in consequence of which our market responded in sympathy. The movement was rendered more vigorous on the bear side, and values were carried 50 points below the last level, and with a weak understone. Crop news during the week has been rather favourable, but the drought in Kiangsu and Chêkiang provinces has been partially relieved and must now be considered a less serious matter. Taking the belt as a whole, however, we continue to feel that conditions so far are well up to the average. As to the ultimate course of prices, a conservative police appears to be desirable for the immediate future. The situation continues to hinge on the future climatic developments and trend of the world markets, as well as the attitude of professional operators.

The following is supposed to be up-to-date of the China cotton crop for 1924 given by the Chinese Mill Owners Association from various reports received by them from the entire cotton belt up to July 31. Acreage, 31,949,985 mow, increase 8.1 per cent. as compared with last year. Yield expected, 7,076,156 piculs, discrease 1 per cent. as compared with last year.

EXTRACTS OF CORRESPONDENCE.

Tungchow, August 11.—The writer took a forty li ride, and he found the fields are well cultivated, and these that have been worked look green and luxuriant; in short a very promising outlook.

Shanghai & Districts, August 12.—The plant is healthy and fields are free of grass. Last showers have not been general and insufficient; we need heavy rains in order to improve the general condition.

Chêkiang Province, August 10.—Weather hot and dry. Crop reports, however, are favourable. What is essentially wanted is rain.

Yangtze Valley, August 9.—Weather conditions in the valley could hardly have been more favourable.

Hupch Province, August 7.—It is reported that about 20 per cent. of the Kaishang cotton has been damaged by the floods in the districts of Wuchang-shang and Hwongkan.

Hunan & Shensi Provinces, August 8.—Weather fine. Crop reports so far are very favourable.

Shantung & Chihli Provinces.—Unchanged since last report.

Yarn.—The market during the past week has been quite brisk. New business for export has been booked, some 9,000 to 10,000 bales in all counts of various chops, at an advance of one to two taels as compared with last week's level, and over 6,000 bales direct business with the mills has been recorded at prevailing prices and the market closed with a steady understone.

China Cotton.—A little activity for spot deliveries transpired during the past week at ruling rates, but the bulk of the business contracted was for forward deliveries at about the same prices as those quoted in the Cotton Exchanges, where during the greater portion of the week the trend was on any ascending scale and only toward the close commenced subsiding by reason of a fair volume of liquidation on the part of those who decided for the time being on profit-taking. The prevailing sentiment, however, is for a realization of higher values based on the uncertainly as to the final outturn of the crop, due to lack of moisture in some and excessive moisture in other considerable areas planted to cotton.

Yarn prices on the whole, when compared with those current during the previous period, have appreciated favourably, but not commensurately with close ruling on the raw meterial, Nevertheless, the difference is not so great as to cause any serious curtailment in the domestic textile industries being contemplated in the future. Tone of the market, steady.

SHANGHAI EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

The following table issued by the United States Consulate, Shanghai, shows that the value of the declared exports from Shanghai to the United States during July 1924 was $3,195,461, and for the first seven months of 1924 $22,199,880, in United States currency.

The general managers of the Fu Chung Corporation advise us that the sales of their coal (Honan anthracite) for the month of July amounted to 78,021 tons.

JULY'S WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX

The total index number for Shanghai for July, as compiled by the Ministry of Finance, Bureau of Markets, is 151.5, being 0.2 per cent. lower than the previous month and 2.5 per cent. downward as compared with the corresponding month of last year. Cereals, textiles and two groups of miscellaneous goods all show a rise, whereas other food products and metals have experienced a fall. Among miscellaneous goods, fuels and sundries have ascended a little, but building and industrial materials have marked falls.

London, Aug. 8.

The Federation of Master Cotton-spinners at Manchester to-day recommended continuance of the policy of running short time in mills spinning American cotton for the rest of the year owing to the slackness in the trade.—Reuter.

HUGE AMERICAN RAILROAD MERGER

New York, Aug. 8.

A proposed merger involving a billion and a half dollars and 14,357 miles of railroad is indicated in the reported formation of a new company consolidating the Erie, Pere Marquette, Chesapeake-Ohio and Hooking Valley Railways with the present Nickel Plate system, which has been agreed upon between the brothers van Sweringen and the bankers of the various lines.—Reuter's American Service.

RUBBER OUTPUT

The rubber harvested for the month of July on the Permata estate was 8,391 lb.

C. I. F.

A small volume containing a great deal of mercantile information that many of us want to know has just reached us. It is in no sense a text book nor does it deal with its subjects in a highly technical way. It consists of a series of separate articles on merchanting, shipping and marine insurance, and a discussion of business phrases and commercial customs connected with these subjects.

Is force majeure an act of God? Many would say that this would be the best definition for it. It has, however, a wider significance because it includes besides the effects of an act of God the results of an act of man.

What is general average? We had a hazy idea of the meaning of this term, but it is now much more clearly cut. General average is a sacrifice made by expenditure incurred in a common interest, such as the pouring of water on cargo in a ship to extinguish a fire. Some of the cargo in the neighbourhood of the fire may be damaged, possibly all the cargo, but the cost of the damage is justly spread over all interests. The jettisoning of cargo to lighten a ship is also a common interest, so that the cost of the first cargo jettisoned would be averaged up with the remaining cargo. An instance of jettison is recalled in the case of a Greek captain who stated that he had thrown his watch overboard to lighten the vessel, the intention being that the cost of providing a new one should be borne by the ship and cargo. The terms f.o.b., c.i.f., c.o.d., and c., etc., are fully dealt with and make the book an invaluable one to mercantile offices.

LAW REPORTS

SHIPS' WATCHMEN

System of Employment Criticized by Supreme Court Registrar

A system of engaging ship's watchmen which Mr. G. W. King (Registrar) last Friday described as being highly unsatisfactory was responsible for the appearance of two Indians in the Supreme Court. Rattan Singh sued one Kahlu for $25, wages due.

Kahlu, it appeared, contracted to supply watchmen to a ship, and Rattan was one of the men engaged. He now produced wages tickets for work done, saying he had presented these for payment but received nothing. Kahlu declared that the tickets produced by plaintiff were not genuine, not having his signature on the back, and they were printed by Chinese.

His Honour expressed the opinion that there seemed to be to deliberate lying somewhere, and as plaintiff had not proved his case judgment would have to be given for the defendant. The method adopted of engaging the watchmen seemed unsatisfactory because if the tickets were signed and got out of the hands of defendant they would have to be paid on presentation, being in the nature of a cheque to bearer.

NEW MOTOR TRUCK REGULATION

Firms Fined at the Police Court for Evasions

Three Shanghai firms made an appearance in H.M. Police Court on Thursday in connexion with the new motor truck regulation which came into force on the 1st instant. According to the summons, the regulation requires that a motor truck must have a plate affixed to it in a conspicuous position showing the chassis body weight, gross weight of the vehicle, and maximum weight capacity authorized by the makers.

The first summons was against Messrs. Caldbeck, MacGregor, on whose behalf Mr. J. J. Sheridan said that seven plates had been ordered for their seven trucks, but had not been delivered in time, and a type-written slip was used temporarily.

In reply to the Magistrate (Mr. G. W. King), Chief Inspr. Lynch said the purpose of the regulation was to stop overloading, particularly in view of the fact that very heavy traffic was not allowed to pass over certain bridges. There was no suggestion of evasion of licence dues.

A fine of $1 was imposed.

The second summons was against the New Engineering Works, and the secretary of the company (Mr. C. A. Momber) pointed out that the regulation required that the necessary information could either be on a plate affixed to the truck, or painted on the side of the vehicle. His company had had it painted on both sides of their trucks, and he produced a bill showing that the work had been done and paid for, some days before the alleged offence.

Inspr. Lynch admitted that the Chinese police constable must have taken the wrong number, and the summons was dismissed.

The Shanghai Ice & Cold Storage Co. were defendants in a similar case, and a fine of $1 was imposed.

THE Mixed Court on Wednesday ordered the confiscation of one of the biggest seizures of opium made for some time past. The police informed Mr. Jacobs and Magistrate Loh that on raiding 16 King Loong Ka Alley-way the other night, $50,000 of the drug was found Mr. M. O. Springfield, Assistant Commissioner of Police, and Inspr. Hermitage have evidence concerning a visit to a 37-roomed house. Some of the drug was found in every room, and in one of them the sum of $1,200. Several Chinese were on the premises, but as one of them would claim the drug the police realized that no charge could be brought against the inmates. A confiscation order, however, was applied for, and this, as stated, was granted.

WHAT IS A VAGRANT?

"The status of a vagrant is a most troublesome thing to define," said Judge Milton D. Purdy in the U.S. Court on Wednesday. A charge of vagrancy was brought against James M. Wiggin, an American seaman from the str. West Niger. Mr. H. D. Rodger, acting U. S. Attorney, prosecuted and Mr. Elijah Anthony defended. The defendant had been paid off at Tsingtao, although his contract called for passage home. He lost his money and reached Shanghai destitute and without employment. The U. S. Shipping Office, pending the time when they could send him back to America, furnished him with boarding and lodging at the Hanbury Institute. Two police constables said they heard him beg for money and Mr. Fernandez had seen him drinking.

Mr. Rodger argued that these facts constituted vagrancy, but the Judge held that the defendant, being a ward of the Government, as represented by the Consular office, was in a position analogous to that of the child of a wealthy father, supplied by his parents with food and lodging, but begging on the streets for spending money. "Obviously," said the Judge, "this child could not be adjudged a vagrant, nor can I term the defendant such."

After warning the defendant that if he should come into Court again when the protection of the Consulate was withdrawn, the Court would take a very different position, the Judge dismissed the charge.

Frank R. Stayshal, another American seaman, was similarly charged and P. C. Montgomery said that the defendant accosted two American seamen on Broadway on July 10, and asked for 20 cents.

Mr. Charles I. Graham, in charge of the U. S. Shipping Office, stated that the defendant had been offered passage back to America, but had refused to accept it, so that the Consulate would do nothing further for him.

The Judge said that since the defendant did not seem able to take care of himself it was the Court's duty to look after him for his own good. He was sentenced to three months and 10 days' confinement in Bilibid Prison, beginning the same day and allowing the last 30 days to be served on the vessel returning the prisoner to the United States.

A RIVER MYSTERY

Removal of Ewo Launch to Search for Opium? Foreigners on Board

Two Chinese appeared at the Mixed Court last Friday charged with conspiracy in connexion with the mysterious removal of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson's motor cruiser from Ewo Jetty on July 31, at 4 a.m.

Mr. G. H. Wright (prosecuting) said that as far as he could ascertain, prisoners together with two foreigners had gone to the jetty, removed the vessel, and proceeded in her up Soochow Creek. In his opinion, the party were looking for smuggled opium, for when they were discovered by the River Police, they were searching a creek boat laden with melons. Mr. Wright, with whom Supt. Woodfield appeared, applied for a remand, which was opposed by Mr. S. Moss, representing the laodah, an employee of Mr. W. McBain.

In reply to the Assessor, (Mr. Whitamore), Mr. Wright confessed that he did not know under what article of the Chinese Code accused were being prosecuted. He could not find any precise article that would cover the alleged offence, and therefore asked leave to alter the charge to one of theft of the gasoline. The vessel had been returned all right.

Mr. Moss moved that the case be dismissed.

Describing the case as presenting peculiar out-of-the-ordinary circumstances, the Assessor said he would adjourn the matter until Monday. The accused men were accordingly remanded on bail, the prosecuting solicitor intimating that he would now prefer a charge of larceny against them.

OPIUM AND CRIME IN SHANGHAI

Why Not Legalize Trade That Is Carried on all over China? British Assessor's View

In passing sentence of a year's imprisonment at the Mixed Court last Fridayy on a Chinese accused of bribing a constable in connexion with an opium deal, Mr. Martin (British Assessor) expressed the opinion that in view of the widespread illegal cultivation of the poppy all over China it would be a blessing to the Settlement if its sale could be controlled here. Otherwise the illicit traffic would continue and crime increase.

"This is a very curious case, indeed," commented the Assessor, "and indicates many strange phases of an illegal trade. We have but the word of the constable as against that of accused, and the Court is inclined to the view that the officer is right. It seems strange that accused should have so many friends, as he says, who are willing to engage a lawyer in his defence, but not one of them will appear in court to give evidence as to his good character.

"We cannot accept the contention of counsel for accused (Mr. W. S. Fleming) that to be a bribe, money must be passed over for a given purpose (evidence had not proved a crime at the moment), a bribe may be paid in anticipation of future usefulness.

"This hearing in no small way shows that illegal traffic in opium is responsible for a variety of crimes arising from attempts to deal and barter in it. Officers have a difficult time in arresting malefactors because of the magnitude of operations. It would be a blessing to the Settlement, indeed, considering the immensity of growth of poppy in all parts of China, where illegal though it is, law and order sanction its cultivation, if the authorities in Shanghai controlled its sale and disposal of licences."

Examined by Mr. Maitland (Police Prosecuor) Det.-Sgt. Forkin stated that a Chinese constable, upon entering the compound of the Central Station was stopped by accused, who offered him $2. On a previous occasion, about a month ago, he had offered him a similar bribe, and upon reporting to his superiors, was told on the next occasion to arrest the man. The prisoner told the police a variety of tales, as to his residences, his connexion with opium trafficking and his many trips to and from Shanghai.

POOR DOG TRAY

Blindness no Exemption from Licence Fee

In H. M. Police Court on Tuesday, Mr. B. P. Lalcaca was summoned for having failed to take out a licence for his dog. He informed Mr. G. W. King that he had been away and on returning to Shanghai found that the animal had gone almost blind. He therefore did not consider it necessary to take out a licence.

The Magistrate, observing that there could be no discount for blindness, fined defendant $3.

There was a similar summons against Mrs. H. Brown, who, it was stated, was summonded on Saturday and took out a licence on Monday. Defendant, who was under a misapprehension as to the period covered by the licence, was fined $2.

THE earthquake murderers have all escaped, receiving only the farcical punishment of imprisonment with stay of execution of sentence. But if life is not sacred, property, at least is. The looters, who put in the plea that they were taking things necessary for the preservation of life in a community where order no longer functioned, received sentences as farcical as those of the murders, but the procurator has appealed against them, and the case will go before the Tokyo Court to see whether real punishment can be obtained.

PEINE FORTE ET DURE UP-TO-DATE

Unfounded Allegations of Torture Against Police: "Electric Shocks"

At their trial at the Mixed Court on Thursday, four armed ruffians, one of whom was convicted of shooting and killing Chinese P.C. 770 in the Nanking Road robbery on June 30, complained that they had been subjected to electric shocks to wring from them confessions. All four were found guilty and ordered to be sent to the Arsenal to be shot.

Chinese detective officers, said one of the prisoners, had taken them to a room in the police-station and applied the current to their bodies. When a foreigner came in the detectives immediately hid the apparatus under the stairs.

Mr. Whitamore (who sat with Magistrate Sun)—You are afraid of being punished by electricity. What about the death penalty which you must undergo?

"If I am shot the pain will be all over immediately, but torture is enduring," replied the accused man.

Turning to Supt. Vaughan, the Assessor asked why it was that all armed robbers now brought before the court told these stories of torture by the police.

The Superintendent replied that such allegations were unfounded. The Chinese staff had no access to prisoners and could not interrogate them unless in the presence of a foreign police officer.

At the conclusion of the hearing the Assessor paid a high tribute to what he described as the sterling work of the police in running down a dangerous gang. He also was gratified to find that so many Chinese witnesses had come forward to aid in identifying the criminals. Such co-operation between the police and the native populace was to be commended.

A DANGEROUS GANG

Resuming the trial on charges of armed robbery preferred against six men and a woman, at the Mixed Court, Mr. Whitamore (British Assessor) and Magistrate Loh on Wednesday heard evidence with reference to the shooting and murder of C.P.C. 770, who on the night of June 30, while unarmed, pursued the alleged leader and most desperate member of the gang. It was stated that after a robbery at 141 Nanking Road, a shop assistant gave the alarm to C.P.C. 1103, who called upon the robber to halt. Instead, the robber turned and opened fire just as witness was loading his carbine. Two bullets took effect, one in the right forearm and the other in the left shoulder. While prone on the ground he blew his whistle and saw his fellow officer fall mortally wounded.

Four of the prisoners admitted having participated in the robberies marked against them. Woo Chingsun, according to the police, has a lengthy record and was brought to the Mixed Court for trial after he had been sent to the Arsenal, having been convicted in the French Mixed Court for armed robberies in the Concession. He was identified as being one of the gang who shot at a search party, six weeks ago, in the Western district, when Mr. Springfield shot one of the gang and the police accounted for three and later arrested two more.

The hearing was adjourned.

THE Kuangtung High Court of Justice at Canton, which is supposed to have jurisdiction over all civil and criminal cases on appeal from the provincial courts below, has now to reduce its personal and staff for lack of financial support from the Canton Government. For a long time this court has existed only on fees collected from the litigants and fines imposed. Since Dr. Sun Yatsen has lost all but about 19 of the 96 districts in Kuangtung, and Gen. Chen Chiung-ming has opened courts in territory he controls, the Kuangtung High Court now has but little to do. There are some 760 cases on its calendar awaiting trial still, but either one or both of the parties to the suit are residents of districts outside the present Canton régime and a call for a hearing is impossible.

THEFT ON PRESIDENT JACKSON

Further action was taken at the Mixed Court on Monday after when the River Police under Superintendent Woodfield began the prosecution against three accused, charged with stealing G.$25,000 from a cabin on the str. President Jackson between July 23 and 25 while the ship was en route to Shanghai from Kobe. It will be recalled that complainant had left the money in a bag in his cabin, but later, upon returning, noted that it was gone. Accused were arrested when the ship reached Shanghai.

Criminal proceedings were at first undertaken by the S.M.P., Hongkew, but it was later decided that, as the offence had been committed not on land, the River Police were the proper authorities to act, and, accordingly, Superintendent Woodfield took up the matter. Mr. Whitamore (British Assessor) and Magistrate Li ruled that second accused, who thought he could get the money back in Hongkong should be released under cash bond, and be allowed to journey south and make the attempt. The others were remanded in custody until the results of the mission of the messenger could be ascertained.

A claim for $300 due on a promissory note was made at H.M. Supreme Court on Wednesday by Hazara Singh against Gaya Din. Defendant admitted the debt and told the Registrar (Mr. G. W. King) that he had no money to pay, having just come out of a law suit which cost him $400. He offered $10 a month, but plaintiff insisted on demanding $15, and in the end the Registrar said he would make no order beyond giving judgment for plaintiff.

SUGGESTING that defendant, Mr. Russell B. S. Chen, might have been colour blind when he drove his motor-car past the traffic signals on the corner of Nanking and Kiangse Roads, Mr. N. E. Lurton, U. S. Commissioner, on Saturday morning imposed a fine of G.$2, but, as is the usual custom now in the American Court, remitted the costs. Defendant maintained that the sun was shining upon the lights in such a manner as to obscure the effect, and in furtherance of his case, stated that constables on duty at that point made no effort to stop him. Mr. Lurton paid the traffic department of the police a high compliment in their endeavours to regulate the worst traffic in the world and though admitting that there was a variety of stop signals in Nanking Road, asserted that the alternating red and green lights at the intersection of Kiangse and Nanking Roads were very good and he personally had never had any difficulty in distinguishing colours. Mr. W. A. Adams was also fined $2 for traffic violations (signal) in Kiangse Road. Defendant, pleading guilty, saved the Court and attendants much time.

A NOVEL fraud was alleged to have been committed by a Chinese carrying on business in North Chengtu Road who was brought before the Mixed Court on Thursday. It appeared from the evidence of Inspr. Quayle that defendant started a coupon selling enterprise, the agents for which were promised watches and other valuable prizes. An agent purchased a book of five coupons for 20 cents, which coupons he was to sell to five people at $1 per coupon. Upon handing this sum to defendant, the seller was entitled to a prize, while purchasers of the coupons would then each obtain a book, sell the coupons and in their turn claim prizes. Investigating the matter further, the police found that the prizes had been purchased for about Tls. 20 per dozen. A complaining witness, asked why he reported the matter to the police, said because the prizes were not up to the value offered in advertisements in the Chinese press. The prize which he received was a pair of brass not gold-rimmed spectacles, and of Japanese make. Defendant was cautioned and told not to publish spurious advertisements.

CORRESPONDENCE

A CLOUD OF BEETLES

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—May I be permitted to venture the following information in reply to Mr. A. L. Hall's query under the above heading. If Mr. Sowerby were in Shanghai he certainly would be the best authority to reply, but as you state in your footnote to the above letter that he is not, I take the liberty to do this.

The sudden appearance of large clouds of insects at certain times is one of the unsolved phenomenons of animal life. I think a possible explanation is that myriads of pupae, deposited in some dumps of decaying vegetable matter or other refuse—in the present case I suggest the Pootung shore, Nantao, or the dumps along Soochow creek—and which have been in a dormant but ripe state for some time, possibly months, simultaneously break open owing to some external occurrence, thus bringing about the appearance of large clouds of insects. An event which would cause this breaking of the pupae, naturally would have to be a general one, affecting extensive surfaces. The only event imaginable is therefore a change in the atmospheric pressure and it would be interesting to find out whether a few hours before the appearance of the insects—they need a few hours to stretch and harden their wings—an atmospheric depression has taken place in and around Shanghai. The records of the Siccawei Observatory should afford the necessary details. The beetles, according to Mr. A. L. Hall's letter appeared at about 11 to 11.30 on August 5; the depression therefore should have occurred at about 8 or 9 a.m. on the same day.

As to the beetles sent to you by Mr. A. L. Hall they are very difficult to classify from the incomplete description furnished in his letter to you. The first one (distinctive antennae) may be Carpophilus Hemipteris, a small beetle belonging to the family of Nitidulidae, which is fairly common all over Europe and Asia, although its time of flight is usually a little later in the year. The second (antennae drawn in under the body, tiger-like stripes) may be some form of Silvanus, which beetle lives on fruits and drugs. The third specimen (green sheen to head) ought to be Lebia Chlorocephala, which exists in manifold variations in the district of Shanghai. The copper-coloured ones may be some form of Abax or Amara. The time of flight of all the last-mentioned beetles is about due now.

It is interesting to note that many beetles fly only a few days or hours every year, after which they entirely and utterly disappear. The Italian Melolonthide, Anthypna Carceli Lap. for instance was found in about 30 specimens in 1820, it was described by Laporte Comte de Castelnau in 1832 and from the time of its capture disappeared entirely until nearly a century later, in 1904, when it was found again in great numbers. After that it was discovered that this beetle only flies a few hours every year and since then it is caught regularly every year. The Shanghai district abounds in rare specimens of beetles and insects in size under an eighth of an inch and it is specially to those that the energy of a collector should be drawn. These tiny insects have been but little explored in China until now, as the attention of the average collector confines itself to specimens over that size. There are many absolutely new families to be found—I have found the very rare Astemis Bicolor Sharp, which only exists in two specimens in the British Museum until now, on the Huangpu foreshore in Yangtszepoo district and many other non-classified families which are being described at present at Home—and the naturalist who is desirous of making a name for himself has ample scope to fulfil his ambition. We have until now hardly penetrated into the edges of this vast field of unknown insect life.

Another interesting phenomenon in animal life in Shanghai which is connected with the rapid growth of our model settlement is the fact that during the last score of years a perceptible change of animals in and around Shanghai has taken place. From being the abode of plain-loving animals, Shanghai has become gradually the home of rock-loving creatures, such as hawks, rock-eagles, etc. The impression our fine roads and buildings make on animals in general are those of canons and high rocks perforated with hoes. . . . specially since Don Quixote and Sancho Pansa have appeared in our midst in the shape of the "North-China Daily News" Building and the Chartered Bank.

I am, etc.,
E. M. Berthel.

Shanghai, Aug. 8, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I beg to thank you for your very kind letter of to-day and I have received the originals of the beetles mentioned in Mr. A. L. Hall's letter to you of August 6.

I have to revise the classification contained in my letter to you of August 8, which was mostly guesswork and based on the supposition that each one of the beetles was different from the other. The three beetles sent to me belong all to one kind and their name is Phylloperta Horticola Linné, family Scarabæidae, genus Phylloperta Kirby. They are two females—one of which is gravid, hence the tiger-like, black and white stripes on the abdomen—and one male. These beetles are found in Middle and Southern Europe, the Caucasus, East Siberia and Mongolia. Their appearance in China is of a recent date. They live on rose-leaves and various shrubs and fly at noon-time in July and August. Their description is about the following: Size one quarter to three-eighths of an inch; shape oval; head shield (clypeus, Epistom) round in front; upper side of head, Prothorax (Pronotum) and triangular shield (Scutellum) ordinarily greenish black, sometimes light or dark green, blue-green, also blue-black; legs somewhat long and weak, black and shiny; wing-case (elytra) mostly reddish yellow-brown (coppery), fluted and punctured irregularly; abdomen black and slightly protruding from under the wing-case; small knee-shaped antennae with clavae at end; body of beetle slightly broader than Prothorax.

A rare aberratio coloris (variation in colour), the Phylloperta Perrisi Muls, exists in these parts and in Southern Mongolia. It is the same beetle only the head shield, the edges of the Prothorax, the scutellum and often the legs are of yellow brownish colour.

As the three beetles have been damaged a good deal I should like to add a few words how best to kill insects for collecting purposes. Fill a small glass bottle half full with fine sawdust. Sprinkle two or three drops of acetic aether on sawdust, taking care that the sawdust is not wet all through. Cork the bottle well with a ground glass stopper. Into this bottle the beetle is dropped and the slower it dies the more elastic the various parts of the insect will remain after death. There is no cruelty connected with this manner of killing an insect, as a sort of intoxication lulls its senses as soon as the fumes of acetic aether begin to pervade its pores. At home the insect, or insects are removed from the bottle and packed as tightly as possible in cotton. In this packing the insects may remain for years without the limbs getting too brittle. In order to prepare the insects for needling and description it is necessary only to soak the cotton with the insects in tepid water, when they will become elastic and manageable again.

I am, etc.,
E. M. Berthel.

MORE WONDERS OF THE WORLD

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In answer to your correspondent's ("Full of Wonder") inquiry as to the "Seven Wonders of the World," which appeared in your columns of July 4, I wish to remind "Full of Wonder" that if he would refer to his "Ancient History" should he happen to have one, he will find the Seven Wonders named as follows:—

Pyramids of Egypt.
Pharos of Egypt.
Hanging Gardens of Babylon.
Statue of Jupiter by Phidias.
Temple of Diana at Ephesus.
Mausoleum of Artemisia.
Colossus of Rhodes.

Also the Mediaeval Seven Wonders, are given as follows:—

Coliseum of Rome.
Catacombs of Alexandria.
Great Wall of China.
Stonehenge.
Leaning Tower of Pisa.
Porcelain Tower of Nankin.
Mosque of St. Sophia in Constantinople.

Modern "Seven Wonders" are:—

Wireless Telegraphy.
Telephone (also new wireless).
Aeroplane.
Radium.
Antiseptics and Antitoxins.
X-Rays.
Spectrum Analysis.

The poison gas used in the World War is accounted a modern marvel.

THE PRIMACY OF PETER

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Before this correspondence is closed may I be allowed to point out to "Paul," "Branabas," and John" That the "Kingdom of Heaven" and "the Church of God" are not one and the same, and that these terms are not synonymous.

"The Kingdom of Heaven" is the Millennial Kingdom of Christ on earth and is always spoken of in relation to the "Son of Man." "The Kingdom of Heaven" is the subject of the old testament, and the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles continue the theme and describe the presentation of the King and the Kingdom, and the rejection of both. According to Acts XV. 13-18 this Kingdom will come "after God has visited the nations to take out of them a people for His name. The preaching of the "Gospel of the Kingdom" has been suspended for nearly two thousand years while the Gospel of the Grace of God is proclaimed.

There are parables of the Kingdom but never parables of the Church, Keys of the Kingdom but never Keys of the Church, The word Kingdom implies a reigning King but we do not read of the King of the Church.

While our Lord was on earth "the Church of God" which is the "Body of Christ," as we understand it in this age, was still a secret with God since the world began (Romans XVI. 25) "In other ages was not made known to the sons of men" (Ephesians 3-5) "That from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God (Eph. 3-9) "That it hath been hid from ages and from generations but is now made manifest to the saints (Colossians 1-26).

The Church is not the subject of the old testment nor is it to be found there in type or in figure. It is not the subject of the four gospels, but is the subject of a new revelation by Apostle Paul which he calls "my gospel" (Romans 16, 25-26) and of which he writes, "I have laid the foundation" (1 Cor, 3, 10) "For other Foundation can no man lay than that which is laid which is Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 3, 11).

"Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners but "fellow citizens with the Saints and of the Household of God and "are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and prophets, Jesus "Christ, Himself, being the Chief Corner Stone," in whom all the "building fitly framed together growth into an Holy Temple in the "Lord" (Eph. 2, 19-21).

Ephesians 4, 11 shows that the Apostles and prophets mentioned here, are not the old testament prophets nor the twelve apostles who accompanied our Lord when on earth, but were appointed after "He ascended" "And he gave some Apostles and some prophets and some evangelists and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints for the work of the ministry for the edifying of the Body of Christ" Eph. 4, 11-12). There is no mention here or in any of Paul's epistles that he gave some priests and some clergy or that the members of the Church were ever called sheep. As Paul does not acknowledge Peter or any of the twelve as co-workers with him the following are a few of the names of the Church Apostles and Prophets taken from his epistles viz: —

Barnabas (Acts 15, 14: Galatians 2,9)
Timothy and Sylvanus (1 Thess. 1,1: 2 Thess 1,1)
Andronicus and Junia (Romans 16,7)
Epaphroditus (Phil. 2,25) Revised version margin,
Epaphras (Colossians 1,7)
Philemon and Timothy and other un-named Brethren
} 2 Corinthians 8,23.

Except for two small Epistles, addressed to strangers scattered abroad dealing with the Kingdom aspect of truth and which should have been placed after Mark's Gospel, Peter disappears from scripture with the 15th. Chapter of the Acts and from that point Paul fills the scene and each of the thirteen Epistles which follow begins with his name. These thirteen Epistles form a body of truth written especially for the Church in this age and this cannot be said of any other portion of scripture.

If Peter was, or is, the rock on which the Church is built it is certainly strange that Paul "withstood him to the face," repudiated him and ruled him out. (Read Galatians 3).

Paul does not quote anything in his epistles that the twelve wrote or taught and he only quotes about four sayings of our Lord when he was on earth. He does not contradict anything they taught but he brings in an entirely new revelation. Paul is God's revealer of the age that now is and he never mentions the "Kingdom of Heaven."

I am, etc.,
"Initiated."

Shanghai, August 7, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—A new correspondent "Initiated" has now joined the fray with an avalanche of quotations and assertions; to answer the whole of which in detail would lead to endless and futile discussion; futile in so far that people who write letters of that type are usually entirely deaf to arguments, however irrefutable they may be, as long as they run counter to their preconceived ideas; ideas which are mostly based upon their own personal infallible judgement.

The reply will therefore be limited to some remarks about the Kingdom of Heaven and otherwise to generalities. "The Kingdom of God" (Heaven) means the ruling of God in our hearts; it means those principles which separate us off from the kingdom of the world and the Devil; it means the benign sway of grace; it means the Church as that Divine Institution whereby we may make sure of attaining the spirit of Christ and so win that ultimate Kingdom of God where He reigns without end in "the holy city, the New Jerusalem, coming down out of Heaven from God" Apoc. XXI 2."

"Initiated," "Barnabas," and "John" instead of taking the Gospels' words at their plain meaning treat the texts given in support of the Catholic Church's belief in St. Peter's primacy as if they were obscure and ambiguous sayings which it has required the combined wisdom of generations of theologians to unravel.

To anyone, whose judgment has not been distorted by quibbling and hairsplitting, the meaning of the texts mentioned must be clear enough.

These three good Christians treat the Gospels as if they were supplementary to St. Paul's Epistles whereas, on the contrary, the Epistles are supplements to the Gospels. They read the Bible backwards.

The only logical meaning derivable from "Barnabas," "John" and "Initiated's" letters is this, that Our Lord made an awful mistake in selecting St. Peter as His Vicar on earth, for St. Peter was a man wholly unsuitable for the job.

St. Paul says I Cor. II-16 "Who hath known the mind of the Lord that he may instruct Him?"

If Christ were capable of making mistakes, He could not be God, Who is Truth Itself and therefore necessarily infallible.

The Catholic Church always takes the positive stand of upholding the clear meaning of Our Lord's words in the Gospels; whereas the three Protestant gentlemen's position is the negative one of trying to explain away such sayings of Our Lord as do not meet with their approval; and to this end they misuse St. Paul.

It may not be inopportune to end this letter with a final quotation II Peter III-15/16".....as also our most dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given Him hath written to you: as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are certain things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction.

I am etc.,
Paul.

Shanghai, Aug. 10, 1924.

Post-Scriptum: Perhaps the following references to Gospel texts may interest your readers: Matt. VII.24-27; XVI.18-19; XVIII.17; XXVIII.18-20; Luke X.16; XXII.32; John X.16; XIV.16-17 and 26; XVI.12-13; XX.21.23; XXI.15-17; Mark XVI.15-16.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—The recent correspondence on the supremacy of Peter revealed once more why the Church fails to meet the need of the modern man, or, in fact, to interest him. On the occasion of a remark in a sermon published in your paper, "Paul," "John" and Barnabas" start again a controversy which was settled nearly 400 years ago, while another who claims to be "initiated" indulges in some hairsplitting about a supposed difference between the expressions "Kingdom of Heaven" and "Church of God."

While the exponents of the Christian religion pass their time with these mental gymnastics, the world is left without guidance on the most vital issues. People will listen to every quack who promises a postponement of death because the Church has not taught them to see the comparative unimportance of that event. In countless séances they try to catch a glimpse of the Unknown Beyond because the Church has nothing definite or convincing to say about the life to come. Millions worship the golden calf because they see even the followers of the true God cast coveting glances towards the glittering idol.

The most terrible example of a Church which has failed in its mission is found in Russia. The clergy there fed themselves instead of feeding their flocks; they were subservient to those in power and neglected their duty towards the common people. They left them as they found them; poor, ignorant, half-civilized brutes. If the Russian people so easily became a prey of devilish fiends and behaved like beasts, it is because their priests had failed to educate them into men.

The world war is another example on a gigantic scale. Many of the ministers of the gospel of peace became mere recruiting agents for the contending armies, while some even sank so low as to preach a gospel of Hate.

The task before the Church was never greater than it is now. Europe after the war is like a witches' cauldron. Tremendous forces are at work, and in some of the more backward countries they are played with by inexperienced men. In the East the old gods have died or are dying in consequence of the impact of the West. In Africa the black man has been taught to fight the white man in his own country with his own weapons.

To face problems of this magnitude, the representatives of the Christian religion ought to stop fighting for supremacy, whether it be Peter's or their own. They ought to forget feuds of the past in which no one is any longer interested. They ought to sink their differences before their common foe and unite to face their common task. They ought to come down—or up—to the level of the common man and talk his language. They ought no longer to be satisfied with a weekly discourse of stereotyped form and length, but use modern ways of propagating ideas, such as the press and the evening lecture. They ought—but what's the use? They won't do it.

I am, etc.,
Diogenes.

Shanghai, Aug. 9, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I was far away from Shanghai when I read "Paul's" letter on this subject of date August 2. It will be a considerable time before my answer can reach you and for that reason I am tempted to let the controversy rest. But we are getting so near the heart of the matter that I feel impelled to write once more in the hope that "Paul" will get a glimmer of new light on this well discussed argument.

"Paul" now sees clearly that the text I quoted from 1st Cor., "Other foundation can no man lay than is laid which is Jesus Christ," categorically contradicts his assertion that Peter was the "Rock" on which Christ built His church. He asks "Does 'John' mean that Jesus deceived Peter?" Certainly not. Scripture is ever consonant with itself. What the Apostle Paul, inspired by the Holy Spirit, says in 1st Cor. does not in the least conflict with the promise made to Peter as recorded in Matthew's gospel. But it does irrefutably controvert "Paul's" explanation of what Christ said when He made that promise. There's the rub. "Paul's" exposition is contradicted not only by I Cor. III, 11, but by the whole trend of the New Testament.

"Paul" involves himself in another contradiction. He says "Peter alone was given the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven." We are to infer that Peter gave the keys to his successors with a whole train of ever widening unproved and unproveable assumptions. Let us turn again to the New Testament. This time the last book of the canon and the final word of Christ to His church, Rev. I. 18., "And he (Jesus) said, 'I am he that liveth and was dead and, behold, I am alive for ever more, Amen, and have the keys of hell and of death." And Rev. III. 7. "These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath of the key of David, he that openeth and no man shutteth and shutteth and no man openeth." Surely these passages show that Jesus never abdicated His divine right in favour of Peter or anyone else. He has the key. He openeth and He shutteth.

"Paul" continues, "Peter alone was told to feed Christ's lambs (the laithy) and Christ's sheep (the clergy)." This is simply puerile. Where does "Paul" get his authority for calling the lambs "laithy" and the sheep "clergy?" Not from the New Testament. The words laity and clergy do not occur there. The division of the church into clergy and laithy was unknown in New Testament times. Jesus Himself was according to the flesh, a layman, so were Peter and Paul and James and John. Not one of the "clergy" of Christ's day was called to the apostleship. Let "Paul" read his favourite apostle Peter's letter written, not to "the clergy" but "to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, etc." and he will see that he (Peter) tells these common people; (I. Peter II. 9. "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood." The laity. the people, were the only priesthood that existed according to Peter.

"Paul" vitiates his argument by always importing into it something not to be found in the holy Scriptures. The religion of the New Tesament is the religion of the common man. It is like the free air and sunshine of the mountain top. "Paul's" interpretations smell of musty cathedrals with their dim lights, their sputtering candles and clouds of incense, Come out into the sunshine "Paul."

I am, etc.,
JOHN.

CHINA MACHINE MADE TEAS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent in the to-day's issue of your paper is incorrect when he states "until 18 months ago no attempts had been made to manufacture tea by factory methods." The firm to which the writer belongs built a tea factory in the late nineties, at Pehling near Foochow. This factory was equipped with the most up to-date tea-making machines imported from England, and the writer himself inspected the building and machinery in 1902.

China Teas made by machinery generally speaking show an improved appearance but the process they go through extracts most of their flavour and they become no better than the inferior grades of India, Ceylon and Java.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I would be extremely obliged to you, if you would be good enough to publish the following in your esteemed paper:

I heartily agree with the opinions expressed in a letter signed New Views for Old (Shanghailander). And I heartily disagree with the views expressed by your correspondent, who signs herself "A Lover of Russia." We, however, all know now that you are anti-Bolshevik. That is your business. I am not going to convert you. I belong to no political party. To me politicians are the worst humbugs living whether Tory, Liberal, Socialist, Socialist-Revolutionary or Communists.

But you have of late expressed the fervent hope, that the Whites will some day come back into their own again. That is where you and I disagree. To my mind, Sir, you are what the Englishman would call a very decent chap. That being so how on earth can you wish that the Whites should come back? Do you realize, what that would mean? It would mean several years of untold sufferings for the Russian people and, God knows, they have suffered enough as it is. The minute the Whites get back, there will (according to their own words) be wholesale murder. The "White Terror" of Finland would be repeated. And that was according to eyewitnesses far more bloody and cruel than any Red Terror. Only enemies of Russia, unscrupulous politicians, could wish for that.

Your leading articles on the Russian situation prove that you are being influenced. When Russia kicked out her Emperor, the Government which followed was n.g. Kerensky came next. Tory papers blamed him for being too weak. He failed to adopt the Lenin tactics. The Bolsheviks came on the scene and ever since they have for good or for evil (this is a matter of opinion) been the Masters, and in spite of foreign intervention and the most abominable newspaper propaganda they have managed ever since to remain in power.

I can assure you that had they not had back-bone they would not have been able to carry on. I can further assure you, that had they not had the Russian people behind them, they would have failed long ago.

You call it the mysteries of Russian nature. Yes, that is the only feasible explanation you can find. But if you would leave your editorial chair and go to Russia you would find that all the Russians (outside a few die-hards) would tell you "out of two evils Tsarism and Bolshevism, we choose the latter."

Many readers of your paper are as my friend Mr. Gordius Nielsen said, "stupid fellows." They think that whatever the old Lady on the Bund has to say is the Gospel Truth. Thank God, that is not so.

You can throw at me now, that in spite of the British recognition of Russia, British trade with Russia is not improving. Perhaps. But do you expect anything different when 99 per cent. of our papers are continually abusing the present Russian Government?

I have lived so long in this sinful world, that I know, that had the Bolsheviks agreed to pay the debts of the Tsaristic Government not a soul, including Lord Curzon or the Editor of the London "Times," would have cared a tinker's cuss about internal affairs in Russia.

When the world settles down and impartial history is written some of your readers will have a fit when they read of all the dirty intrigues played against Russian statesmen over Mammon.

A "Lover of Russia," who is also pro-White, says that the King of England (God bless Him) must have been feeling very bad when he had to receive the men who killed his cousin. As far as I know none of these gentlemen were accused of that crime. If my brother had been killed by the Germans during the war that would not have prevented me shaking hands with Germans when the war was over. My dear lady friend is going a bit too far there and writing in contravention of your leader on the question of "Hate" re our late enemies.

There is another point I wish to bring up. That is, you often shake your tired head when thinking of the Russian refugee problem. At the same time you do all you can to prevent those fellows from going back to Russia. The Bolsheviks may have something to say to the White Leaders but not to the men. I think it is nothing short of a crime on your part to prevent those poor wretches from going back. It is not fair to the Shanghailanders either that you should encourage them to remain here.

You do not need to worry about their leaders. They are in most cases well off. They are as your correspondent at Home so vividly described it "simply waiting to get back into their own again and are considering that their stay abroad is simply a rather prolonged holiday."

When considering the Russian problem do not be one-sided. There are I am sure many decent Russians, who have been very badly treated. That however happens in every Revolution.

But amongst the Russian émigrés there are also a vast number of useless, spineless, idle rich, whom Russia can well do without. They managed to run away in time and as the most of them belong to the German-Russian-Nobility, why worry about them? In capitalistic newspapers you often read about Countess Asparguski having to wash plates for a living. Why not? But these papers consider it dreadful. None of them however seem to remember the crimes committed under the Tsaristic Rule. Most forget the horrors of S.S. Peter and Paul, the infamous fortress in Petrograd and the horrors of the deportations to Siberia. You say the Bolshies are a minority.

So were the Tsarists and a still greater minority.

Under their benign rule the Russian people (the masses) were purposely kept in serfdom and ignorance. The Bolsheviks have not accomplished wonders yet. Still considering what they have had to put up with they have done well.

Russian ex-officials including officers would have rendered greater services to their country had they remained in Russia, like General Brussiloff and others did, instead of fighting on the side of alien armies against their own kith and kin. An Englishman of the right kidney stands up for "fair play," and I wonder what the average Englishman would say, if thousands of Englishmen would join the Germans in fighting England simply because the Ramsay-Macdonald Government might start new departures?

Roger Casement was hanged and in my eyes his crime was pardonable compared with the Russians who fought against Russia. Casement was chiefly blamed because he fought against Britain when she was fighting a life-and-death fight with the Germans. But the White Russians fought, when the war was over. Before closing let me assure you Sir, that I do not know one single Bolshevik. I have hundreds of friends amongst the White Russians, and they can testify to the fact, that the views I have expressed here, I have communicated to them time after time. I have said: Go back. Russia is yours. She needs you all. And if you are loyal to those in power no harm will be done to you.

From a purely British point of view I should say "Hands off Russia." Our trade needs the Russian market and to gain that you must have the good-will of the Russian people, just like you must have the good will of the Chinese people, if you wish to trade with China. Neither China nor Russia enjoys pin-pricking or newspaper abuse. Surely we have enough to do at home with our own affairs. We do not need to attempt to draw the chestnuts from the Russian fire.

We should not think of Bolsheviks or Whites. Our actions should be guided by love for the Russian People. That would be appreciated and would lead to mutually beneficent results. In my recent article on Religion I finished up by saying that this sorely tried world does not need "threats of a hell full of brimstone and fire but love and "comitas inter gentes." The same applies in this case.

Do not use the columns of your paper for stirring up hatred amongst the various Russian factions.

If your esteemed paper could find the ways and means of bridging the gulf now separating those factions, you would earn the undying gratitude of the Russian people and

Yours very faithfully.,
J. C. E. RYE.

Chingkou, Aug. 2, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. Rye's letter in your issue of 12th. instant hits many points which I, for one, think that your leading article in the same issue does not quite meet on the same ground.

Imprimis—your leaving of the editorial chair, etc., would discover that opinion would be that Bolshevism would receive a preferential vote over Tsarism. Here I think Mr. Rye has called for an unnecessary suspension of your present very efficient labour.

The evils which flourished under the Tsarist régime are notorious. They have been exposed by many writers and in such a manner as to allow of no doubt of their truthfulness in the main. This not by Russians alone but by absolutely independent British and American writers. I am rather uncertain of the name, but I think it was George Keenan who gave us some vivid pictures of political prisoners and their journeyings and exile in Siberia somewhere about 1890.

There are hundreds of other well attested proofs that the Tsarist Police Organization was the curse of Russia and—mark well please this statement—"The ruler of the Tsar."

The Bolshevik organization is, I believe, "out to rectify this" and therefore I am at one with Mr. Rye.

The only thing which at present is against them is the inaugural ceremony of massacre, repine and confiscation of personal property indulged in by Lenin & Co., and still not eliminate from Communist ideals.

Mr. Rye I happen to know is not exactly a poor man. Also he possessed among other things a sword and several handsome war medals. If he is as thorough-going a Communist as his letter would make us believe, why not "sell all these and give them to the poor?"

When Mr. Rye goes into "politics" I am with him. The seven horned beast (of the Apocalypse) is the politician—of every nationality—

Destroy politicians and you approach the millennium.

This perhaps, Sir, may be classed as a "new view"—but not for the "man in the street."

The great thing at the back of the whole business is—"What is to replace the order which you eliminate?"

"The Whites must not return!"

"The Bolsheviks need pay no debts.

"There is no need for anyone to pick chestnuts from the Russian fire," etc.

But who and what is going to put a huge country like Russia on her feet again and how?

With the rest of Mr. Rye's letter I am mostly in agreement.

I am, etc.,
A. L. HALL.

Shanghai, Aug. 13, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have been reading the correspondence in your columns dealing with conditions in Russia, and find that purely economical and political issues are discussed, and this does not give an idea of the real everyday conditions in which the average Russian lives.

Let us see what life is like, say in Vladivostok, since the Reds took the town, and started to enforce the Soviet policy there. Let us begin with the housing question. Suppose a man and his wife lived in a five-roomed apartment, they must now notify the "Living Quarters Commission" that they have three free rooms, since it is illegal for any person to occupy more than one room. In due time an agent from the "Living Quarters Commission" comes to inspect the rooms, and here is where a petty abuse is very often perpetrated, the L.Q.C. choosing the rooms he thinks are better, taking for instance the three middle rooms, and leaving the two rooms separated by them for the original occupier of the flat. Later these three rooms are perhaps occupied by a couple of dock labourers and their wives. The kitchen is shared by all, and therefore three different meals are in course of preparation on one stove in one kitchen at more or less the same time. There are three stocks of firewood and three stocks of food and three harassed women, generally not on speaking terms with one another, or I should say on very loud speaking terms with one another, and the gentle reader may easily figure for himself the illwill engendered, the humiliations for the better educated of them, the dread and the heart ache that come from this system. Generally also things are complicated by the presence of children.

A doctor of my acquaintance, married, and with a daughter of eight or 10 years of age, had a dock labourer and his wife foisted on him, and they chose their room so, that they had to pass through the young girl's room to get to it, and pass they did, and their friends and acquaintances also, at all hours of the day and night. This is not an isolated case, as hundreds could be cited, and indeed it could not be otherwise owing to the policy of the Government of grouping people of different social positions together, in order to make plotting impossible, by the very difference in the clay of the people thus thrown together. Thus far this has been very successful, and for this reason Government employees do not stay very long in any one town, but have to change their residence very often, that they may not have time to make friends in any locality.

Belonging to a Union

The average proletarian has to have a job to exist, and in Russia he cannot get a job unless he belongs to one of the numerous professional unions, which are Government institutions. To belong to a union one must make an application on a printed form, giving a detailed account of what he has done and where he has been since 1917, also what his political opinions are and were, his religion if any, in short he must give in minutest detail not only what he has done but what he thinks.

Of course the average man, anxious to have a chance to support himself and family, has to paint himself red on the application sheet.

Let us suppose that he is successful and is admitted to the union and is lucky enough to be able to pay his dues, and by a further stretch of the imagination let us also suppose that in due time he lands a job.

After a certain time the heads of his particular union decide that it is time to call the membership, to proceed to what is called in Russian a "chistka" literally a "cleaning." Having decided this a general meeting of all the members is called in some theatre or hall, which is requisitioned for the purpose, and on the appointed day the officials of the union occupy the stage whilst the common public are seated anywhere they can. The President opens the proceedings by enlightening the assembly that complaints have reached them that many members of the union are lukewarm in their sympathies for the Soviet and such people having no place in the union they should be expelled.

After the little speech by the President the Secretary stands up, and begins reading the list of membership, inquiring after every name whether anybody knows of anything against this man. A few names are read off thus without anybody commenting, and then comes the name of, say, Gavril Vassilievich Bashmakoff. As soon as this name is called, an individual gets up and announces that this same Bashmakoff, as he calls himself, in 1918, at a workman's meeting voted against a strike, for mysterious reasons best known to himself. The unfortunate Bashmakoff is called upon to justify himself, which he tries to do by stating that his wife had been ill and he could not afford to strike, further that he has at present a fairly good job, that his accuser is anxious to get. The fact of the vote against the strike some years previously is, however, established beyond doubt. The President then gets up and announces that Bashmakoff is an enemy of the Soviet and therefore not worthy of belonging to the union, which can only harbour real proletarians, who ought always be ready to sacrifice themselves in the fight against Capitalism and Imperialism; he will, however, put the matter of the expulsion of Bashmakoff to the vote, adding that anybody voting for him is also evidently a silent sympathizer of the Imperialists, but one with whom the union is ready and able to deal.

The secretary then gets up and announces that the matter of Bashmakoff's expulsion from the union is put to the vote and therefore anybody who is not in sympathy with the motion or objects to it should stand up. As there are several members of the Secret Political Police in plain view not a soul stirs, and the Secretary then triumphantly declares that Bashmakoff's expulsion from the union is approved by unanimous vote, and proceeds to read out the names of the other unfortunates.

An Addition to Spy System

Other organizations worthy of note in this proletarian paradise are the Young Peoples Communistic Association. Here amongst other things they have courses in political education to supplement the school courses, and the organization itself is a formidable factor in the spying system. The girls and boys are taught that science has demonstrated the non-existence of God, and that religion was invented by the upper classes to keep the lower classes in subjection morally as well as physically. "Religion is an opiate for the people" is the slogan, and it can be seen everywhere. They are then encouraged to spy upon their elders everywhere and upon every occasion. It is inculcated to them that their first duty is to the State, and that the ultimate happiness of mankind s more important than anybody's private feelings, and that to shield anybody and not report things or words inimical to the State is treachery of the basest kind. Examples from history of people sacrificing their dear ones for the good of mankind are quoted. The result is that the children begin to remark what their parents and their relations and friends say in the bosom of their family and often report to headquarters anything which they may think suspicious, and feel like little heroes about it. One must therefore keep an unfailing watch on one's tongue, lest the children seated at the dinner table or preparing their lessons for school in the corner should hear and report.

What the next generation in Russia will be like is beyond my feeble imagination.

The wholesale murder of political offenders is perhaps not indulged in at present, but systematic intimidation has been substituted, and is extraordinarily effective.

I could write a great deal more of how the demonstrations in which tens of thousands of people take part with apparent enthusiasm, are organized, of how the presence of the people is enforced, the cheers are by command, the enthusiasm a sham, of the influence of the secret political police in the private life of the average man and so on, but this letter is already too long and perhaps not interesting, so with apologies I will conclude.

I am, etc.,

VIDI.

THE Y. M. C. A. AND THE FOREIGNER

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I read with much regret the article in your news columns, published on the 4th instant, entitled "Anti-Foreign Move in the Y.M.C.A."

First of all, as a secretary of the Association who knows its work well, I wish to state that the Association is based entirely on the Christian principles of love and service. In carrying its message to the people, it has no bias based on national or racial prejudices. On the contrary, the Association has, among its important activities, the promotion of world brotherhood and universal goodwill. It stands for justice and righteousness in all human relationships, no matter whether China or other countries be concerned.

Further the Y.M.C.A. of China is an integral part of the Y.M.C.A. movement in the whole world and we have as much interest in the development of the young manhood of other countries, where there are sister movements, as these latter have in the development of China's young manhood. The China movement, as an active member of the World's Alliance of Y.M.C.A.'s, subscribes annually considerable sums for the development of the latter's work in Europe and other parts of the world.

Moreover, the fact that we have nearly a hundred American and European colleagues in our staff of secretaries, working in the happiest of relationships with their Chinese fellow workers, would be more than enough to dispel any rumour of an anti-foreign move in our organization.

I am glad to note that the rest of your article contains no report to substantiate the implication of your title. I am rather inclined to think that you did not put down the title by design, but that you intended to call it "Anti-Opium Move in the Y.M.C.A." and through an error of some kind it was put down as "Anti-Foreign Move in the Y.M.C.A."

Unfortunately, however, the public may not have thought of this and would therefore have received a wrong impression. I shall be much obliged to you if you will make the necessary correction, if you have not already done so.

I am, etc.,

M. T. Tchou.

Kuling, Aug. 8, 1924.

With regard to the anti-Christian movement which seems to be developing among students, an official of the organization said that they would fight it with light, not heat. They would educate the people to realize the uselessness of anti-Christian and anti-foreign movements and the usefulness of working for the betterment of conditions in China. In this connexion, it might be expected that literature will be sent broadcast throughout the country.

We do not think Mr. Tchou can have been at the meeting in question. We had information, from a source not to be doubted, relating to the passage alluded to in the above quotation, showing that it caused grave disquiet to some of those present.—Ed.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Mr. Tchou was right when he said that the Chinese Y. M. C. A. is not anti-foreign and cannot be. The paragraph you referred to in order to substantiate your title makes no mention of any anti-foreign move in the Y. M. C. A. It is some of the students, who are said to be anti-foreign, not the Y. M. C. A. Nor are these students in the Y. M. C. A. The title would have been nearer the truth if it were "Some Students and the Anti-Foreign Move."

Move is the Y. M. C. A. so concerned? Because its Students Department is trying to do everything within its power to help the students even of the non-Christian schools to have a right start in life by giving them the right conception of things and conditions.

The Y. M. C. A. is very much concerned that an anti-foreign spirit might be aroused as the result of the "nationalization campaign" conducted by some of the students. The "Y" itself is certainly not anti-foreign. Nor do we see any "move" in that direction.

Thanking you for your space.

I am, etc.,

T. Y. Chang.

USED POSTAGE STAMPS FOR CHARITY

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In your issue dated the 7th there appears a letter from a Mr. John Recano, of London, in which he appeals for used postage stamps on behalf of the "Crusade of Rescue" Refugee.

I cannot find his name in Debrett, neither have I been able to discover it in the Hong List, but nevertheless Mr. John Recano may be a patriotic British subject although, to me, the name is reminiscent of my childhood's days when I was wont to purchase Hokey-Pokey at a penny a lump.

Mr. John Recano refers to the success of his original appeal through the London "Universe." What is this? A journal or a pub?

Does he mention the names of the charitable institutions benefited thereby and the amounts handed over to them? Does he work unaided or has he a committee composed of persons of standing?

He goes on to say that many charitable institutions are able to maintain open doors by the sale of "waste" of every description but why single out used postage stamps in especial? Why not a ship load of our evening papers? Mr. Recano expresses his anxious desire to gather in a second "million" for the "Crusade of Rescue." A second million of what? Stamps, coppers or quids?

In publishing appeals for the support of public charities a duty devolves upon you to previously satisfy yourself that the appeal is genuine. Have you any knowledge of Mr. John Recano, his previous successful appeal, the names of the institutions to which he paid over the proceeds, the names of the members of his committee (if any), the London "Universe," the "Crusade of Rescue," and have you seen a balance sheet or other financial statement in connexion with his appeal?

Does he dispose of the used postage stamps to paper mills by weight or does he very carefully sort them out in the hope of bagging a prize?

The present appeal may be perfectly above board for all I know to the contrary, but on the meagre and unsatisfactory information supplied I make no apology for asking questions.

If used postage stamps can be used by paper mills I would suggest that sales be made to local paper mills and the proceeds handed over to me to help to pay part of my next year's subscription to the "North-China Daily News." Charity begins at home.

TAXATION OF PONIES

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—When you quote the number of ponies for which taxes were paid in 1923 as over 600, did you intend to represent this as the number of riding ponies for which taxes had been paid, or does this number include carriage ponies, both Chinese and foreign, brokers' trap ponies and all others outside livery stables? If carriage ponies are included in the 600 the number of riding ponies paying the tax cannot be very great. Again one would like to ask why the owners of riding ponies are allowed to evade paying taxes for their mounts. If the rest of the taxation were left to our individual will, to pay or not as we should choose, our revenue would soon be on a par with that of Peking.

I am, etc.,

G. E. P.

Shanghai, Aug. 8, 1924.

*We cannot answer the first part of the question, our information not going beyond the fact that 600 ponies were licensed. It is a Municipal regulation that all ponies in the Settlement shall be licensed. However, it is a common practice in all countries of the world to evade taxation if possible and in Shanghai it is very easy to evade paying a pony licence, for the simple reason that a tax collector could not very well take post on a riding road, compel a rider to come to a halt and establish the fact that he had a licence. Servants of the Council interested in racing use their knowledge of racing stables to ensure that tax-collectors call on every man who enters ponies for race meetings and it is fairly safe to say that racing men, who spend more money on their ponies than any others, are about the only ones who pay the fee. Obviously it is unfair, and as racing men are the ones who principally use the Avenue Foch riding track on which to walk their ponies out to the country, and as they are the men who pay most, it is equally unfair that such a very small privilege should be taken away from them, especially as no benefit could result to the public and the necessary expenditure would mean a waste of money and employment of plant badly needed elsewhere.—Ed.

THE CUSTOMS INCUBUS ON TRADE

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It frequently happens that you devote two or three columns of your paper to reproducing trade reports emanating from the Commissioner of Customs at such places as for instance Wuhu, which reports convey, to the uninitiated, the impression that these are flourishing ports of trade in the way such ports are regarded in Europe or America. As a matter of fact the statistics are misleading. The bulk of the revenue returns collected at such places are merely likin levies under another name, that is to say they are taxes collected by the Peking Government through the medium of the Chinese Maritime Customs on Chinese goods and on produce passing from one port in China to another. That such ports are treaty ports and that the means of transit are steamers or other vessels of a foreign type is the reason the Customs and not the Peking (or Native Customs) authories collect these taxes.

Under treaty the import of foreign goods and/or export of goods abroad from such treaty ports is stipulated for on payment of the treaty tariff duties, but in order to provide for these privileges an expensive staff of the Chinese Maritime Customs is maintained at many of these places, entirely out of proportion to the value of the trade they are there to deal with and consequently their main efforts are directed to taxing Chinese trade en route.

When the inland waters of China were formally declared to be open to steam traffic (foreign and Chinese) it was thought by many officials as well as merchants—that this must of necessity mean that an amalgamation of the then existing schemes of taxing native goods in transit must follow, but the Maritime Customs who saw their revenue derived from this source in danger strenuously opposed the only logical interpretation of the concession obtained by the British Minister and up to to-day their efforts have been allowed to prevail. In no other country of the world is the internal or domestic trade subjected to such varying systems of taxation dependent on the medium employed to carry the trade in question. To explain—if a merchant wishes to ship some goods or produce from, say, Shanghai to Nanking, he has to select between several methods of transport all coming under different systems of taxation, and he is thus forced not only to consider which transporting medium gives him the cheapest price for carriage but also which system of taxation taxes him the least. That is to say, if by steamer, he pays Chinese Maritime Customs duties; if by railway, paying likin taxes; if by native junk, paying native boat likin; or if by boats up through the creeks paying—?

It was this state of things the opening of Inland Waters was intended to end and which it has been prevented from doing by the numerous official interests who fatten on the trade of China regardless of the real interests of the country. Not the least offender in this respect is the Chinese Maritime Customs.

A progressive Inspector General of Customs had it in his power from about 1900 onwards to seize on the opportunity given by the Inland Water Concession to free the internal trade of China from these vexatious levies, but the whole efforts of the Service have been on the contrary directed to cementing on the unfortunate public not only the levies then in force but adding others under the guise of taking over and controlling the various Native Custom houses. Whereas in the old days the Chinese public always had the option of "burning down" a Custom house or likin station when levies became unbearable, they are now faced with the iron band and resolute front of the Maritime Customs backed by the active support of the Powers' naval force.

From press reports it appears that the Chinese Chambers of Commerce are to have a meeting at Tsinanfu in September and one, if not the principal, subject for discussion is to be the coming Tariff Revision Conference. This interest on behalf of their national concerns is warmly to be commended, provided the Chinese delegates start out with the determination to remove internal taxation of goods in return for an agreed-on increase in the tariff on imports and, secondly, that they make provision for the proper spending of the revenue derived not only from any increase in the import taxation but from the total revenue.

Given that they assume these functions the coming Tariff Conference will then have a clear issue before them namely (a) Provision of Ports of Foreign Entry where vessels can enter direct from foreign countries, and discharge their imports and load exports and (b) abolition of all taxation on goods native or foreign carried coast or river in China. Any temporary loss in revenue will be more than made up in a few years by the greater flow of trade inwards and outwards resulting from the removal of these latter handicaps, this aspect of the question cannot be too strongly impressed on the delegates, who will be entrusted with the tariff revision provided for by the Washington Conference.

I am, etc.,

Free Trade.

THE CHINESE BUGLER

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In to-day's issue your Tsingtao correspondent has a most interesting and amusing description of things as they are there at present.

I have not been in Tsingtao since 1909, when, of course, under the Germans, everything, even the weather, was done so much better.

I am afraid, however, he is not a member of the R.S.P.C.A. or he would not object so much to the poor dogs vocally expressing their feelings that they also miss the good old German days. Can he not bring himself into the frame of mind that inspired one of our English poets to write that "twas sweet to hear the watchdog's honest bark."

Then again regarding the free nightly concert offered by the Chinese Navy, he expresses himself very strongly. What is it that Shakespeare says (at least I think it was he) about "the man that hath not music in his soul?" I daresay Mr. Ganahal, whom I know, will go to a dance served by a double jazz orchestra, enjoy it thoroughly and cheerfully pay sweetly for it all, while the poor Chinese bugler is threatened with the execution ground for offering the same kind of music (?)

Which all the foregoing is only introductory to what I really want to say. Doomed to be tied up to the mooring buoys right off Kiangnan Arsenal and close to a Chinese gunboat I know all about the combination of a Chinese sailor or soldier with a bugle. Your correspondent has described it thoroughly, but if he had cussed it further he would'nt have gone far enough.

I have heard and read of the different refined Chinese tortures with disgust and horror but I question if any of them could be worse than this fiendish tootling.

They generally start in about 3 a.m. and carry on till about 6, pointing their diabolical instruments right at the ship. The same bugle call of five ascending notes two octaves, always flat, then after a pause the same five notes descending, flat and sharp,

Sometimes they or he realize he has'nt struck the right pitch and will have three or four tries at it before proceeding or going right back to the beginning again. Like the fellow in the boarding house wakened by the noise made by the arrival home of the boarder in the room right over him in the early hours and waiting to hear the drop of the "other" boot, we find the tension something awful.

As there are sometimes ten of these bugles, not playing in unison (?) but independently and as each of the ten starts on a different pitch some idea may be formed of what the result is.

The dogs we also have on the Pootung side, but they are nothing to this infernal tootling, which bids fair to drive some of us mad. I inquired in Shanghai what it would likely cost me to let loose on the bunch some morning with a Winchester and was told it would be about $60 Mex. per head. Is this correct or would there be a reduction if I took a quantity?

I am, etc.,

PROGRESS OF ALLIED CONFERENCE

French Cabinet Considers Evacuation of the Ruhr is Not a Question for Discussion: Compensation Required by France if She gives up Right Bank of Rhine

Paris, Aug. 8.

It is intimated that MM. Herriot, Nollet and Clementel are going to Paris to-morrow in order to consult their Cabinet colleagues on the question of the evacuation of the Ruhr and the maintenance of Allied railwaymen in the Rhineland. They will return to London on Sunday after a meeting of the Cabinet.

The London correspondent of the "Liberté" declares that in spite of assurances that the Premier's rush to Paris does not indicate that a crisis has occurred at the conference the real reason is a serious disagreement between M. Herriot and General Nollet in regard to the evacuation of the Ruhr, and M. Herriot has decided to submit the matter to a full meeting of the French Cabinet on Sunday.

Aug. 9.

That hitches have arisen at the London Conference in connexion with the date of the evacuation of the Ruhr is asserted by French correspondents in London.

The "Ere Nouvelle" says that General Nollet's plan for evacuation created such a stir that M. Herriot returned to Paris to consult the Cabinet with a view to securing a precise definition of the French Government's point of view.

"Pertinax" describes M. Herriot as astonished at the attitude of certain of the negotiators, who consider France's decision to abandon the right bank of the Rhine as definite but refuse to compensate France in the slightest way for it.

French Delegates Supported.

Aug. 10.

After midnight the Cabinet, after meeting for 3½ hours, announced that M. Herriot, M. Clementel and General Nollet had received the Council's unanimous and complete approval with reference to the conduct of negotiations at the London Conference.

A semi-official statement issued at the conclusion of the Cabinet meeting says that the French Government, in agreement with the other Allied Powers in London, considers that the question of the military evacuation of the Ruhr is not within the province of the Conference and cannot be discussed. It recalls that M. Herriot, like M. Poincare, had often declared that it would be one of the consequences of the application of the Dawes plan and would be carried out under certain conditions. Evacuation obviously depends on guarantees of security which France and Belgium are entitled to demand. Marshal Foch agrees with this.

The Cabinet unanimously approved M. Herriot's statement, after which he confirmed that the London Conference would be succeeded by another to discuss inter-Allied debts, in the second half of November, after the American elections, so that the United States would be able to participate.

The economic question, it is foreshadowed, will form the subject of further conversations between the interested Governments, as also the questions relating to disarmament and the pact of mutual guarantees.

M. Herriot will return to London to-night. The Conference is not likely to conclude before the end of the week. It is anticipated that the French Parliament will reassemble on August 20.—Reuter.

German Opposition.

London, Aug! 9.

It is evident that hitches and disagreements have arisen in the International Conference. The principal one concerns the date of the evacuation of the Ruhr and a great deal of importance is attached to M. Herriot's brief visit to Paris to consult the French Cabinet, whose decisions are likely to spell success or failure of the Conference. Differences which are not yielding to easy solution have also occurred in other directions at the Conference. The Germans yesterday obtained a certain number of material concessions in discussing the Allies' reports and took up an unbending line of opposition to some of the other proposals.—Reuter.

U. S. Interest in Financial Side.

London, Aug. 9.

The Reparations Commission today signed an agreement with the German Government relative to those parts of the Dawes scheme which are within the competence of the Commission, with the proviso that if the Conference fails the agreement becomes void.

Washington, Aug. 8.

The United States, through its Ambassador, Mr. Kellogg, has informed the London Conference that the United States expects to participate in any meeting of the Allied Finance Ministers which may be called to consider the allocation of German reparations payments as a result of the Conference decisions.—Reuter's American Service.

Inter-Allied Debts.

Paris, Aug. 8.

"L'Oeuvre" learns from London that the French Minister of Finance has handed Mr. Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, an important memorandum concerning Inter-Allied debts.—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug 8.

It is learned on good authority that the French and Belgian authorities have now released all political prisoners in occupied Germany.—Reuter.

German Delegates and Reparations

London, Aug. 7.

It was authoritatively stated at the conclusion of to-day's sitting of the Reparations Conference that considerable progress had been made.

The Germans agreed to consider the loan as a moral obligation, thereby satisfying one of the Reparation Commission's essential conditions for the enforcement of the Dawes plan.

It is also stated that the Dawes plan, on the request of the Germans, will be put into operation on October 5 instead of on October 15.

Further progress has been made in connexion with the discussion of the reports of the First and Second Committees, on which agreement has virtually been reached.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 8.

A notable event took place in London yesterday on the occasion of the French and German Ministers meeting and conversing without witnesses for the first time since the war. Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann visited M. Herriot at Hyde Park Hotel and later the French Premier returned the visit at the Ritz Hotel. It is believed that in the course of the interviews the foundation was laid for the launching of negotiations on the subject of the military evacuation of the Ruhr.—Reutre.

Entente with Britain Preferable to Prolonged Military Occupation

Paris, Aug. 10.

The comparative obscurity of portions of the communiqué issued early this morning is dispelled by the "Matin," which categorically declares that the Ministers approved M. Herriot's proposal that military evacuation of the Ruhr should be made solely dependent on the commencement of execution of the Dawes plan, to which General Nollet was originally opposed, but finally agreed.

"L'Information" bears out this version and says that the policy approved by the Cabinet conforms to that advocated by the Belgians, who favour rapid evacuation as soon as Germany has begun loyally to execute the Dawes plan. The newspaper anticipates a reduction of the two years laid down in the earlier French proposal for evacuation. It adds that M. Théunis and M. Herriot share the view that an entente with Britain is preferable to military occupation of the Ruhr.

The evening papers confirm that the Cabinet has approved the policy of withdrawing French and Belgian troops from the Ruhr at an early date provided that Germany gives satisfactory proofs of her intention to fulfil the Dawes plan.

M. Poincaré, in a speech to-day, insisted that Germany's word could not be trusted and France must remain on her guard.

Later.

In an interview to-day, M. Herriot says that all is going well, and that there is not the least disagreement between members of the French delegation to London. M. Clementel says he is confident that the Conference will end satisfactorily.

Later.

M. Herriot, General Nollet and M. Clementel left for London in order to resume the Conference.—Reuter.

France's Demand for Satisfactory Pledges

London, Aug. 11.

Pending the unfolding of M. Herriot's proposals for the evacuation of the Ruhr at the London Conference, there is a tendency to adopt a cautious view with regard to the extent of the mandate given to the French Premier at Saturday's Cabinet meeting. The Germans are known to be anxious to secure the withdrawal of the troops by the time the British forces are due to leave Cologne while France apparently is now willing to reduce the period of the evacuation of the Ruhr from two years to one year subject to obtaining satisfactory pledges. France in this connexion attaches value to the assurance given by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald that no definite decision would be taken immediately with regard to British withdrawal from Cologne. M. Herriot also favours admitting evacuation of the Ruhr in return for commercial compensation such as free entry of iron ore and other substances from Alsace-Lorraine into the Ruhr.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 11.

The "Journal" says that when negotiations for the evacuation of the Ruhr are opened France will demand restoration of the commercial privileges she formally enjoyed with Germany.

The "Matin" declares that the maximum period fixed for evacuation of the Ruhr is one year and the minimum from eight to 10 months.

The "Echo de Paris" says that M. Herriot's most powerful argument to the Cabinet as regards evacuation was the fact that Britain had decided to wait and see how Germany observes her obligations before deciding on evacuation of Cologne which is due to terminate in January.—Reuter.

Germany's Conciliatory Attitude: Preliminary Agreement

Paris, Aug. 11.

The text has been published of the preliminary agreement between the Reparations Commission and Germany, signed on August 9.

The agreement binds Germany to take the necessary legislative measures to enforce the Dawes plan, while the Reparations Commission undertakes to take measures to the same end, including facilitating the issue of a loan.

Both parties agree to make any additional arrangements on which the London Conference may decide and undertake to refer disputes regarding the interpretation of agreements to arbitration in accordance with methods to be fixed by the London Conference.

Later.

Herr Stresemann to-day conferred with M. Herriot on the subject of the military evacuation of the Ruhr.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 11.

The understanding that France is prepared to withdraw her troops from the Ruhr a year after the execution of the Dawes plan has made an excellent impression in Conference circles. It is believed that Germany will not raise difficulties with regard to accepting the French conditions for evacuation, which will probably embrace the conclusion of a commercial agreement between France and Germany.

Mr. MacDonald has agreed to M. Herriot's proposal to have, prior to the conclusion of the Conference, an exchange of views with the German delegates on the question of German disarmament in order to facilitate the undelayed resumption of the operation of the Inter-Allied Commission of Military control.—Reuter.

Effect on Exchange.

Later.

On the London foreign exchange market to-day dollars and francs further appreciated on favourable developments of the London Conference. The closing rates were:—sterling on New York 4.55§ and French francs 80.35.—Reuter.

Committees' Work Almost Ended: Pres. Coolidge and War Debts

London, Aug. 12.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, presiding at a meeting of the Allied and American Delegations to the Inter-Allied Conference to-day, stated that the work entrusted to the various committees had been finished except for one or two points. Saturday is now mentioned as the probably date of the conclusion of the business of the Conference.

Aug. 13.

To-day is likely to be the decisive stage in the London Conference. M. Herriot and the Belgian Ministers conferred with Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann at Downing Street this morning on the questions of the date of the military evacuation of the Ruhr, the military control of Germany and French security and the proposed Franco-German Commercial Treaty. It is understood that the Germans are urging that evacuation should not be later than January, 1925, while the French insist on August, 1925.—Reuter.

Washington, Aug. 12.

President Coolidge, while encouraged by the progress of the Inter-Allied Conference, regrets that the question of the Allies' war debts is involved in reparations. He adheres to the view that he is powerless to consider any new proposals as regards national debts to America, as Congress has specifically laid down the terms of their settlement.—Reuter's American Service.

Franco-German Commercial Agreement?

London, Aug. 13.

It is reported that the French and German Finance Ministers last night definitely arranged to conclude a commercial treaty. French and German experts have been summoned to London to draft their proposals.—Reuter.

Ruhr Negotiations Held Up

London, Aug 13.

The Big Fourteen did not meet in the afternoon as arranged, one reason being that no agreement had been reached at the Franco-Belgian and German conference this morning. The conversations of the latter will continue this evening.

Interviewed by a representative of Reuter's Agency as regards the duration of the conference, a high authority said that it might last 12 hours or 12 days.

The conversations between the French, Belgian and German Ministers with reference to the Ruhr have been adjourned until to-morrow. Great reticence is shown in all quarters with regard to their progress. It is believed that the negotiations have reached a decisive point. The Germans are expected definitely to reply to-morrow to the points enumerated by M. Herriot.

Later.

The Conference situation has undergone a change. Indications are at present not so optimistic. The Ruhr negotiations have apparently reached a virtual deadlock. The French Delegation insist that evacuation cannot be carried out under a year from a specified date, while the Germans contend that the troops should be withdrawn within the period of a month. It is stated that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has been approached to act as mediator.

According to present arrangements, the French, Belgian and German Ministers will meet early to-morrow, after which there will be a meeting of the Big 14.

Discussions Leading Nowhere

Aug. 14.

The Big Seven met at Downing Street at 9.30 this morning. The German delegates did not arrive till 11.00 to continue the discussions with the French and Belgian Ministers, with whom an earlier meeting had been arranged. The Germans were delayed because since yesterday evening they had been continually in consultation with President Ebert and their colleagues in Berlin by means of a private wire installed in their hotel.

Later.

The meeting between the French, Belgian and German Ministers lasted only 20 minutes. It is uncertain whether it will be resumed. Feeling is pessimistic.—Reuter.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF GERMAN REPUBLIC

Patriotic Demonstrations

Berlin, Aug. 10.

Patriotic demonstrations have taken place all over the country in honour of the fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Republic. President Ebert addressing a demonstration at Muenster declared that only with the ideal of liberating their brethren in the Rhineland before them, could they find strength to undertake the heavy burdens of the Dawes plan.—Reuter.

THE LABOUR-SOVIET AGREEMENT

Signatures Put in London to Curious Document: No Persons Mentioned

London, Aug. 8.

The Anglo-Russian Treaty was signed this evening by Messrs. MacDonald and Ponsonby for Britain and MM. Rakovsky, Scheinemann, Joffe, Tomsky and Radchenko for Russia.

The Anglo-Russian Treaty is unique because it does not mention his Majesty, whose signature is apparently also not required. It is pointed out that the President of the Union of Soviet Republics is not recognized as the head of the State. The Soviet Government itself always concludes treaties. The British legal advisers therefore decided that the Treaty should be balanced by the Government alone being mentioned on the British side also.—Reuter.

Self-Satisfaction Over Treaty with Britain: Re-growth of Economic Relations

Moscow, Aug. 10.

The Foreign Commissariat, in a communiqué announcing the signature of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty, which it describes as "one of the principal events of the foreign policy of the Soviet," says that the Treaty brings nearer the realization of an agreement recognizing the Soviet as a new form of political, social and economic régime. "The Soviet, while insisting on the maintenance of the decrees nationalizing big industry and cancelling debts, consent as quite an exceptional matter to give partial satisfaction to British subjects on condition that the British Government will grant a loan, the British claims being covered by the amount of the loan, the balance of which will be devoted to Russian reconstruction. Concessions eventually to be granted to the former holders of nationalized property will be based on a strict business calculation, and will not be handed over unless really advantageous to the Soviet Republic."

The Moscow press is gratified at the signature of the Treaty, and sees in this the influence of the English working-class. It anticipates that the Treaty will result in the re-growth of economic relations with Great Britain, and, through Great Britain with the rest of the world.—Reuter.

Final Meeting of Conference

London, Aug. 12.

The Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, presided at the final meeting of the Anglo-Soviet Conference to-day, at which outstanding points were cleared up. Satisfaction was expressed by both sides on the successful issue of the negotiations and cordial thanks were exchanged.—Reuter.

BRITISH AND RUSSIAN TRADE UNIONS

Moscow, Aug. 7.

Replying to an invitation to send a Trade Union delegation to Russia in order to establish closer communication between British and Russian labour, Mr. Purcell, Chairman of the Trade Union Congress, stated that he has arranged personally to visit Russia at the beginning of next year, and perhaps sooner. He declares that it is his conviction that the Russian and British trade union movements are approaching a united front.—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Free State Bill to Supplement Anglo-Irish Treaty: First Reading Passed

Dublin, Aug. 12.

In the Dail Eireann to-day, President Cosgrave introduced a Bill similar to the British Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Anglo-Irish Treaty. He asked the Dail Eireann to adjourn till October 21, when the remaining stages would be taken.

Mr. Johnson, the Leader of the Labour Party, asked the Dail Eireann not to agree to the first reading of the bill.

Mr. Cosgrave, proposing the adjournment of the debate until October 1 (? 21), said that the House would be summoned earlier if necessary.

The Nationalist, Mr. Sean Milroy, objected to executive measures to get the Treaty enforced. He urged that with the Bill before the British House of Commons they had to consider the possibility that a general election in Ireland might again become the shuttlecock of British politicians.

The Dail decided to sit till the finish of the debate.

The President, replying to Mr. McGrath, former Minister of Commerce, said that the Government did not intend to proceed with the Bill until it had passed the British House of Commons.

The Bill then passed its first reading by 60 votes to 10.—Reuter.

MUTINOUS OUTBREAK IN THE SUDAN

Anti-British Demonstrations Caused by Pro-Egyptian Propaganda

London, Aug. 12.

Reuter's Agency learns that a British battalion is proceeding from Egypt to reinforce the British troops in the Sudan as a consequence of three outbreaks following pro-Egyptian demonstrations.

The cadets of the military school at Khartum staged a demonstration on August 9, but were disarmed by a company of British troops. The Egyptian Railway Battalion at Atbara on August 10 got out of hand and did damage to the British troops. A squadron of Arab mounted rifles were sent to Atbara on August 11 and these surrounded the Railway Battalion at the market place and compelled them to return to barracks. They broke out again and drove back the infantry cordon with their rifle butts, and threw bricks and other missiles at the troops. The infantry opened fire, inflicting 19 casualties. On August 10 at Port Sudan 20 to 30 men of the Egyptian Railway Battalion broke from their barracks armed with clubs, and, led by a suspended official, paraded the town. They finally returned to barracks. The towns-people remained calm.

Later.

The disturbances in the Sudan are attributed by the London newspapers to Egyptian Nationalist propaganda on the eve of the impending negotiations between Zaghlul Pasha, who is at present taking the waters at Vichy, and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald on the subject of the Sudan.

It may be recalled that Zaghlul Pasha, speaking in the Chamber of Deputies in Cairo on June 28, declared that the Egyptian nation would never abandon its rights to the Sudan because it was impossible for Egypt to live without the Sudan.—Reuter.

Egypt has no rights in the Sudan. No racial or linguistic affinity links the Sudan with Egypt. The province was brutally conquered by Mehemet Ali in 1820; and the cruelty with which it was bled by its Egyptian rulers during the next 60 years was the main cause of the successful revolt which was headed by the Mahdi and his Khalifas. When Lord Kitchener reconquerred the province in the nineties. An Anglo-Egyptian condominium was set up, but from the first Britain exercised the controlling voice, and the whole of the wonderful work of reconstruction which has brought the Sudan a prosperity never known before has been due to British administrators. The Sudanese desire no change, and hate the idea of being put back under Egyptian control

Khartum, Aug. 12.

The trouble at Atbara began by a number of railway troops refusing to obey their Egyptian officers. A mounted infantry detachment of the Egyptian Army as well as British troops arrived and restored order. Subsequently the railway troops broke out again and attacked the mounted infantry, who eventually opened fire. Two mutineers were killed, and 16 wounded, two of whom died later.—Reuter.

Alexandria, Aug. 12.

A communiqué has been issued stating that no British troops were present when the Egyptian Railway Battalion was fired on at Atbara. Apparently the Sudan Arab Mounted Rifles fired without orders under great provocation.—Reuter.

Everything Now Quiet: High Commissioner Conferring with Premier

London, Aug. 13.

Field-Marshal Viscount Allenby, the High Commissioner for Egypt, and Major-General Sir Lee Stack, the Governor-General of the Sudan and Sirdar of the Egyptian Army, to-day had a long conference with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald at the Foreign Office on the subject of the Sudan.—Reuter.

Cairo, Aug. 13.

MR. DAVIS ACCEPTS NOMINATION

Democratic Candidate's Strong Denunciation of Republican Foreign Policy

Clarksburg, W. Va., Aug. 11.

Mr. John W. Davis, former Ambassador to Great Britain, to-day formally accepted the Democratic Presidential nomination in the course of a speech in which he gave a bitter review of the four-year record of the Government party, without sparing reference to the association of some of its members with the unsavoury oil scandal.

Mr. Davis declared that there was no evidence that the Republicans could frame and carry out any definite, consistent foreign policy. "With the reconstruction of Europe weighing heavily on the world, with American economic life dwarfed and stunted by the interruption of world commerce, with the agricultural regions in the west sinking into bankruptcy owing to the loss of foreign markets, we have stood by, powerless spectators, offering the world nothing but private charity and individual advice."

The Presidential nominee promised a reduction in taxes and tariffs. He said that the Democrats sincerely favoured the World Court and expressed the opinion that the day was coming when the voice of American public sentiment would be heard in favour of membership of the League of Nations.—Reuter's American Service.

MRS EVANS'S MURDERERS ON TRIAL

British Representative's Protest Against Method of Procedure

BIG JAPANESE LOAN IN AMERICA

London, Aug. 12.

It is reported from New York that a syndicate headed by the National City Bank announce that they will offer to-morrow a $20,000,000 loan at 99½ guaranteed by the Japanese Government. The loan will yield rather more than six per cent. and will be utilised for general current purposes in Japan and to promote Japanese industries. —Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 12.

The Japanese loan is described in an announcement as being payable in war time as well as in time of peace, irrespective of the nationality of the holder, and without any declaration regarding citizenship.

The "New York World" says that the phrasing of the contract, which is probably unique in American finance, has apparently been brought about by the Japanese Exclusion Act and the known fears of American investors of the possibility of war between Japan and America. The wording is designed to appease these fears and induce investors to acquire bonds which they might otherwise leave alone.—Reuter's American Service.

OPIUM SMUGGLING INTO CANADA

BRITISH INDUSTRIES AT WEMBLEY

Bringing Overseas Visitors into Touch with Home Means of Supply

London, Aug 13.

One of the features of the Wembley Exhibition has been the fortnightly exhibitions at the Civic Hall of the activities of the leading English cities, which have proved very valuable in bringing overseas visitors into contact with representatives of British industries.

This is exemplified in the case of Salford, which yesterday entertained at a luncheon prominent personages from Africa and from the East.

Mr. E. R. Hallifax, the Commissioner for Hongkong, in a speech emphasized that the real object of the Exhibition could not be attained without an interchange of ideas; otherwise it would be reduced to the level of a museum if the Exhibition opened again in 1925. The example that Salford had given would make the Exhibition in 1925 more valuable than in 1924.

The Rajah of Perak said that more attention was paid to the cotton requirements of the natives by Britain's competitors than by Lancashire; but he had seen to-day certain cloths of royal colour and would tell the native rulers where they were obtainable.—Reuter.

AMERICAN FLIERS MAY GIVE IN

Reykjavik, Aug. 8.

It is stated that Admiral Magruder to-day summoned a conference on board his flag-ship, U.S.S. Richmond, to discuss the advisability of calling off the American world-flight owing to ice conditions on the Greenland coast.

Later.

The Conference has decided to make a last effort to find a feasible landing-place on the east coast of Greenland before it is finally decided to call off the flight for the present season.—Reuter.

ICELAND TO GREENLAND BY AIR

Italian Airman's Expectations: American Fliers Still Weatherbound

London, Aug. 10.

Reykjavik, Aug. 12.

Lieutenant Marscaldi has arrived here and is preparing to receive Signor Locatelli, the Italian airman, whom he expects to-day. The American naval and military authorities here have promised their fullest co-operation with regard to Signor Locatelli's flight to Greenland.

Abnormal conditions, ice and fog are still delaying the start of the American world-fliers. They will probably be able to leave Reykjavik before Signor Locatelli whose machine will require long overhauling in Iceland, but Signor Locatelli has a long cruising range and may fly straight to the West Coast of Greenland if the base which the Americans are endeavouring to establish at Angmagsalik in East Greenland proves impracticable.—Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

FRANCO-GERMAN RAPPROCHEMENT

Delay in Settlement Due to Pressure of Public Opinion in France and Germany: Germany's Probable Acceptance of French Terms of Ruhr Evacuation

London, Aug. 14.

On the adjournment of the Conference at one this afternoon, it was announced that the German delegates had been given two hours to reply to the French proposals with regard to the military evacuation of the Ruhr, which the British and American Delegations have approved.

The decision of the British and American representatives to support the French caused consternation among the Germans, who feel that adoption of the proposals would precipitate the fall of the German Government. The issue is regarded as so momentous that some of the delegates may go to Berlin to consult the Cabinet before replying.

Later.

The German delegates have decided to refer to Berlin by telegraph the French proposition with reference to the evacuation of the Ruhr. They hope to receive an answer by to-morrow.

Later.

The French, Belgian and German conversations yesterday settled the question of an amnesty for expelled German officials and postponed the question of leaving the French and Belgian railwaymen in the Ruhr after the military evacuation because that question was bound up with the Rhineland settlement.

Though the discussions are at a deadlock on the subject of military evacuation, another difficult question is that of dyestuffs. The Germans refuse to include these and other by-products of coal in the list of commodities to form part of the reparation payments. The French fear that unless these are included in the deliveries the Germans may dump dyestuffs into France and destroy the industry which the French have built up since the end of the War, and which is very important from the point of view of manufacture of explosives.

Another fear expressed in Paris is that if France barters the evacuation of the Ruhr for favourable concessions in the Commercial Treaty, British industrialists may demand a quid pro quo.

A Formula for a Compromise

Later.

Pressure of public opinion in France and Germany on M. Herriot and Herr Marx, respectively, is responsible for the delay in reaching a settlement in London. Each advance made by either towards a compromise is severely criticized in both capitals as surrender.

M. Herriot, during yesterday's discussions with the Belgian and German delegates, which was the first time that foreign statesmen had conferred at Downing Street without the presence of a British Minister, was fervent in the expression of his desire to establish a new era in Franco-German rapprochement. Herr Marx accepted his plea that public opinion hampered his desire to evacuate the Ruhr before a year but inquired whether M. Herriot was certain of remaining in power for a year.

The arrival of M. Loucheur in London is regarded as significant. He is the author of the scheme for Franco-German industrial rapprochement which the London Conference of 1921 rejected because it provided for French penetration into German mines and factories. M. Loucheur is backed by the French ironmasters who are now opposing M. Herriot's abandonment of this scheme. M. Loucheur is the leader of the powerful group of Left Radicals, who have, up to the present, been supporters of the Government. M. Herriot has to reckon with the contingency of withdrawal of that support when he meets the Chamber of Deputies.

The only hope of a solution now is that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, or one of the American delegates, or the Belgian Premier, M. Theunis, may find a formula for a compromise. The Belgians are in no way so adamant on the subject of evacuation as the French.

Later.

The diplomatic correspondent of the "Daily Graphic" understands that Herr Marx has telegraphed to President Ebert recommending acceptance of the French evacuation plan.

Later.

The Government has decided permanently to restore the 26 per cent. percentage levied on German imports under the Reparations Recovery Act. The Government on taking office reduced the percentage to 5 per cent.—Reuter.

The French Limit

London, Aug. 15.

With the entire settlement at stake, including the benefits Germany would gain by carrying out the Dawes plan and by the floating of the £40,000,000 loan, the opinion is generally expressed that the German delegates recognize that half a loaf is better than no bread and will accept M. Herriot's evacuation plan, though possibly they may temporise in order to save the faces of the Nationalists.

The London papers endorse the opinion expressed to the German delegates by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, the American delegate, and other Allied representatives that, in view of the state of public opinion in France, M. Herriot has gone as far as possible in proposing the maximum of a one-year interval before evacuation.

The situation has been eased by the intimation that circumstances might eventually make an earlier evacuation possible.

M. Herriot at the 11th hour made two further concessions by offering to evacuate immediately a number of the more recently occupied places like the Rhine ports of Mannheim and Wesel and the zones between the bridgeheads on the right bank of the Rhine and also to withdraw the French and Belgian railwaymen while reserving the right to reinforce the railway troops in case of emergency.

Baron Hayashi, the Japanese delegate, who rarely expressed his opinion at the Conference, yesterday expressed concurrence by recommending the German delegates to accept the French proposal.—Reuter.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S PROPOSALS

Further Tax Reductions and Aid to Agriculture: In Favour of Protection

Washington, Aug. 14.

President Coolidge, in accepting the Republican nomination for the Presidency, proposed further tax reduction and promised to appoint a commission to investigate means for aiding agriculture.

He summed up America's foreign policy in the word "peace," and declared that when the Dawes plan was under way, he would propose another international conference to discuss further limitation of armaments.

He declared in favour of protection, and indicated that if he were elected, he would adjust the tariffs from time to time as needed. He upheld the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice, and approved of Americans assisting in the restoration of Europe.—Reuter's American Service.

The Immigration Bill

The President said that he would have preferred a method of exclusion less likely to offend the sensibilities of the Japanese. He had done all he could to minimise any harm, but the laws had been passed and approved, and consequently the incident was closed. "We must seek," he concluded, "by some means besides immigration to demonstrate the friendship and respect we feel for the Japanese nation."—Reuter's American Service.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

A CHANNEL TUNNEL BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE?

An Old Project Powerfully Revived

From a Correspondent.

London, July 7.

A scheme for a "Channel Tunnel" between England and France under the Straits of Dover is alive again in England. It is said that 400 members of the House of Commons have declared themselves in favour of it, so that if the Government allowed it to be submitted the project might pass the Lower House, and it is known that 20 members of the MacDonald Ministry, including 10 Cabinet Ministers, are on the same side. But a good many of these applauding voices gave their assent towards the end of the war, when everything calculated to help France and to advance the cause on the Western Front won immediate favour. Their view might be different nowadays and in any event theirs is not the decisive voice.

Army and Navy Against

On this question the heads of the army, the navy and the air force exert enormous authority and there is good reason to believe that the war and its "lessons" have not made the slightest difference to the view which their departments have always held. It was they who in 1906, July 1914 and at the end of 1919 pronounced against the Channel Tunnel as dangerous to the national interest and thereby dismissed it summarily from the category of practical politics. Now the champions of the Tunnel maintain that conditions have been changed by the Great War and that there is no longer the slightest basis for the anxiety of the military men.

This Channel Tunnel is a French idea. The great Napoleon himself was in favour of it. "This is one of the big things," he said, "which we (the French and English) ought to do in common." As most Englishmen have a very vivid impression of Napoleon as a man who for a large part of his career was intent on invading England, his advocacy of the Tunnel scheme does not endear it to them. The French attitude is indeed fundamentally different from that of the English. France stands to gain by the Tunnel commercially in time of peace and in a military sense in time of war if we should again be her allies. M. François-Marshal, a former Finance Minister of France and recently stop-gap Premier for a few short days has declared that if one stands on the top of Cape Gris Nez and contemplates the English coast, "it is hard to resist the temptation to try and find a firm and permanent means of communication between the two countries." Another French authority has written that one is overcome by a desire for "the re-establishment of the original arrangements of nature." Nothing could be more illuminating to the English mind. The "original arrangements of nature" made England part of the Continental mass, gave her a land frontier and would have exposed her to constant threat of invasion. She has been saved from all this by her insularity and the question is what would she gain by abandoning it, what risks would she run and how has the position so changed that what has been judged by the coolest heads in England to be indefensible should now be pressed so zealously. First, what is the nature of the present scheme?

The Scheme in Outline.

The proposed Tunnel would be 24 miles under the bed of the sea and a further six, eight, or 10 miles inland on the French and the English coasts. As the range of artillery and the fear of submarines grow, the tendency is to push the mouths of the Tunnel farther and farther inland. There would be two separate tubes, as in the case of the Simplon Tunnel (12 miles long) beneath the Alps. There would be two tubes in order to reduce the pressure of the land-mass above which weighs upon the arch and side of the tunnel. (So also with the Simplon, which has 7,000 feet of mountain pressing upon the tunnel tubes). These tubes, which would each carry two pairs of rails, would be 20 feet in diameter and would run parallel to each other. They would be from 20 to 60 feet apart, but at frequent intervals there would be cross-tubes leading from one to the other. There would also be two smaller drainage tubes, which would be quite separate.

Most fortunately for the tunnel project, the chalk-marl which is found both in Kent and on the French coast, extends also beneath the Straits of Dover. It is the same chalk-bed and in some remote age part of it subsided underneath the sea. This submarine layer of chalk, which is impermeable by water, is 60 feet in thickness and there are other strata on top of the chalk. The tubes would be driven in the chalk at such a depth that there would always be a minimum of 100 feet of solid matter between them and the sea. The chalk is ideal material for tunnelling, just as is the blue clay, also impermeable, in which the London tubes are driven.

Safeguard on Insularity.

It is intended that whenever Parliament has sanctioned the tunnel, a Test Tube 12 feet wide will first of all be constructed. Then will come the real working tunnels. In all from five to seven years would be occupied in the construction. According to present plans there would be an important device in the tunnel itself by which the British could, at need, make it absolutely unworkable while not destroying it permanently. It is usually said in this country that arrangements would have to be made by which the tunnel could be blown up at a moment's notice. But what the engineers propose is to provide the tubes with a "water-lock." That is to say, for a distance of about a mile the tubes would make a slight dip so that they could be flooded over this extent from floor to roof. The water could, when the danger was passed, be pumped out but only by machinery operated by the power-station on Kentish soil, probably some 10 miles from the sea. In a report which was drawn up in 1876 in order to serve as a basis for a treaty it was expressly stipulated that each Government reserves the right "to destroy, either totally or partially, the railway on its own territory and to flood the tunnel."

The cost of the tunnel, it is estimated, would be £29,000,000, an increase of £13,000,000 on the estimated pre-war cost. Half of this sum would be found in France, where the Northern Railway Company has always been an enthusiastic supporter of the project, and half in England. On a conservative basis it is calculated that there would be a profit of from 5 to 8 per cent. on the capital involved. There is, of course, no doubt that the crossing of the Channel—where there are 200 days of unfavourable conditions in each year—reduces the tourist traffic far below what it should normally be. Queen Victoria herself once sent a message to the French engineers:—"How I shall bless you, and how English women will bless you, if you succeed in saving us from the Channel crossing." The traffic between England and France is only one-fourth of what it is between France and the neighbouring Continental countries. If the tunnel were built, expresses would leave London for every part of the Continent as well as for France and the insular Englishman would receive a great urge to embark on Continental travel There would unquestionably also be a great deal of goods traffic, which it is designed should be carried on at night.

A War Proposition.

But all this is admitted and is beside the mark. Why should the tunnel be more desirable and safer now? Its advocates say that had it been in existence in 1914 it would have shortened the war enormously. This is highly disputable. It is almost certain that the Germans, on first invading France, would have made an immediate and desperate push for the mouth of the tunnel. It is certain that had they done so, they could not at the time have been kept back. It is still more certain that under such circumstances England would promptly have destroyed the tunnel and we should then have been left not only without the tunnel but with the Germans established at Calais and in a much better position to raid our coasts, our shipping and London.

The second argument most often brought forward is that "England is no longer an island" because of the development of the aeroplane and it is, of course, true that we have now no certain and complete defence against aeroplane attack. However strong England is in the air when the next war comes, it is almost impossible that London and our important railway and munition centres should not suffer seriously. But that is quite a different thing from invasion and the risk in the case of the tunnel—the risk that England has never yet been willing to take and in my opinion will not and ought not to take now—is that a foreign enemy should somehow by a surprise blow capture the Kentish entrance to the tunnel and within a few hours get over a sufficient number of men to seize and defend a zone round the tunnel mouth until a whole army has been brought across. No doubt that is a very slight, a very improbable risk. But one does not gamble with the safety of a nation. There is such a risk and why should we run any risk at all.

Greater Caution than Ever.

Even the most moderate critics admit that the experiences of the Great War show the need for greater caution than there was before. That we were an ally of France during the war is nothing to the point. Political relationships are not permanent and no one knows what the future holds. What we do know is that France is concentrating on the idea of submarines and aeroplanes as the weapons of the weaker Powers. Submarines are an element of surprise and there is nothing at all improbable in the idea of a small force of men being conveyed secretly to the Kentish coast for the purpose of seizing the tunnel-entrance in the night time. Therefore this entrance must be pushed farther and farther inland. It is conceivable that a lightning raid might be caried out by large aeroplanes with a similar object and a distance of a few miles inland would in this case be no defence. It is, of course, easy to deride such possibilities and to point out that at the slightest sign of danger the Commandant at Dover or at the power-house can destroy or flood the tunnel by pressing a button. But at that point we run up against the "human factor," which always and invariably involves the possibility, however remote, of error.

It may be added that in another great war like the last it is difficult to believe that England could in any case make effectual use of the tunnel to pour troops into France, because there would be several miles of exposed railway leading up to the coast and it would, according to all our previous experience, be impossible to prevent hostile aeroplanes from bombing these open miles.

But the decisive point is unquestionably the danger of a surprise attack. The chiefs of our war departments have never yet convinced themselves that this danger does not exist. Even if they did, I do not myself think that the tunnel would be built. Public opinion has never worried much about the tunnel because it has never yet been a "practical proposition." But if the Imperial Committee of Defence and the Government and even the House of Commons showed signs of destroying to this extent the island-position of England, I think that there would be a storm. Lord Lansdowne, a sage Elder Statesman once said:—"We may succeed in convincing ourselves that no military danger exists, but I do not believe that we shall succed in convincing the Public." The public would be right.

The International Air Congress, which concluded its labours in Paris in June, adopted a proposal to draw up a chart of the whole world, showing suitable landing places, fully equipped aerodromes, and giving other indication of utility to pilots. The Congress decided on the creation of a gold medal which will be awarded annually to commemorate the finest aerial feat of the year.

OUR CANADIAN LETTER

Dr. Yoshida's Arrival: "Caretaker" at the Washington Embassy

From Our Own Correspondent.

Vancouver, B.C., July 17.

The Japanese exclusion bill signed by President Coolidge is the chief topic of discussion among arrivals here from the Orient. Dr. Isaburo Yoshida C.B., C.V.O., who arrived here in the Empress of Australia en route to Washington to take up his official duties as counsellor at the Japanese Embassy there, asked as to the nature of his instructions at this critical time in the relations between Japan and the United States, was reticent. "I am going to Washington as a 'caretaker,'" laughed the counsellor who declined to indicate further what course would be taken on his assuming the duties. He had no information as to whether the vacancy created by the Ambassador, Mr. Hanihari's 'holiday' would be filled.

Dr. Yoshida is no stranger to Washington, having had four years previous residence at the embassy there. Before going to Peking he served in London where he received the C.V.O. and C.B. for his services.

Senator Robert J. O'Brien, of Cincinnati, on his return from a visit to the Orient, after making a tour of the world in the Empress of Canada, came here convinced that other countries are meeting with quiet success in obtaining commercial advantages over the United States as a result of the ill-feeling in Japan at present against Americans.

Dr. W. T. Chang.

The Rev. Dr. W. T. Chang, the noted Chinese Christian worker, sailed to-day by the Empress of Australia on his return to China. For the past year he has been addressing meetings in the United States and has conducted classes at Union Theological Seminary, New York. Dr. Chang, it is understood, has been invited to become president of Shantung Christian University, the union institution supported by 12 different church denominations. Dr. Chang, who was in Vancouver a couple of days before sailing, was met on his arrival from Seattle by members of the Ministerial Association and was entertained at a noon luncheon given by that body in his honour.

Railway officials from China seeking recreation on this side and in Europe include Mr. Allan Cameron, of Hongkong, Oriental manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who is accompanied by Mrs. Cameron, and Dr. C. C. Wang, chairman of the Chinese Eastern Railway. Dr. Wang will spend six months in America and Europe.

THE RUSSELL CASE

Widespread Effect of Decision At Home

The Divorce Court in London opened in mail week after the Whitsun recess, and it is understood that an early opportunity will be taken of calling attention to the strange position which has been created as a result of the Law Lords' decision in the Russell case.

It is expected at the Bar that Sir Henry Duke, the President of the Divorce Division of the High Court, will make a considered statement on the position as affected by the recent judgment of the House of Lords.

Already three cases have been specially referred from the provinces to London for argument, and it is believed in legal circles that large numbers of other cases will also be referred to the Divorce Court from assizes in all parts of the country.

The effect of the Law Lords' judgment was that husbands and wives are not competent in law to give evidence as to their relations with each other when such evidence may prejudice the legitimacy of their offspring.

Definite Ruling.

Arguing from this basis, counsel for a petitioner at the Norwich Assizes said that neither party to a divorce suit could now give direct evidence to say that a child was not theirs. The husband in the case had said that after separating from his wife gave birth to a child of which he was not the father. Mr. Justice Sankey referred the case, with two others, to London.

"What will probably happen," said a prominent authority on divorce to a Press representative, "is that the President of the Divorce Division will give a general ruling, based on the House of Lords judgment as to what evidence is admissible and what is not.

"We anticipate a certain amount of argument to result from the Russell decision, but once a definite ruling is given things are likely to settle down again.

Lord Birkenhead's Decision.

It will be recalled that in the Russell case judgment Lord Birkenhead said:—

"It is said that the view recommended above will revolutionise the practice of the Divorce Court. My attention was called to the fact that in an undefended divorce case which I myself tried at nisi prius I had admitted evidence of non-access bastardising the issue and given by a soldier petitioner. The matter was not argued, so that my attention was not directed to the point. With argument I am sure that I should have reached my present conclusion. In such cases the non-access can almost always be established aliunde. If it cannot be so proved, the practice of the Divorce Court must accommodate itself to the authority of the rule."

A well-known barrister said: "It is a curious commentary on the uncertainty of the law of England, as administered in the courts, that a decision in the year 1777, which has been reaffirmed by the House of Lords, in the Russell case, should have come to be ignored. Unfortunately the issue has not been taken to the supreme tribunal before, with the result that numerous cases have been decided during the long interval contrary to what has now been established as the law of the land. The Russell decision is one of the highest possible public utility and importance."

U. S. SCHOLARSHIPS FOR ENGLISH JOURNALISTS

New York, July 20.

It was announced to-day by the control committee of the proposed school that two scholarships for English journalists will be established in the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations by the English Speaking Union. The scholarships will be of one year's duration and granted with the understanding that the recipients will spend part of the year at the Johns Hopkins University, where the new school is to be founded.

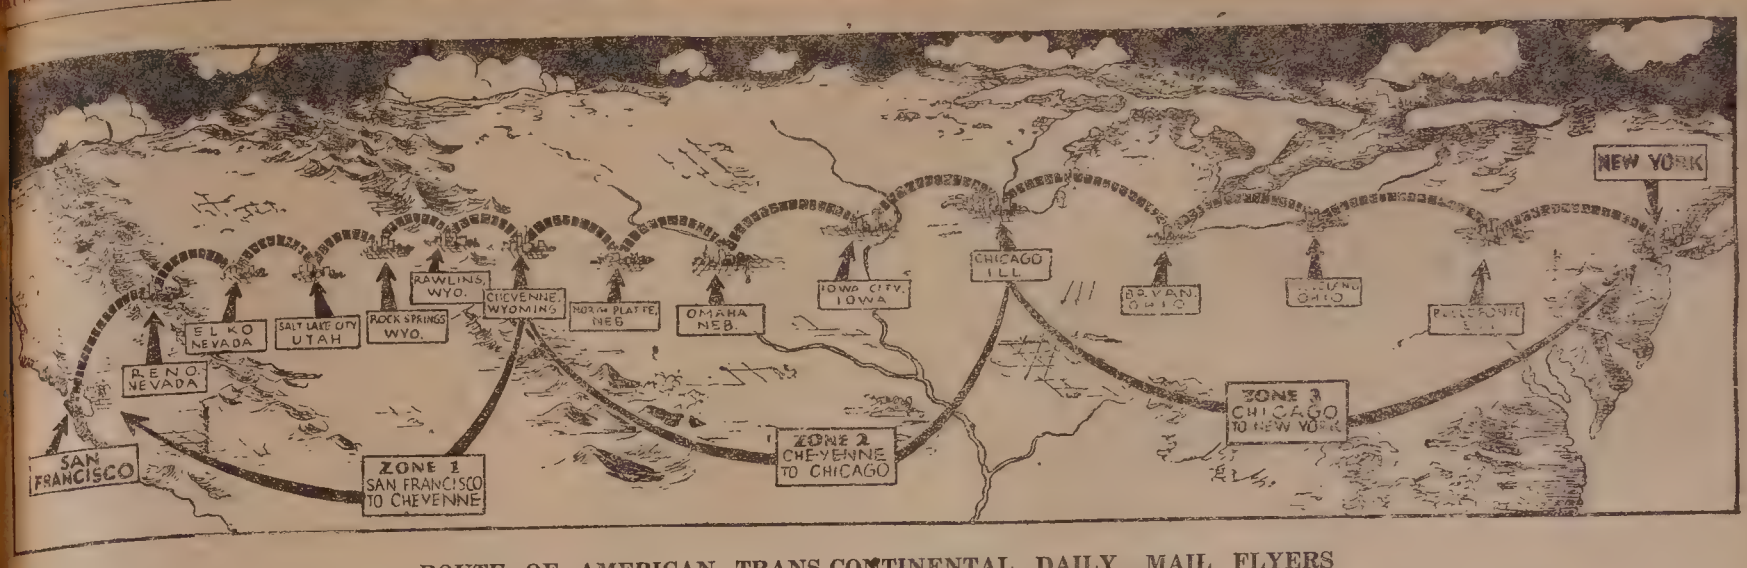
The scholarships will have a value of $2,500 each and will be put into operation the first year through the provision of $5,000. It is understood that if the experiment is successful a principal fund of $100,000 will be raised by the English Speaking Union to establish permanent journalistic scholarships in the New Page School. They too, will bear the name of Walter Hines Page and be the Union's contribution toward one of the practical uses to which this school will be put and for which friends and admirers of America's late ambassador to Great Britain are seeking an endowment of $1,000,000 from the American public.—Reuter's American Service.

POOR PERSONS AND NULLITY SUITS

Reduction of Fees

An important departure in the direction of further assisting the poor litigant in the Divorce Court is announced. The President of the Divorce Division, Sir Henry Duke, has just made a provisional rule reducing the deposit required in the case of poor persons' nullity suits from £15 to £5.

Mr. A. Hassard Short, secretary of the poor persons Department, states that the reduction has been brought about by the medical examiners having agreed not to charge any fee, either for the examination or for giving evidence in such suits by poor persons. Heretofore, the medical examiners' fees have usually amounted to about 17 guineas.



ROUTE OF AMERICAN TRANS-CONTINENTAL DAILY MAIL FLYERS

The above bird's eye view of the United States gives an idea of the distance to be covered by the aerial mail service of the American Government, whose planes maintain daily service, both ways between New York and San Francisco. The continent is divided into three tariff zones, and for each ounce eight cents gold in stamps must be affixed. Parcels up to 50 lb. in weight will be carried at this rate, but the bulkier articles will, without question be currency,—this means of transportation saving American bankers millions annually in interest charges —the difference between train and aerial times being nearly three days. The service is receiving the enthusiastic support of the public.

THE BYFLEET MURDER CASE

From Our Own Correspondent.

Manchester, July 7.

The trial of Vaquier for the murder of Alfred Jones, the landlord of the Blue Anchor Hotel, Byfleet, has excited more public interest in Great Britain than any murder trial since the famous Kidwelly poisoning case. Many people who take little interest in the average sensational murder trial were intrigued on this occasion by the spectacle of a typical Frenchman fighting for his life in an English Assize Court before a jury impervious to anything but facts. Vaquier expected to be browbeaten by the judge and bullied by the police. The urbanity of the proceedings at the trial made him confident of an acquittal on the first and second day, intimidated him a little later, and finally threw him into a manical rage, screaming protests against his counsel and the judge and jury.

Jean Pierre Vaquier is a typical middle-aged Frenchman of the lower middle class. Prior to the war he was a small shopkeeper in the South of France. He served through the war and was badly wounded. At its conclusion he started another shop, which was not successful, and then attempted to find a financier to capitalise some small inventions he had patented. Among these inventions there was a sausage machine, and some wireless "gadgets" for the improvement of reception. He obtained a post at a Biarritz hotel as controller of the wireless installation and eked out a small salary by selling his "improvements" to the visitors. At this hotel he met the wife of Mr. Jones. She was staying at Biarritz for her health. Vaquier struck up an acquaintance with her by means of a French-English conversation book, as neither of them could speak the native language of the other. Relations became more intimate and they stayed together as man and wife at another Riviera hotel. Soon after Mrs. Jones returned to her home at Byfleet Vaquier came to England and resided for a short time at the Hotel Russell while he was trying to dispose of some patents. From there he went on to the Blue Anchor at Byfleet as a paying guest.

The Fatal Morning After.

Mrs. Jones was an enterprising business woman if not a very successful one. She had other business interests in addition to the Blue Anchor Hotel and at times handled considerable sums of money. Her husband was a heavy drinker but not a bad-natured man. Nearly every night he drank more than was good for him, and on the morning after it was his invariable custom to mix for himself a dose of Bromo salts to get rid of the ensuing headache. The salts were kept in a bottle in a public room in the hotel. On March 28 there was a party at the hotel and Mr. Jones drank heavily. The following morning he came downstairs late, poured himself out a dose of salts, complained that they did not "Fizz," drank them, cried out that they were bitter, and immediately had a seizure. His wife came to him, poured out a few of the remaining salts in the bottle and tasted them. She said that they had been tampered with, gave him an emetic and immediately sent for a doctor. When the doctor arrived Mr. Jones was in a state of extreme terror but fully conscious. He died shortly afterwards and the post mortem revealed that strychnine poisoning was the cause of his death.

The trial took place at the Surrey Assizes before Mr. Justice Avory. The Attorney General, Sir Patrick Hastings, led for the Crown, and Vaquier was defended by Sir Henry Curtis Bennett. Evidence given proved that on March 1 Vaquier went up to London from Byfleet and purchased certain chemicals including two deadly poisons, perchloride of mercury and strychnine. Asked by the assistant what he wanted them for, he answered that they were for wireless experiments. He then signed the poisons book in a false name. Mrs. Jones giving evidence said that on the morning of her husband's death Vaquier suggested he was suffering from an attack of colic. She accused him of assassinating her husband and alleged that he replied "Yes, Mabs, for you." This statement appeared greatly to amuse Vaquier who turned round and smiled broadly at the Court.

The cook at the Blue Anchor gave evidence that after Vaquier had helped to carry Mr. Jones upstairs he came down again and asked for the bottle of salts. Mrs. Jones had put it away in a drawer for subsequent examination. The cook directed Vaquier to the drawer and he took the bottle away and washed it out. Evidence was given to prove that Vaquier wished Mrs. Jones to leave her husband and go and live with him on the continent.

The Main Defence.

Sir Henry Curtis Bennett's main line of defence was a determined attempt to discredit Mrs. Jones' evidence. It was suggested that she was on very bad terms with her husband for a considerable time before his death. She was also exhaustively cross-examined on whether a visit she paid to the kitchen of the hotel on the morning of the tragedy before her husband took the salts was not a most unusual visit. The wife of the manager of the hotel, Mrs. Whitewick gave evidence that she saw Mrs. Jones go to her dressing table and take a small purse from a handbag and take it into a lavatory. A short time afterwards she tucked it in her dress from which it fell out on the stairs. Mrs. Whitewick picked it up, opened it, found it empty and returned it to Mrs. Jones. A fortnight later she asked Mrs. Jones what had been in the purse, and was told that it was a small photograph of Mr. Vaquier. The apparent inference from this cross-examination was a suggestion that Mrs. Jones wished to get rid of her husband and had gone downstairs on the morning of the tragedy and tampered with the salts by adding to them a poison she carried about in her purse. The defence also alleged that Mrs. Jones was on very affectionate terms with her solicitor.

The strongest circumstantial evidence against Vaquier was the unchallenged evidence that he had purchased strychnine in a false name for a purpose that experts proved it could not be used for. Vaquier in the witness box alleged that he bought the strychnine for Mr. Bruce Millar, the solicitor for Mrs. Jones. He said that Mr. Millar told him he had a dog with the mange which he wished to destroy. Vaquier suggested strychnine and offered to get some, and alleged that Millar gave him £1 to do so. Mr. Millar emphatically denied all these charges, and Sir Patrick Hastings said that this part of Vaquier's evidence was "beyond human credulity." He asked the jury if they could imagine anything more improbable than a solicitor asking a person who scarcely knew a word of English to buy him a poison under a false name. He then explained that in such trials the law officers of the Crown had the right to have the last word to the jury, but he would on this occasion waive that right as the prisoner was a foreigner and some people might think it was a hardship to him.

The Summing Up.

The Judge in summing up commented on the fact that Mrs. Jones took the most prompt methods to make her husband sick when she suspected he was suffering from poison. He also commented adversely on Vaquier's allegations against Mr. Millar the solicitor, and remarked that no explanation had been given of the purchase by Vaquier of perchloride of mercury.

The jury were away for 1 hour and 40 minutes considering their verdict. When they returned Vaquier was brought into the dock by two warders, and with the governor of Brixton prison and the prison doctor behind him. The verdict of "Guilty" was translated to him and the Judge asked if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him. Vaquier shouted that he was innocent and would swear to that on the graves of his mother and father. He turned to the jury and gesticulated wildly, screaming that the verdict was iniquitous. The sentence of death was translated to him by the interpreter and listened to in silence but as soon as the Chaplain said "Amen" he broke out again and was forcibly removed from the dock shouting that all the witnesses were liars and that he would defend himself again.

After the verdict Mr. Justice Avory before passing sentence of death said "I see no reason whatever to doubt the righteousness of that verdict. You have been tried according to the law and procedure of this country which are more favourable to the interests of the accused than the law of any other country in the world and you have had further the advantage of being defended by one of the most able and experienced counsel at the English Bar." Few people will be likely to disagree with this comment although many believe that this wretched man would have stood a greater chance of escaping justice if he had been tried before a Latin jury more sympathetic to crimes of passion.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LIFE

Our Love of Romance

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, July 16.

I was not there myself but I was told that in a well frequented street at Chelsea this week about four in the morning when the traffic was just beginning there was a Melancholy Devil wandering about disconsolately trying to find a taxicab. The crowd paid not the least attention to this eccentricity of costume —whereas, said my friend with some surprise, in America the police would have clubbed him and then run him in while in Paris he would have been followed by a large and hostile crowd intent on doing him. "How," I was asked "do you explain this difference in point of treatment?" "Ah," said I, "that is due to our love of Romance." There was and is a good deal of truth in the couplet of the German poet Wieland; as applied to the natural inclinations of the Anglo-Saxon;—

Zum Ritt in's alte remantische Land.

Under the phlegmatic exterior so well-known to the foreign cartoonist the Englishman preserves an affection of romance. This week I had three visits at my office—the Bey of Tunis, Admiral Blake and John Cabot....as well as the fore and aft legs of Aurungzebe's elephant. In other words the Civil Service are doing great things at the Empire Pageant at Wembley and the callers as a matter of fact came round to make very strong complaints about their garb.

A Little Too Previous.

You see when the Empire Pageant was started the War Office, which is playing an important role—with the Department of Overseas Trade—in making all arrangements, decided that after the Great War it would no longer permit the application to its activities—or the lack of them —of the epithet of Ethelred the Unready. It therefore set about manufacturing the ancient costumes. It soon made them all. Unfortunately they were all made with the least reference to the build of the people who were to wear them and when I saw poor old Blake he could not make his attire fasten round him anywhere while the Bey of Tunis suggested Little Willie wearing Daddy's worn-out Sunday Best—without alterations. I deferentially said that my conception of a Bey was "a fat old ruffian of burly stature with a long black beaver." "That's as it may be," he rejoined, "but this was the only piece of 'fat' going and I took it. Why if I hadn't taken it they might have made me a pirate "and they're awfully short of pirates." So I consoled him and said that no doubt Clarkson would do the needful and that with very little alteration he would probably look a still more terrible tough than he appeared in civil garb. To this I may add that my typist is, I believe, one of the captured maidens whom the ruthless pirates are in the act of carrying off when intercepted by the said Blake and his worthy followers. I don't think, though, she can possibly wear more diaphanous attire than she dons in ordinary life —the police positively wouldn't let her.

George and the Bobby.

Yes we love romance. Otherwise pageant could not possibly prosper as they do. You have the big affair at Wembley. All over the country you have small ones especially in the country villages. The smaller the village the greater the enthusiasm. There is a fiction that George and the village "policeman" spend their evenings in the Cat and Whistle. It is a pure fiction. George is Thomas a Becket and Robert, Fits Gengulphus or whoever the gentleman was that slit the prelate's gizzard—or any way knocked him on the head. The libretto is written by the Vicar's daughter and the Schoolmarm designs the dresses with the proceeds of a Jumble Sale held ad hoc. The simple unsophiscated people send to the press and next day you see notices in the papers calling attention to the marvellous growth of "cultchah" in the countryside and saying how elementary education is supplanting the excessive abuse of bad beer;

Fancy dress costumes were never so popular. In the sacred cause of charity especially with a religious flavour the entire district will attire itself in the weirdest of garb and pretend it is the exact reproduction of refined mediævalism. For weeks you run up against friends who will greet you with "I'fackins" and "Odds Bodikins," which I am told it is quite the coorect thing to do under the circumstances. You journey home late from the office and, leaning up against the door of the railway carriage or straphanging, you will see Julius Cæsar or Marie Antoinette with a Joan of Arc or two, all smoking cigarettes or chewing chocolates. It isn't swank. It's just because it won't go to a taxi and all fellow travellers know it and are tolerantly silent.

The only trouble is the cost. No decent self-respecting man or woman—particularly woman—can appear in the same garb twice.

TREASURY CERTIFICATES SUSPENDED

United States Government Finds It Can Get Money Cheaper By Other Means

Washington, July 11.

The Treasury to-day ordered all sales of Treasury savings certificates and stamps to be suspended as from July 15.

Acting Secretary Winston said that the present money market did not warrant the Treasury paying the 4¼ per cent. interest of the savings securities when funds may be obtained at much lower interest.

More than $400,000,000 in Treasury certificates are now outstanding. The first sales—in the form of War Savings Stamps—were made in 1918, but those have been retired and each subsequent year has seen a new issue. Almost $10,000,000 of the issue of 1924 have been sold.—Reuter's American Service.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

States Going Labour Despite Decline of Supporters in Cities: State Election Results: Prime Minister Still Predicting Change in Imperial Naval Policy

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne, July 2.

The Commonwealth Parliament has made just about as much progress in business as one might expect, where a powerful Opposition is busy contemplating early victory by an appeal to the country. The slogan, to use the modern advertising term, had gone round. The tide had turned. Western Australia had gone Labour, South Australia had followed the example, Victoria was hanging in the balance, and, after that, the fate of the Composite Federal Government was written as plainly as the words on the wall at Belshazzar's feast. Quite a number of people believed this, and those who are disposed to explain all actions of humans by psychology, might make a note that within the best environment of mental suggestion Victorian Labour succeeded in polling about 130,000 votes as against 240,000 of all other parties or independent candidates. This is regarded as a victory for Labour, and by the juggling of personal interests and antagonisms it is possible that Victoria may for a time be nominally governed by Labour.

There are some other lessons of this rather unusual election. Its effect upon Federal or national politics will be most interesting. I have recorded the "Pact" made between the Prime Minister, Mr. Bruce, and the Treasurer, who is also leader of the Country party, in regard to the next general elections. They agreed that sitting members of either Nationalist or Country parties should continue, if possible, sitting members, and that where there was an interloper second preference must go to him so long as he is not Labour. Briefly it was what one might call a treaty of armed neutrality. The Victorian Farmers' Union, suffering badly from swelled head, was disposed to denounce this arrangement. It had not been consulted, and what was more the agreement was calculated to deprive the farmers of their heritage of the leading political party in the State. It put a belly-band round their natural and legitimate expansion. These Victorian elections gave the Victorian Farmers' Union, which is the strongest and most aggressive of all the organizations of the primary producers, some indication that in the eyes of the electors it was not the only pebble on the beach. It actually scored only 43,000 votes as against 320,000 of all other parties —those opposing the Country candidates of course including both Nationalists and Labour.

Where the result impinges upon Federal politics is in the counsels of the Country party. There it must be decided whether the cold comfort of not having lost seats is to be accepted as evidence that this new and ambitious party is calculated to become one of the strongest political parties in Australia. Thus the result of the Victorian elections is likely to be that the hostile Victorians will realize that they cannot stand alone, and will therefore endorse the Bruce-Page Pact. If they do this one may see the Nationalist followers in Parliament of the Prime Minister satisfied that their future is clear, and with that clarity will come greater cohesion in the House of Representatives, and a united front to Labour at the end of the life of the current Parliament.

The recent Victorian State elections will change the ideas of many people, more particularly those living in the country. The latter have always contended that they form such scattered communities, and have so few opportunities to listen to the words of wisdom of politicians. What with floods, droughts, pests and bad roads to contend with (to say nothing of their long hours of work) they have not the same hope of casting their votes as the city man. In this election it is interesting to note that while some 63 per cent. of the country voters polled, only 54 per cent. of those enrolled within the metropolis went to the booths. It was also shown that despite the increase of population in Melbourne and suburbs the actual number of Labour voters, since the previous election, had decreased—not very greatly but certainly had decreased. So it seems that, if a section of the Press and a few Liberals or Nationalists, who refused to pass a Redistribution Bill chiefly on the grounds that it would hand over the well-being of the primary producers to the urban electors, who were assumed to vote Labour, had not succeeded, the Labour party would have been still further set back. A calculation, which is probably not far astray, shows that Liberal and Independent votes in the metropolis of Melbourne numbered some 100,000 as against 57,000 Labour, but what is more important is that whereas at the previous election —three years ago—Labour polled most heavily in the metropolis against all-comers, this year it has been beaten nearly two to one. The fears of the city worker can be dismissed. The same loss of Labour influence in the cities took place in Queensland four years ago, but it is only when Labour finds a formula which will suit both country and city that it can hope for complete victory.

Queensland's Labour Premier.

The foregoing reminds me that Theodore, the half-Slav Premier of Queensland, has just returned in triumph to Australia, after having visited London, answered the accusations that Labour repudiated its contracts, and converted some £12,000,000 of loan money by fresh loans subscribed five-fold. Mr. Theodore is marked down as the future Labour Prime Minister of Australia, and he is undoubtedly one of the shrewdest and most capable men that Labour politics have produced. Mr. Theodore may be a red-ragger, but no one can point the finger and prove that. His Labour supporters declare him a traitor to their cause, and he replies, "Well, get another leader." The fact seems to be that they cannot do without him. He mixes quite a lot of alleged socialism in amongst his actual administration, and seems to know that if he starts a government butcher's shop his political opponents will worry about it and make so much fuss that much more important movements are overlooked. While a few thousand pounds were lost in Socialistic experiments Mr. Theodore was busy organizing the very protestors themselves into what looked like self-governing bodies, controlled or rather overlooked and financed by government. Thus we have wheat, butter, maize, sugar and other pools. All these might be private enterprise but the government has its hand all the time on the safety-valve of finance. Private enterprise can rail as much as it likes, but the Queensland Labour Premier is slowly but steadily making it take a hand in establishing the socialistic organization which he has ever before him. One cannot necessarily think he is right but his policy is one which makes the people think he is right. When he leaves the State for the more difficult Federal sphere he may have occasion to recall the Lincoln epigram concerning the fooling of all the people all the time.

The Banking Bill.

The long-promised Banking Bill has been introduced, and is now under discussion in the House of Representatives. Those who expected something very new and drastic are disappointed, while the Labour Opposition is opposed to the measure because they think they see in it an attack upon what they consider the greatest success of their political career, namely the Commonwealth Bank. After all the chief proposal is that the Bank shall in future be governed by a Board, instead of by one man. The Opposition sees in this a proposal to place the bank in the hands and under the control of capitalists, instead of keeping it a "people's bank" whatever that may mean. They say the Board will not be subject to ministerial control, which is about the last thing any one wants. They say that the members of the Board are sure to be interested in other banks and therefore will make it their business gradually to suppress the Commonwealth Bank. They admit that it has not fought the private banks as they had hoped it would, but has simply been made a money-making machine, and as an alternative they suggest that the Board, if there must be one, should be comprised of financial experts wholly in the employ of the bank. The Notes Issue Board is to be abolished and the paper currency passed under the control of the Bank. It is generally admitted that the Board adopted such a conservative attitude that the supply of currency dropped below actual requirements. As to the terrific exchange charges between Australia and Britain, charges which made it impossible to bring about £50,000,000 to Australian credit in London to this country except at about 3½ per cent. or in the form of goods, the Economic Conference in London showed plainly that the Commonwealth Bank could have remedied the matter had it so chosen, being possessed of all the necessary powers. The Bill also provides that all private banks must effect their clearances through the Commonwealth Bank, a provision to which a great deal of exception is taken, seeing that the latter bank is itself an ordinary trading institution. The debate on the measure will last some time, and the Opposition proposes to fight it to the last ditch.

What Is Australia's Defence Policy?

When the Prime Minister introduced his Bill for the appropriation of £2,500,000 for naval construction it was expected that he would outline the Commonwealth's defence policy. That, however, has yet to come. The present proposal before parliament is that £2,000,000 shall be voted to the purchase of a modern 10,000 ton cruiser to be built in Britain, while £500,000 is to be placed to a defence reserve. It is generally admitted on both sides in politics that two cruisers are required, and a desperate effort is being made by the Labour party, and a few extreme Protectionists to have the second cruiser built in Australia. The whole argument is likely to turn upon the building of the second cruiser. The Prime Minister is, for the moment, dodging the issue. He declares that no final estimates have been made of the cost of a locally built cruiser, but he has had to admit that much of the material would necessarily be imported, and that in any case it would take, as against the United Kingdom, at least 50 per cent. more in cost and 50 per cent. more in time of construction. As the life of one of these cruisers is alleged to be no more than ten years it is argued from the strictly commercial point of view that the cruiser built in Australia would be practically on the obsolescent list before it was launched. The Opposition is not diposed to allow any naval additions, unless they be the outcome of spending money to employ Australians. Probably it will require the practical lesson of "The Englishman's Home" to convince the Labour Unions. The Prime Minister has made it clear, however, that he has no definite naval policy. That, he says, will be announced with the Treasurer's Budget at the end of this month, but even then he assures us that nothing will be proposed calculated to remedy the unfortunate decision of the British Government to have no naval base at Singapore. Mr. Bruce gave parliament to understand that a change of Imperial policy was imminent. That may be so; but it is unfortunate that Australia cannot look to any other political leaders with the hope that a more definite course of action will be adopted.

Meanwhile the annual report of Lt.-Gen. Sir Harry Chauvel, the great Light Horse leader of Palestine, who is now chief of the general staff and Inspector-General, is not particularly encouraging, except possibly to the radical section of the community. The volunteer and boy units are doing well, but there is a lamentable absence of the things that matter. We are short of reserves of officers, of munitions, and of technical personnel. Sir Harry Chauvel is not a pessimist, or he would never have won through to his high place from the moment when he was on the point of compulsory retirement. The best feature of the Australian defence problem lies in the fact, emphasized on all sides—from Chauvel to the junior Duntroon cadet—that it is recognized as being on the water. At last the idea of the armed mob defending Australia on land seems to be losing its grip upon the imagination, even of the Labour politicians.

Labour's Fatuous Economics.

Australia is growing cotton, and does not want the world's markets to forget it. Queensland is the chief source of production at present and this year its production may be something in the neighbourhood of 20,000,000-lb., having a value of, say, £1,000,000. Now this looks as if the industry were making headway—particularly under a Socialistic Government. But the difference between Socialism and Individualism is that the first aims at perfection and the second at what is profitable. If Abbé Huc did not point this out definitely at least the history of China, as written by him, placed it beyond question. The Queensland cotton industry, being encouraged by a Socialist government; which rushed in and offered to erect ginning mills, guarantee crops and so forth, seemed to be on the high-road to success. Unfortunately the Socialist controllers demanded that only the theoretically best cotton should be grown. When the growers said they could make money out of "ratoons" or second growth (every person who has lived in the East knows what this means), the Socialist government, being on the side of perfection said "No" in large capitals. It insisted upon the cultivator doing his absolute best, even if it cost him money and labour. Regulations were passed, and growers threatened with the destruction of their ratoon crops at government expense. It was even hinted that they would be expropriated of their holdings, and be lucky if they were not sent to gaol. Happily the threatened cotton-growers had friends at court. In England at recent cotton meetings there were those to say that the ratoon cotton was useful and that the Queensland Government regulations were over-strict. The end is not yet but both industrially and politically, in this case we may see "great trees from little acorns grow."

Financial Curiosities.

It might be expected that Australia is hard-up, chiefly because the Labour politicians talk about the unemployed and the commercial community about the stringency of the money market, but at least public finance seems to be on a sound footing—that is if collecting more taxes than is necessary may be considered sound. This is at the end of the financial year, both for the Commonwealth and the States. The actual balances are of course not known yet, but the official estimates are unofficially forthcoming. Thus we find that the Commonwealth has made a surplus for the year of about £7,000,000, and the States, with possibly the exception of Tasmania, anything from £10,000 in Queensland to £100,000 in New South Wales. The obvious fact is that the whole revenue and expenditure system of Australia is bad—or, as some one has said, rotten-ripe for reform. The States are drawing something like £7,000,000 a year from the Commonwealth and that means that if the States raised their revenues the Commonwealth would lift about £7,000,000 a year less in taxation. The Federal Treasurer, Dr. Page, is busy flying kites through the newspapers to see how any change of policy would be accepted. Obviously the local press of the States will not agree to any solution which will throw upon them the odium of raising their own moneys, and consequently the newspapers argue like the man in charge of a cocoanut-shy:—"Take your chance, gents; hit what you can; it can't hit you." All over Australia the financial position is one that would drive an accountant, or the shades of the statesmen who framed the constitution, to the verge of insanity. To outsiders it does not matter greatly. It is on the verge of insanity, but not insolvency. There are voices calling a "halt," but they are calling in the wilderness.

So we pile up surpluses, and be it noted that none but the greybeards say us nay. They complain of the extra moneys drawn from the people, but they do not agree as to how it is to be avoided. Some want us to turn freetraders and others to eliminate the taxes upon the wealthy. We are a great protectionist country and we shall do neither.

But if we will not become freetraders and will not reduce the income-tax there is at least reason to think that we shall develop our Eastern trade. The Commonwealth shipping line ran steamers to Java and Malaya, but found it did not pay. (Paying is of course the first aim of any nationalized activity). It, therefore, retired to make way for private enterprise, which is now running and promising a regular service. Other steamer lines are figuring largely in our shipping columns as running between Australia and the East, but of course it is futile to ask whether the sudden interest taken in the trade is in any way due to causes other than those of energetic private enterprise. The new Minister for Trade and Customs, Mr. H. E. Pratten, who has visited the East more than once and come back with golden opinions as to the opportunities of trade, tells us that he is now considering the whole position, and has formed the preliminary opinion that it is useless to send out trade consuls, such as Mr. Little, and better to send out men who will—"book orders." As the recorder of the famous ride of John Gilpin remarked when the repetition happens "May I be there to see." It is incredible that it should be seriously suggested that one, two or three men —as commercial travellers—should be government-paid, to book orders for private firms.

NEW ARMAMENTS CONFERENCE

Britain's World-Peace Policy: Important Statement

Important statements on the Government's policy on world armaments were made in the House of Lords on July 4 by Lord Haldane and Lord Chelmsford when the question of the Singapore base was raised by Lord Linlithgow, who wanted to know if the advertisements of the sale of materials there did not indicate a change of policy.

Viscount Chelmsford, First Lord of the Admiralty, said that no change of policy was indicated. The Government had been exploring the situation ever since its decision was come to, and there was a meeting that day of those concerned in the matter to consider how best the Premier's policy could be carried into effect.

"We are," he said, "exploring the situation, and as soon as we have been able to make up our minds as to the method of approach with regard to this difficult question, we shall make it, but it will be necessary to approach more than one foreign nation."

Lord Balfour's Question.

The Earl of Balfour asked what was meant by the phrase, "foreign nation," and Lord Chelmsford pointed out that at the Washington Conference it was understood that if any other move on similar lines were made other Powers at the Conference should be called into conference again.

Lord Balfour retorted that Singapore had nothing whatever to do with the other Powers which were parties to the Washington Pact. They might as well consult the Five Powers in regard to the fortification of Plymouth.

It was not as if Singapore could be a threat to any of these Powers. On the contrary, they knew perfectly, as the Government knew, and as our Allies and friends knew, that the British fleet was one of the great securities for the peace of the world; it could only be a security if it was given the means of operating effectively, and it could not do that in the Pacific unless Singapore was made a naval base.

Lord Haldane's Reply.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Haldane) said it was not the Government's case that the boundary line laid down by the Washington Conference had anything to do with the question.

It was a much greater question, a question of what would be the effect on the general foreign policy of the Government of establishing a new base in the East, which would, whether we wished it or not, be a defence.

They could not have a naval base at Singapore, which was merely for defence. It might give the greatest security to Australia and New Zealand, but it would be at a cost.

They could not reconcile such a position with the foreign policy which the Government was endeavouring to pursue. They might fail, but they were trying to make the world rather better than it was.

It was not a question of consulting half-a-dozen Powers about Singapore. The question might never arise; but it was a question of this kind: Could they get suitable relations with the nations of the world generally, so as to make Singapore much less important than it seemed to be in the minds of people who left these things out of mind?

The debate was concluded.

WINDING UP THE SESSION

Labour No Keener Than Any Other Party for Parliamentary Duty in August: A Very Dull Session: The Eastbourne Murderer Convicted

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, July 24.

The Labour Government is making great efforts to end the session by August 8 at the latest. In the days of the bad old Conservative and Liberal Governments, Labour used say that when it assumed office it would show the others how Parliamentary work ought to be done. Physically the Labour men have cracked up much sooner than their opponents, and they will all be heartily glad of the promised holiday. The House will separate without having made any serious effort to deal with the unemployment question, and one can well imagine what an outburst of indignation there would have been had a Conservative Cabinet even suggested such remissness.

As things are the Government has passed the Budget merely distributing the money accumulated by its predecessor, but not giving any idea of its own financial policy. It has passed a Bill, largely agreed, establishing Wages Boards to fix the wages of the Agricultural Workers, though it has given no indication as to how the farmers are to find the extra money. It has just passed a very meagre measure for still further increasing the pensions of pre-war pensioners, and for removing the Thrift Penalty in the case of Old Age Pensions by allowing every pensioner to have a maximum income of 15s. a week on earned income. It has very largely remodelled the Unemployment Insurance Acts, whereby about £20,000,000 more will be distributed every year in the dole. That is all it has done, and its general activities have been characterized by great timidity and by the inability of Ministers really to carry out their duties properly. Mr. Wheatley, the Minister of Health, who has piloted through a Housing Bill which will spend vast sums of State money, though no one thinks it will work, is the best of the Cabinet, though the average standard is not high. Perhaps Mr. Trevelyan has done fairly well at the Board of Education, while Mr. MacDonald has wrestled courageously with the Foreign Office.

No Use in Triangles.

It has, in short, been a very colourless session, and has shown that Three-Party Government does not work very well. It might have worked very much better if Labour had resolved to pass agreed-on Bills, in which case a good deal of useful legislation might have been put on the Statute Book, but there is such a feud between Labour and Liberalism that co-operation seems impossible. It is impossible in the House, and it is still more impossible in the country, where all electioneering shows the gulf which divides the two parties. Meantime, the Conservatives go muddling along, being badly led and poorly disciplined. It is, too, open to question whether the party organization has very much improved since the last election. Money still plays a too-important part in the selection of candidates, who are usually neither too young nor too brainy or too democratic. An immensity of business has gone over to the autumn, since there will be a session later this year, beginning in all probability about November. As I have always said, no general election is likely until next year. Many members are going away on semi-joy-rides. The Colonal Secretary heads a party of M.P's. who will visit South Africa,—all expenses paid. Most of us would do something in that line ourselves if we had the opportunity.

Doing London.

Meantime the public is having its holidays. They have stanted earlier this year, owing to Wembley, and the numbers of people who come to London and spend all their available money is proving disastrous to the seaside resorts. In some places there are not one-tenth of the usual visitors, and I heard this week the S. O. S. signal going up from such inland health resorts as Tunbridge Wells. Foreign travel is, too, very much cheaper than it used to be, and there is no doubt that the so-called working classes are becoming more "wanderlustig," as the Germans say. Never before, for instance, have so many people "done" London. There are amazing scenes at the House of Commons. I should think the average of visitors every day of the week is 5,000, and when I visited it to-day I found Mr. George Lansbury, M.P., had taken possession of the Chamber, had seated some hundreds of his constituents on the benches and leaning against the table in front of the Speaker's Chair was giving them an oration on what usually happens during the sittings. Some members will soon come along with a cinema film, and I wonder no one has yet borrowed Parliament for the purposes of cheap entertainment when the House is not sitting.

The Bungalow Murder.

The papers this week have devoted an immensity of space to the trial and conviction of Patrick Mahon for the murder of Miss Emily Kaye, whose body he boiled in the bungalow near Eastbourne. There never was any real defence, as this only alleged that Miss Kaye had a sudden attack of resentment and threw an axe at Mahon, who struggled with her until she fell over, striking her head on a coal cauldron, which caused her death. This was too thin for the jury, and they were not long in making up their minds. Mahon turns out to have an extremely bad record, which embraces five years' penal servitude for an assault on a domestic servant while trying to rob a bank at Woking. Undoubtedly, he exercised a very great influence on women, since he was one of those smooth-spoken smug hypocrites who can always count upon popularity among females. He will, course, appeal, and so is Vaquier appealing, and 100,000 people have signed the petition for the reprieve of the soldier Goldenburg, who recently murdered the bank manager at Borden Camp. It always seems possible to appeal to the sickly sentimentality of large sections of the public.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of our everyday life is that though we have still a million unemployed we never hear of any distress, although you do hear of work going and no one ready to take the jobs on. From this it is perfectly clear that an immense number of people are quite satisfied to live on the dole, and so long as it continues on the present scale they will go on doing so. If the Russian delegates, who are still here, remain much longer, we had better put them on the dole too, because they must be spending a lot of money to no purpose, and will need shortly some extra cash.

LIQUOR-SMUGGLING ON PACIFIC COAST

Pleasure Yacht for Service and Women as Decoys: a Plot that Failed

Vancouver, July 14.

The use of "decoy" women is an innovation among rum runners in Puget Sound and British Columbia waters.

Recently a large yacht came into English Bay, near here. It was observed that women were seated in luxurious wicker chairs on deck. The vessel dropped anchor, the awning canvas was run back on a roller and the women disappeared. Only the pilot house was visible. Liquor then was loaded on the yacht and as it cleared, the canvas, wicker chairs and women reappeared.

Later, according to fishermen at Everett, Wash., the ship tried to land liquor there, but a suspicious craft appeared and a quick getaway was decided on. The vessel speeded toward Vancouver. In the excitement one of the women on deck fell overboard. Fishermen rescued her and found she was a dummy.—Reuter's American Service.

LIGHT ON PRE-WAR GERMANY

Berlin, July 2.

Some strong rays of light are thrown into the pre-war policy of Germany's rulers by the letters of Herr Von Kiderlen-Wächter, which will shortly be published. Extracts already available show that this diplomatist foresaw the consequence of such policy, but was unable to fight against the very strong current directed by the ex-Kaiser or by his sycophantic entourage. Herr Kiderlen-Wächter had a special knowledge of Near Eastern affairs, for he represented Germany over a long period at Bucharest. His ability was even then acknowledged, for in 1909 Bethmann-Hollwegg requested him to draw out a plan by which encirclement might be avoided, especially by means of a thorough understanding with England. He practically directed negotiations wtih the British Ambassador, Sir Edward Goschen, but these were not very successful.

Herr Kiderlen-Wächter also knew the ex-Kaiser extremely well, for he accompanied his Majsty for ten years as the representative of the Foreign Office on all State visits abroad. It was because some letters of his, in which he spoke his mind quite freely, fell into or were placed in the ex-Kaiser's hands that he fell into disfavour.

Nicknames for Celebrities.

In these letters the ex-Kaiser is spoken of as "the sudden one," Queen Victoria as "Queenchen," Prince Bülow "the eel," Caprivi "the industrious one," Bethmann-Hollweg "the earthworm," Baron Marschall "the hippopotamus." The letters, which are addressed to a lady to whom Herr Kiderlen-Wächter was greatly attached, are full of anecdote and wit, but they deal very frankly with politics that came under the writer's notice. They are evidence, if evidence were needed, of the chaos that existed in the German diplomatic world in the years immediately preceding the war.

Herr Kiderlen-Wächter observes that Ambassadors are appointed by the Kaiser without reference to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and are appointed not because of their ability to fill a certain post, but because this or that diplomatist will be less dangerous in a certain capital. For this reason Licknowsky was sent to London and Wangenheim to Constantinople, both by the Kaiser over Kiderlen's head.

"The Biggest Liar."

Herr Kiderlen-Wächter's opinion of High-Admiral von Tirpitz is told in the following extract from one of the letters, which is dated February, 1912: "Am opponent of Tirpitz, because I fear that his policy will bring us into war with England. I consider Tirpitz to be the biggest liar that walks Berlin streets." Another letter runs:

Cowes, Old England, August 3, 1892. Would be very nice here if only people did not all speak English. It is quite incomprehensible to me how they can understand one another. We have as yet gained no victory here, and probably shall not do so though this is quite a matter of indifference to me. The day before yesterday we dined with the Queen, much dignity, but badly, very badly even, and all the time one's legs froze. To-morrow we dine with the Prince of Wales. Wonder if "Meine Tante" will be played.

A Crown Prince Effusion.

The collection includes a characteristic letter from the Crown Prince Wilhelm, written during the time of the Tripoli War, which runs:

Will your Excellency excuse this idiotic notepaper (it was decorated with a lurid picture), have no other at the moment. Do not quite understand why we do not openly go with the Turks at this favourable moment. We could have taken a price for our friendship, lease of parts of Asia Minor or something like that. Then we might let the Italians go, for they will never be of any use to us, and gratitude does not exist in history. But am perhaps too stupid. Would be very grateful, however, if you wrote me few words in pencil telling me reason why these chances abandoned. Last greetings from your Wilhelm, Crown Prince. —"Morning Post."

NEW YORK'S DANGER FROM EARTHQUAKE

Professor's Pessimistic Prediction of What Might Happen

Philadelphia, July 13.

"There is a very real danger that New York City may suffer from an earthquake one of these days," said Professor David Todd, of Amherst College, professor of astronomy and Internationally known scientist, who is spending the summer on the estate of Mr. P. M. Sharples, near West Chester, New York City, he said, is as likely a site for the next earthquake as any in the United States, because two layers beneath the surface of the ground come together under the city. When terrific pressure comes on this point it is inevitable that it should crack, he said.

The pressure which eventually would force this joint apart and cause an earthquake is caused by the thousands and thousands of tons which are being heaped on to the island in the shape of huge buildings and still huger foundations, he said.

He predicted that the destruction following a quake would be more terrible than that which followed the Japanese upheaval last summer. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

SEATTLE-ALASKA CABLE SERVICE

First Link in New Far Eastern Chain

Ketchikan, Alaska, June 22.

Prophecy that a new cable from Seattle to Ketchikan, put into service this summer by the United States Army, will be the first link in a system connecting Seattle with the Far East was made by Col. C. A. Seoane, assistant chief signal officer, in a telegram to the Ketchikan Commercial Club. He said that this system would use "approximately the route followed by our army fliers."—Reuter's American Service.

CHINESE TONG WAR IN OHIO

Suspicious Characters Rounded up in Cleveland

Cleveland, Ohio, July 10.

More than a score of Chinese, believed to be members of a rival tong, were arrested to-night in a round-up of suspicious characters in the Chinese district, where the annual convention of the Chinese Merchants' Association opened to-day.

Leaders of the Association told police they feared a tong war as a result of ill-feeling which came to the surface several weeks ago, when Yee Hee-kee, former president of the organization, was shot and seriously wounded.

Thirty-one had been arrested to-night.—Reuter's American Service.

REFORMING THE TURKISH BAR

Constantinople, July 5.

Kenan Bey, of the Ministry of Justice, arrived here to preside over the Commission for eliminating undesirable barristers. Explaining the Government's object, he said the morality of advocates must equal or surpass the morality of Judges. Two lists of eliminations have already been drawn up, but provoked so many objections that a second Commission sat at Angora to examine them. The result was the restoration of many names.

The general lines of the elimination are now becoming clear. In future only advocates who have followed the regular course of the Turkish Faculty of Law will be allowed to plead, and no advocate who has not practised for three years may plead. Meanwhile, the names on the third list are being shown to the City Magistrates for their criticism. — "Morning Post."

FAR EASTERN RELICS UNEARTHED

Cambridge, Mass., July 17.

Manuscripts 2,000 years old, some of them in Sanskrit, original holy books of the Buddhist faith, a beautiful bronze mirror, and specimens of sculpture more than 10 centuries old, are among the archaeological exhibits brought here by Mr. Langdon Warner, Fellow for Research in Asia, of Harvard University. Mr. Warner has completed a tour which started a year ago through Western China.

The trip, in which special search was made for traces of early Buddhist influences, carried the expedition along the ancient trade route to India and north to the Gobi desert to an old city, now in ruins, at which Marco Polo outfitted six centuries ago, for his 40-day journey to the Great Khan's capital, Karakorum.

At the ancient city, which Polo called Edsina, neither vegetable nor animal life is now possible. The camels, with which the expedition preceeded, were halted eight miles in the rear and were used to haul water to the excavating party.

The desert has advanced its frontiers, Mr. Warner said, and has surrounded the city, of which the walls still stand, their sun-baked bricks etched and worn by the blowing sand, but with the gateways, curtain walls and bastions still plainly discernible. Fine specimens of stucco sculpture, the bronze mirror and other finds were dug from the ruins.

Mr. Warner went in search of relics of the development of art in China, which followed the visits of the earliest of Indian traders. He endeavoured to collect all available specimens of the early art surviving the centuries and to learn more of its early development.

Some of the manuscripts that were brought back are believed to be original holy books of the Buddhist faith. Some are long paper scrolls in Sanskrit, brought from India, some are copies of these, made in transit, and some are translations into early Chinese or Turki made by Central Asian converts. Their age is estimated to be about 2,000 years.

What he termed the prize of the entire collection is a statue of the ninth century unearthed in Western China, not a Buddha, but one of the attendant gods

Mr. Warner told of discovering behind a small temple, high on the face of a cliff, a cave-chapel whose walls were literally covered with Buddhist figures, of a very early period, carved in the living rock. It is estimated that the carvings date back to 350 A. D. He told also of examining at Ho-nan on the border of Turkestan, some excellent specimens of wall painting.

The art treasures brought back will go to the Fogg Museum and the archaeological exhibits to the Peabody Museum.—Reuter's American Service.

DRY SCALES ON BABY'S SCALP

Spread Over Head. Lost Sleep. Cuticura Heals.

"My baby's trouble started with dry scales that formed on his scalp. They soon spread all over his head, and we had to tie gloves on his hands to stop him from scratching as it was so irritating. He was restless at night and could not sleep.

"We were advised to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment so we purchased some, and after using one cake of Soap and two boxes of Ointment he was healed." (Signed) Mrs. J. A. Barnard, 14, Reddins Rd., Peckham, London, S. E. 15, Eng.

IS THE BIBLE GOD-INSPIRED?

(The following was addressed to us as a letter to the Editor, but seems more appropriate to the sermon page.)

I do not write with the object of starting a discussion on this important question, but solely with a view to helping any, who like myself, have been faced by facts and who have been unwilling to pass them by in a genuine desire to know the truth of the matter. The following is my personal answer both to Higher Criticism and to Bible Unionism.

The three main facts I have had to contend with are these:—

1. God (Father, Son and Holy Spirit) "lives" in my soul.

2. There is much in the Scriptures which appears to me to be both contradictory and historically inaccurate.

3. God cannot err.

Since all I know of God is contained in Holy Writ I have arrived at the following conclusions:

1. That God "lives" in His Word.

2. That God did not "dictate" His Word to man, but that He did breathe into man His Spirit, so that man, (imperfect though he be) could make God "live" in Scripture.

3. That man, "inspired by God" has not erred in the message entrusted to him.

As God in the beginning moved on the face of the waters and as He is the life of every imperfect human body, so has He breathed into his word and moves over its pages.

So concerned are we over the mere "letter" that we lose the "Spirit." So closely do we examine the body, that we fail to catch the throbbing of that Great Heart which never ceases to pour forth Its Life Blood for our Salvation. So long as that Heart continues to pulsate there is no fear that His Word will cease to live. For this very reason the books of other religions will eventually die.

Martin Luther writes:—

"Profane men desire and insist to have it proved by reason that Moses and the prophets were divinely inspired. But I answer that the testimony of the Spirit is superior to reason. For as God alone can properly bear witness to His own words, so these words will not obtain full credit in the hearts of men until they are sealed by the inward testimony of the Spirit. The same Spirit, therefore, who spoke by the mouth of the prophets must penetrate our hearts in order to convince us that they faithfully delivered the Message with which they were divinely entrusted."

In conclusion I beg to remind my readers that this letter summarizes my stand on this fundamental problem.

I respect what modern scholarship has to reveal about the historicity of the Holy Writ and I do so because I know that not all the scholarship in the world can tell me that He who "lives" in me never lived or is dead. How do I know this? "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof but cannot tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth? so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

OUTSIDE JERICHO

By Epaphras.

The rustling, murmuring crowd had moved on; the dust raised by many feet was settling through the hot air, and the two were left alone. The one, a bent, grizzled figure, covered his eyes with his hands, while his companion, a strong man in the prime of youth, gazed about him, as if to learn a new meaning of familiar things. It seemed indeed a world made new to those who had so suddenly received their sight. None of those who in their number hung on the words of the new Teacher could understand what this gift of sight meant to them—this gift that all the money in the world could not have bought. This restoration of sight to those who had been known so long as hopelessly, incurably blind, had, indeed caused a momentary stir among those who stood nearest, but none had come back to inquire as to their feelings, and this was just as well. The two men were dazed; what they had hopelessly, helplessly yearned for so long had been so suddenly conferred that at first they could only babble like helpless children.

In their piteous dependence on others through the years, few had told them of the doings of the wondrous new Rabbi who devoted his time to doing good, and the passport to whose favour was to be helpless, sick, or unfortunate. Eagerly they had questioned all who would stay near them, and many days they had passed in discussing what they had gathered. Every day they listened to all passing footsteps, and, detecting those of strangers, thrust out eager hands to detain them.

In most cases their questions were not understood, often they were impatiently repulsed, but they had not ceased to hope. Day by day they sat, outside the walls of Jericho, longing and hoping that He who had done so many wondrous works for sick and weary mankind would take pity on them. Though they knew it not, the first great gift was theirs—childlike, unquestioning faith; they knew that if He would He could give them their sight. So day by day they waited, living upon faith.

Their great day came unexpectedly. It was just before the sunset hour, and kind hands had put their simple food beside them. With patient meekness they had given up hope of appealing to the Master for that day. A murmur of many voices, a rush of air from many moving garments passed them: they felt, they knew, that He was there. With one voice they called upon the Son of David to have mercy on them.

Even then there were many in the crowd, half curious, half sceptic, who would have thrust them back, but they only cried the louder, and Life, Truth, and Love incarnate heard the cry, and granted the request even before it was uttered.

Could they ever forget that moment when He had asked what they wished, and called them to His side? How they had reached Him through the press they knew not, nor after His wondrous work for them could they tell of what form or colour He was: that they had received their sight was all that they could grasp, and their joy was tinged with a feeling that was almost fear....The older man looked up and gazed at the sandy plain, the line of blue hills in the distance, the palms, the sky turning a pearly green at the approach of sunset. He laid a trembling hand on the shoulder of his companion, and together they watched the pageant of the setting sun.

It was the younger man who found voice first: "Brother, the world is very glorious, very beautiful."

"Thou also art beautiful, my brother, thou in thy strength and youth who hast kept with one poor and old so long." They tenderly embraced, and tears ran from their eyes, those eyes that now could see.

Darkness settled over the earth, the cooling breezes of evening fanned them, and one by one the stars came out while they spoke of many things. At last the older man voiced the thought that lay in both their minds "Brother, what is it that hath made us see? Is it God, think you, that walks the earth?"

"Nay, nay. When I fell at His feet in adoration He raised me up."

"Think you He is the mighty King, the Messiah Who was to come?"

"Nay, how can that be? He has nought of His own; folk say He hath not where to lay His head."

The younger man rose, and stood stretching his arms towards the starry sky. "What matters it? What this man hath done can only be by power from God. He hath given us much more than our sight: I can read renewed life in thine eyes.

"Yes that is it, He hath given us life. Dimly before we worshipped God; now we know Him. Do as thou wilt, brother; from henceforth my life belongs to Him who does God's work. Since that healing touch was laid upon mine eyes I have but one desire, one joy: to follow Him Who gave it, to learn of Him. What is sight to me if I see not my Master? Better darkness and torment in His presence than the clear light of noon without Him.

What is this joy, this bliss that we feel? Not only our gift of sight, but our knowledge of Eternal Love.

Brother, let us learn of Him Who hath given us life—the life that is the light of all mankind."

And they arose and followed Him.

PEICHIHKO

A Student's Impressions

By Heng Seng.

The modern Chinese essayist, like the novelist adheres to the minuteness of realism. Influenced by European writers the Chinese has moved far from the "Eight-legged Essay," which all scholars were required to be able to write for the Civil Service Examination. The following essay might have been written by an Impressionist. Heng Seng is probably an assumed name. Peichihko literally means the "Mansion of the North Pole." The essay appeared in the "Students Magazine."—Ed.

Over two months have elapsed since I came to Nanking with the intention of visiting all the famous spots of interest and writing a book on all the notable landscapes of the "City of Stones" for the information and, I hope, pleasure too, of those who have never set their eyes on this southern capital, much less its famous landmarks. However, I have been, much to my regret, prevented from carrying out my desire by various odds-and-ends engagements.

This afternoon, as I felt utterly bored and unhappy at remaining inactive at home, if I may give the miserable shanty which shelters me the sacred name of "home," finding no relief in reading, nor in writing, nor in sleeping, and breathing heavily and laboriously as if I were in a room deprived of air, I thought I had better go out and see what changes had taken place during the five days in which I had not once wandered away from my airless room!

Having come to this decision, I began to revolve in my mind the weighty problem of where to go to, and how far from my abode I should betake my weary self. As nothing of interest appeared to lie within easy reach on foot, and as the time at my disposal did not permit me to ramble to distant parts where attractive scenes abound, I resolved at last to make an excursion to the Peichihko, a picturesque, temple-like building renowned for its historical associations.

On the Road.

Peichihko is but a short distance from the Southeastern University; in fact, they are separated only by a maloo or carriage road. Hence, the frequency with which its students grace that hill with their honourable presence! How fortunate these students are who may daily come into intimate contact with such a lovely hill and beautiful trees!

The maloo in Nanking has been so badly built that sharp points of stones project above its surface here and there and everywhere throughout the whole length of the road. Pedestrians walking over it often find their shoes pierced through, and sometimes their feet are injured as well. Therefore, upon reaching the Bamboo Gate at the foot of the hill, although I was always on the alert, my feet were sore. I was compelled to sit down on a large square of stone and take off my shoes, to rest my feet.

Hardly had I ensconced myself in this comfortable position, than I saw two police men, each with a carbine slung on his back, marching past me. Unconsciously my eyes were attracted by their soldierly gait, following them step by step, as if I were a man enchanted by some magical spell. Suddenly, a motor car shot past me from east to west, and the loud and sharp notes of its horn woke me up from my trance and broke the charm from the pair of plodding policemen. I raised my head and was surprised to see that the hands of the large clock of the University showed that it was already past four.

Up Hill Work.

"Let me speed my pace, for it will be dark in another hour's time," I soliloquized to myself. Whereupon, I rose and marched onward bravely. It was up-hill work, but I recalled to my mind how lightheartedly I had always accompanied my schoolmates on the march when making an extensive excursion into the country side or travelling over a stiff distance on foot; of how nonchalantly did I respond to the call of our master to mount a hill from its foot during a drill exercise, and how easily and invariably had I been the first to reach the top; though, of course, feeling the strain when the task was done. Details of these youthful achievements were still vivid in my mind. I felt so refreshed at these recollections that I wanted to test my own powess by repeating my hill-climbing feat of the past. My legs answered my will splendidly. I began to mount two steps at every bound, and I kept on doing so to my own infinite delight. I counted that, from the foot of the hill to the gate of the Temple, I made 119 paces in all which must have covered 238 steps, which must be the number of the steps of the natural but man-made ladder on the hill side.

Lovely Surroundings.

Oh! How provoking! I had my attention so wholly engrossed in testing my own physical stamina and in counting the number of paces I made in mounting the hill, that I had entirely neglected to take notice of the landscapes on both sides of my path! At the hill top, I straightened myself a bit and took a few deep breaths. I felt so pleased with the successful conclusion of my self-imposed task that I became very happy indeed. I was, it was proved at least to my own satisfaction, certainly sound both in body and in mind, just then.

The scenes surrounding me were exceedingly charming. Trees and plants with leaves of variegated tints were very pleasing to the eye; gigantic and majestic rocks, awa-inspiring and weird-looking boulders, interspersed here and there with patches of green sward or clutches of wild-flowers, forming a colour scheme, that appeared sometimes sombre and sometimes bright, but always harmonious and lovely in the extreme. In short, these bounties of nature are very soothing in effect and very enchanting to the human eye. Kiangnan is in a warmer zone than most places in northern China, or the green shoots could not have fought their way up the earth until a month or so later. Now, only a few hours remain with us before another year will down upon this world, and we will be another step nearer to the gate of death!

Since I was discharged from my Regiment, five summers have passed away and I am no better nor richer than most of my former comrades in the camp; nay, worse, far worse! What shall I do to support myself? What is my destiny? What is my ultimate fate? These melancholy thoughts usually make one sad, and tears trickled down from my eyes. Wistfully, I looked towards the Southeastern University. On its drill ground, a number of students were playing football and cricket. They all appeared lively and happy. Are not my former schoolmates W. and K. also studying at this University? Why have I alone become so forlorn and helpless? Memories of my school life seem only to enhance my sorrow and add to my pessimistic spirit. When can I ever forget them?

I had then no heart to take stock of the hill views. As I hastily went to the Peichihko in order to be alone and vent my feeling in weeping, I saw that two men were there before me; they were engaged in earnest conversation. I stopped short upon reaching the window, against which I leaned myself; and mutely and sadly, I looked at the Tungtaiszu (Universal Peace Temple)—now called the Chiminszu (Cock Crowing Temple)—to which Emperor Wu Ti, Founder of the Liang Dynasty (A. D. 502,549) retired to live the life of a recluse; and then at the Taichen in which he died of starvation. As a flood of thoughts about my own future rushed to my mind, I really saw very little.

Just then, a Nanking City Railway train passed by and a shower of coal dust and a gush of its fumes assailed my nostrils. I held my breath and quickly came down the hill to get out of the coal dust. This railway is only 20 li in length, running from Hsiakuan on the bank of the Yangtze to Chungchenkai in the heart of the Nanking City.

And Now the Temple.

As I have deviated too much from my subject, I must crave the indulgence of my readers. I will now briefly describe the Peichihko. This Ko, or mansion, is of three storeys. The top storey is inaccessible as the staircase, which was destroyed many years ago, has not yet been rebuilt. The ground storey is not worth inspection, since there is not a single window that gives it light. The only part of the mansion that is usually visited by sightseers is the middle storey, on which one can take a clear view of the surrounding scenes. Some well-written Chinese characters and many badly-composed poems may be found on the gates and adorning the walls of the Peichihko.

The sun was down, the street lights were twinkling dimly and the evening bell was being sounded by the monks of the Universal Peace Temple, when the writer left the Peichihko and plodded his way homeward by following the tortuous hilly paths. A black curtain had been thrown over the earth, as it were, as it was soon pitch dark.

THE WIND AND THE CLOUD.

Said the wind, "I am the earth's song
Distilled of lovers' vows and their sighs' throng.
In the night shedding my dew of dreams
Gathering new gleams I go my way
And in the day
To love, caress, and soothe—or furyfull
To shriek despair, then sink into a lull. . . .
But always—be moods what they may
—there's this:
My life is song,
My touch a kiss."

The cloud said, "I am the eternal cloud,
Earth's veil, earth's shroud.
Sadness is best displayed in me, as when
I shine in the west
And mirror to the pondering minds of men that Death is best.
Scourged by an unknown music all my days
I hasten on unending pathless ways
Seeking to hold in me, the magic fleece,
Always the form of beauty,
And sometimes peace."

And the sea said in a grave voice to these twain,
"Beauty of earth is greater than her pain—
Sing ye and search. For me are duties too,
For I am the brooding mother of both of you."

THE FALLEN HIGHBROW

[Lines written in reply to a most unfortunate request—there being no dictionary available—for a translation of the following passage from a notice of Romeo and Juliet in one of the weekly reviews:—"Still he (Romeo) was a great improvement on the epicene ephebe who is usually served up to us."]

I'll sing thee songs of Araby, or chat about Herodotus,
Supply the rules of poker, or the law of tithe and globe,
Explain an ohm and other terms with which the learned prod at us,
Contrast the works of Sardou with the plays achieved by Scribe;
I'm very hot on vitamines; I'm ready with a homily
On axolotls' habits, or the Great and Lesser Grebe;
I know my atlas through and through from Wrangel Isle to Romiley,
And music never baffles me from Ravel to Délibes.
In fact, I'll talk on anything—the totem rites of savages,
The incidence of measles, or statistics of inebriation's horrid pitfalls and its dreadful urban ravages—
But, oh! You've got me guessing with an epicene ephebe!

—Lucio,

By completing the trip from Southampton to Cherbourg in 3 hours 50 minutes, the Cunard liner Mauretania has made a record for the crossing. For 85 miles the liner, which is on a record-breaking trip after her recent overhaul, travelled at a speed of from 28 to 30 knots. The time for the Southampton-Cherbourg crossing is usually 6 hours. The Mauretania has beaten this by over two hours.

CHINA—THE WORLD'S SPOILED CHILD

Effects, Changes and Causes Steadily at Work: Waning Foreign Influence: Danger of Being Weak with China: Sound Thinking Advocated

By Scrutator.

It was 14 years ago to-day that I sat dangling my legs on a small bridge far down at the foot of a mighty mountain range where two great Empires met, where sleepy Burma with her wonderful roads philosophically looks at China, which has neither roads nor much effective philosophy.

I had come from the Pacific via the Yangtze, loitering so considerably by the way that I had taken 18 months to cover the 3,000 odd miles. During the intervening years I have lived almost continuously in this country. I have done much interior travelling, delighting to get into areas where others of my kind have never been. The nature of my business has also compelled me to study the people and their language, their thought and customs and their history. At one time—it was about 14 years ago, or it might have been ten—I really thought I knew something about China and the Chinese, and I wrote with facility about what I saw, what I thought and felt, and would make deductions on anything Chinese quite unafraid of criticism and with impunity (as some still do to-day). Because I thought I understood—that was the reason. But, to-day, when I am asked my opinion on current Chinese affairs, I scratch my other ear and look away, as the Chinese do, when they do not want to hear; I rarely say "I know," sometimes I say "I think," but at other times I admit to myself that "This is what I believe I think," for much contact with the Chinese subjects you to so many mental twists and turns that you are continually vetoing what you thought yesterday because you have a fuller conception of some fact.

The Slow Sure Change.

If I were sitting on that old bridge this morning—you may be sure that it is still there in a state of more or less haphazard repair, because it belongs to China—and I had done precisely during the last 18 months what I had done then, I wonder what real changes I should see. One cannot cross this great country entirely unobservant, of course. Even in those days one felt causes at and to-day the apparently quite dangerous effects of some of those causes are flaunted before the face of the foreigner. But we are too near to the scene to adjudge, much less to appreciate, what is passing. A Chinese friend of mine said to me a day or two ago that it would not be until all the last generation has passed that we would be able to begin to perceive the effects of the changes that are undoubtedly coming upon this people very rapidly; and I fancy he is right.

If the reader can imagine himself with some gigantic eye of sight, and were able to sit in Shanghai and, in one wide far-outstretching sweep could penetrate everything he would be able to see all over the face of China at one and the same time, he would be in a position to offer an opinion worth having. China is so vast that while you tell the truth about one part you lie about another, and consequently generalization is dangerous. But it is safe to say that we have begun to see, no matter how dimly, in places far away from the fringes of places like Shanghai and the other treaty ports where foreign influence has made its mark, deep causes steadily at work. By the incoming of the Occidental to China—and in inland China too, for every phase of change is traceable to the machinery of foreign influence—a transformation is being wrought. This transformation is not the gradual growth of a natural evolution, the result of a propulsion from within. It is a condition of things caused by artificial means, in bitter conflict with inherent instincts, inherited traditions, innate tendencies, characteristics and genius, racial and individual. If we took 50 Chinese to-day from 50 different parts of China, and were to ask them their truthful opinion (and, what is more important, if they would give you their truthful opinion, which they would not, being Chinese dealing with foreigners), and these men to be all over 50 years of age, what would they say? Would they give it as their opinion that these changes that bubble up all over the face of China are for China's good, or that old custom, the ticking out through the centuries of the legend of age and enduring things, is better? I think unquestionably the latter. These men of the old school would say that the changes in the habits of life infinitely old are working nothing and ruining much. To them all is empty, vapid, useless to God and man.

Then take 50 young men from the same places, and treat them similarly. Well, we all know that they would think that the changes are all for the better. Their optimism, as always in youth, would shine out, and they would all tell the same story that China is growing out of her senility and being rejuvenated, and that they were the ones who are going to rejuvenate her—but they know not what they say. Nonetheless, in the course of nature these young men will some day stand where their older confrères are now, and it is to them alone that we must look for whatever is to take place in China. Their responsibility is infinitely greater than that of their forefathers, though possibly linked with greater opportunity.

Peking's Weak Diplomacy.

Never did China need firm guidance as she does now. These words seem simple, and their meaning is simple enough, and one wonders why it is that foreigners who are charged with the serious mission of representing their various governments' affairs in this country cannot grasp the simple meaning. Was foreign influence in China ever at such a low ebb? Was there ever a time when we needed a strong outstanding character in the Legations who would come boldly out and dare to do something? And where is the policy of laissez faire leading us? It is surely making us the laughing stock of the Chinese people everywhere, and the present time will prove that when affairs like that at Lincheng, the murder of a merchant or missionary here and there are allowed to "slide," and uncensured and undefended insults to foreigners take place in various parts of the country, we foreigners are doing China much more harm than good in not taking a firm stand. China always appreciates strength. Foreign influence has always been the result of force. The Chinese cannot be awakened by other means. All virtue subconsciously passes with the average Chinese as weakness.

I am an Englishman, and I deplore the way in which Britain has allowed her influence, which at one time was sparklingly paramount not only in China but throughout Asia, to wane among a people whose unquestioned respect we enjoyed for many generations. If some of the old Chinese who did business with us in the days of the East India Company were to come back, they would stand either horrified at the way in which a miserable Chinese Government carries on or would exult in the way in which their successors can to-day treat foreign merchants and their Governments and "get away with it."

By being weak we are not helping the Chinese. Freedom was never won by the weak. We foreigners are guilty of malevolence towards China when we show any sign of weakness, and it does not always pay to let them know when we are kind.

Sounds Hard, But True.

Missionaries and philanthropically active people may disagree with this statement, but my experience leads me to believe that this is the right view.

The Chinese among themselves inherently govern by force—"face," which is the same thing. The Chinese, moreover, while generally mistaking kindness for weakness, and only capable of interpreting all things in terms of "face," is the first person on the earth who will immediately sense any sign of weakness or surrender of a point, and accordingly to take full advantage of it. If any reader questions this, let him walk into any office on the Bund one morning when the foreigner is selling anything and the Chinese is trying to get it at a cheaper price. Both faces are adamant, and, although the foreigner in a thousand instances comes off second best exactly a thousand times, he knows that he dare not be weak, for the Chinese would trade upon it to the bitter end.

I do not wish the reader to think that I am a man with a grouse. By no means. I love China. I have many fine Chinese friends. En masse I love the Chinese, I despise them, I respect them, I think they are wonderful, I think they are despicable . . . . and so very much more. But what I would like the foreigner in China to do is to realize that these changes are taking place, and that every foreigner is doing himself, his country and China a distinct injury by being weak in his association with the Chinese people. I am not advocating conceit, for that is merely God's gift to little men. I am not saying that we should not surrender, but we should do so always with discretion. So much loose thinking is done in this direction, and altruism is so much abused that certain foreign people imagine that they are doing China a distinct good by surrendering at every turn. But the Chinese, true to tradition, merely had his tongue in his cheek, and smiles up his sleeve at the fool over the way who thinks he is doing so much good.

No, China is a Spoilt Child. She must be brought out in the family of nations only when she has been trained for that honour, and as we have to be firm with a spoiled child, do not let us imagine that we can be otherwise if we are to do our duty to China.

We have received a copy of the "Kodak Magazine" for July. As usual, it is full of excellent reading. For instance, there is an article on lace making, with illustrations, which would interest many people besides photographers. There is also a very useful article on how money may be made out of old negatives which, through some unexpected event, suddenly develop news value. Now that the "Kodak Magazine" appears to be coming regularly to the Far East, might not longer notice be given of its competitions, in which probably there are many kodak users in the Far East who would like to try their luck?

A New York correspondent says a Japanese professor is about to startle the world with a powder made from fish which will increase human stature. The statement is made by Dr. Victor Heiser, director of the Far East Rockefeller Foundation, in a cable from Tokyo. The Japanese lack of inches, as well as the belief that the high death-rate in Japan is due to an unbalanced diet and the lack of preservatives, has long been a subject of research by the Japanese Institute of Nutrition, and it is one of the Institute's professors, Dr. Saike, who has made the discovery. "He has proved the fish powder in animals," says Dr. Heiser, "and is now demonstrating it in humans. I am convinced it is genuine and practical."

On June 28, on behalf or more than 4,000,000 of the schoolchildren of Great Britain, the League of Nations Union was to send through Leafield Wireless Station a wireless greeting to the children of 62 countries. "We, the children of Great Britain, greet the children of all the other countries of the world. To-day is the fifth birthday of the covenant of the League of Nations. Let us all in every country learn to love and understand each other. Let us help people to see that all the world must be united so that the League shall be the family of nations with no one left out or unhappy or hungry. This is what God our Father in Heaven wants for all His children, then war shall cease, and there shall be peace and good-will among men." The signal of this message was to reach Australia one-fifteenth of a second after the wireless operator at Leafield had depressed his key.

THE TWO PARTY SYSTEM IN THE UNITED STATES

By George E. Sokolsky.

In Anglo-Saxon countries politics tends to party divisions according to one general classification: those who are in and those who are out. Blocs, such as are known on the Continent, have appeared in various Anglo-Saxon countries, including Great Britain and the United States, but they have seldom outlasted the particular issue which brought them together.

From the begining of American history there have been two parties. Even in the Constitutional Convention there were those who favoured a strong centralized government and those who wanted the states to be paramount. Alexander Hamilton and John Jay represented one school; Thomas Jefferson the other.

The Federalists were the first to achieve national power, but Jefferson, leader of the Republicans, as the Democrats were then called, was the third President, and a line of Democratic Presidents followed because the Federalists had crumbled. The difficulty with the Federalists was that they were so engrossed in national affairs that they altogether forgot to look to their fences in the states. The National officers were elected by the voters of states—as they still are—and therefore the party without an organization in each state was and is in a weak position.

During the administration of Madison, there was an era of good feeling, party lines being altogether disregarded for a moment. But with Monroe two great parties again came to the surface: the Democrats, who continued the policies of Jefferson, and the Whigs, who wanted a strengthening of the activities of the national government. The Whigs found their chief strength where the Federalists had found it, in New England and the manufacturing and mercantile states of the East, while the Democrats were strong in what was in those days the south and the west.

The Slavery Issue.

These two parties jogged along fighting each other in and out of office until the slavery issue reorganized all opinion in the United States into two parties, those who believed in states rights as applied to the question of slavery and those who did not. The Democrats, following the Jeffersonian tradition, favoured states rights, while the newly organized Republican Party followed the Federalist Whig tradition of the pre-eminence of the national government. The Republican Party produced Lincoln, perhaps the greatest of all American presidents, who, with charity for all, fought the Civil War and won it. The slaves were emancipated, the south was practically eliminated for a time from national politics and the Republicans remained in power from 1860 to 1924 with the exception of 16 years, the administrations of Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson.

The fundamental political issue in the United States, as political history of that country clearly indicates, is as between states rights and the accession of power to the national government. That was brought out in the effort of Governor Smith of New York to bring this issue forward again in connexion with prohibition. With the exception of that one question, the two parties have for many years lacked a programme, lacked a differentiation. One might say, for instance, that the Republicans favour a high tariff while the Democrats want one low. But a Southern Democrat wants a high tariff on cotton, although he insists that the tariff on steel shall be low, because he produces no steel. Vice versa, the Republican in the North is quite willing for the tariff on pine-apples to be low, because his state produces no pine-apples. In a word, the tariff issue is not one of political parties, but of local needs, of states particularism. Generally, the tariff is a compromise among the states.

Rival Strongholds.

The two parties have entrenched themselves in certain places. For instance, the State of New York is normally Republican, but the city of New York is normally Democratic. The State of New York, that is the farmers, follow Civil Wars traditions and vote as their fathers voted, but one might almost say that there are no ancestors for New Yorkers (city folks), so many of the voters being immigrants, the sons or the grandsons of immigrants. One cannot go back to political traditions of three generations in the United States. Four or five generations comes closer to the time when party lines were tightly drawn over clearly defined issues.

Great issues are injected into the two parties either by a third party temporarily coming to life and conquering the party's platform as the various western cheapmoney movements succeeded in doing when William Jennings Bryan won the nomination by oratory and poor economics. Or in some cases, a revolt within the party brings to the front a radical group who are fighting over some public issue, as Roosevelt succeeding in doing on the question of conservation of national resources. But usually, the radicals are kept down, the force of organization in both parties being sufficient to control the situation. The recent Republican and Democratic conventions were indicative of the cohesive power of party organization. A strong radical group in the Republican party opposed Coolidge, while it is surprising that the Democratic party, usually at odds with Wall Street, accepted Davis. Yet, both nominations were achieved finally by steam-roller methods: that is, the bosses put in Coolidge and other bosses kept out McAdoo.

The Boss.

The position of the Boss in the American political party is decidedly unique. Nowhere else does such a person exist. A boss is a politician, who holds no office, is in no way responsible to the voters, cannot be controlled by the usual processes of legislative discipline; yet who by controlling the machinery of a political party is able, not only to select men for office, but also to determine their conduct while in office. Sometimes one finds an educated, college-bred boss like William Barnes of Albany or at other times one finds an ignorant, but astute son of the slums like Charles F. Murphy of Tammany Hall. These bosses manipulate the party organization. They play the game, as it is called. Righteous men, like Roosevelt, fought them and remained independent and strong. But most men give in—the line of least resistance is, after all, the surest road to success in party politics.

The boss does not crave personal popularity. He is usually a silent, shy personage, one who hides behind the eloquence and flambouyance of the political office-seeker. To him politics is a business; the democracy a tool. American parties have not yet been able to develop a great leadership, although in both parties independent and keen-minded patriots have fought the organization of the boss. They have usually been defeated—just as the federalistics were defeated because they could not keep their fences mended.

The parties would have easy sailing and the bosses could make satisfactory deals amongst themselves, were it not that the largest part of the American people have a wholesome disrespect for both parties. The American, particularly in the politically crucial middle Western States, votes not for parties but for men. He trusts the man rather than the campaign document. He studies the man rather than the abstract issues compounded by the orators. Thus, Coolidge is being advertised as a farmer, a poor man, a country lawyer, in contrast with Davis, the gentleman of wealth, the diplomat and international lawyer. The politicians of both parties are afraid of a man like the Democratic candidate for President because their experience has been that such men, once they are in office, know no boss, recognize no rights of party save those that are strictly honourable and expected. He does not "play the game."

Mr. Charles I. Graham, of the staff of the Shanghai U.S. Consulate-General, has just been notified of his promotion from the unclassified list of foreign service officials to Class VIII.

THE AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHER

By R. V. Dent.

Presumably you have an instruction book for your camera, but have you ever read it carefully? Dig it out from that drawer and go through it until it all becomes clear; after a few perusals the few knotty points in it are easily grasped. Why should you reasonably expect to make good photographs if you take no trouble at all learning how? If a little more ambitious, buy a good simple manual on photography—say Kodak's "How to make Good Pictures" or their "Fundamentals of Photography." They are quite simple and it is well worth while.

Frequently the amateur through absolute lack of knowledge produces such a series of disastrous results that he gets tired of wasting films and money and throws up "photography" in disgust. That is not giving this delightful hobby a fair chance, and the amateur is the loser thereby of a great deal of real pleasure and a valuable power. For the power of being able to produce good photographs with absolute certainty under almost any conditions of light is very valuable and worth acquiring.

You know how to load and unload your camera. Many films are partly spoiled during this simple operation. Note to keep the spool tightly wound as any loosening may allow light to penetrate with the result that some portion of the film is light-struck. Further, always try to load and unload in the deepest shade you can find; inside a room, under an umbrella or other covering, or in a dark corner of a temple or rest-house. Direct sunlight from the sky has about one hundred times the actinic strength of the light under a roof; it is not fair to the film, which is necessarily of great sensitiveness, to conduct this operation in direct sunlight.

Occasionally inspect the interior of your camera for dust, and clean the lens carefully with a very soft cloth. Blow off the dust first as otherwise the highly polished surface of the lens may be scratched. Watch the outside lens for moisture and keep it clean especially if it is an exposed lens. Dirty lenses are a prolific source of poor definition and foggy negatives. You quickly notice if your eye-glasses are not clean; so does a film if the lens is not clean. Once in a great while clean the interior surfaces of the lens, being careful to unscrew the back and front combinations separately and replace one before unscrewing the other or conceivably you may get them mixed.

Yours is probably the folding draw-type which focusses by scale. See that if it has two scales, one for plates and one for films, you are using the right one; German cameras in particular have the two scales quite frequently, the base of which slides, and if you by accident use the wrong scale results will all be just off focus and you may not know why.

Your "infinity" (often marked with an 8) mark means you can set the camera there and everything from 32 feet to infinity will be in focus if your lens is 5½-in. focal length and you use (aperture) stop F 8 or U.S. 4. If your lens is 4½-in. focal length everything from 22 feet to infinity will be in focus. Note the shorter the focal length the greater the depth of focus, i.e. the nearer will be the subjects in focus while still retaining good focus on distant objects. Focal length is the distance between the lens and the film when the lens is focussed on "infinity" and therefore if you do not happen to know the focal length of your lens get an object about half a mile away in focus (or set your lens at infinity) and the distance between the centre of the lens and the film is the focal length. The F. value of a stop is the focal length divided by the diameter of the stop. Thus a half-inch stop on a four-inch focal length lens is called an F. 8 stop. Quite simple.

Universal System numbering for Rapid Rectilinear lenses is not the same, being based on the idea of exposure. U.S. 1 being F. 4., U.S. 4 (F 8) requiring four times the exposure, U.S. 8 twice that (F 11), U.S. 16 again twice (F. 16); this simple system if once grasped is easy for the amateur to use, as it is a mathematical calculation of the simplest description. U.S. 16 is four times U.S. 4 so expose four times as long.

For Meniscus lenses calculate the aperture at F. 16 and it will work out all right; with them everything from about 10 feet distant is in focus. These are wrongly called fixed focus lenses; there is no such thing; they are simply small lenses with great depth of focus set at infinity.

But supposing you are working with a 5½-in. lens set at infinity and you stop down from U.S. 4 to U.S. 16 (F. 8 to F. 16) your depth of focus jumps considerably and everything from about 8 feet onwards is in focus; with a 4½-in. lens from 5 feet onwards. For interiors then, obviously use a small stop. But remember the exposure must increase as the square of the diameter of your stop is decreased; sounds formidable but merely means that a circle of twice the diameter of another circle has four times the area. Thus it lets through four times the light in the same time, or four times less as the case may be. Thus F 16 (half the diameter of F 8) only lets through a quarter of the light in the same time so needs four times the exposure to achieve the same result. An understanding of this is of supreme importance to correct exposure. Remember, the smaller your stop the longer you must expose; a small pipe takes longer to fill a bath than a big one; same principle exactly with a camera. We shall discuss this further when we discuss exposures.

On small cameras, using F 7.7. or F. 8 (same thing in practical use) very exact focussing is only necessary when working close up, say 25 feet or nearer; the nearer you get the more carefully you must focus. Always use the largest stop you can, within limits, of course.

What is this focussing which is so important? It is to bring the rays of light to a point on the focal plane (the film) not exceeding 1/100th of an inch in diameter, which the eye perceives as a single dot and not a blur. When negatives are made for enlargement they must be much more carefully focussed or the blur will become painfully visible. Good focussing-scales bring the light-rays to a point 1/200th of an inch in diameter, which is amply sufficient. To finally understand why a lens needs focussing at all, one minute with a burning glass shows it plainly; you must focus the light to get the round spot which sets fire to the paper.

Many people are poor judges of distance; this is largely a matter of practice but one simple way is to measure your own height mentally along the ground from yourself to the object. If you once get solid in your mind the angle at which you must look down to measure your own length on the ground (doing it once for practice by marking it off with a stick) it becomes a simple matter to multiply that mentally and you will find you get it right within a couple of feet afterwards. We repeat, very exact focussing becomes really important when objects are quite close to the camera.

Next to under exposure—by far the most frequent cause of the amateur's non-success—more films are spoiled by movement of the camera than all other causes combined. Do not confuse out-of-focus effects with the general blur caused by movement of the camera; it can easily be distinguished in the print. Therefore guard against the least movement when exposing. The practiced worker always avails himself of any post, tree, wall or other support if there is one, by leaning against it. When no such support is available he plants himself firmly with his feet wide apart, exhales, and with his lungs almost empty and the camera, firmly held in the left hand, tightly pressed against the chest, very gently presses the shutter-release with the right hand. Practice this and get to do it right. Do not delicately hold the camera out in the hand in the middle of the air, sway about, and expect good results.

On a steamer you must provide for vibration, and choose the most favourable moment to give the minimum exposure you think safe; it is rarely safe to go slower than 1/50th from a moving ship; fortunately the large masses of water act as reflectors of sunlight and permit of very short exposures, at least four times as fast as on land. The importance of holding the camera still is thus very great and this is worth careful noting. Unless you are unusually experienced do not attempt exposures slower than 1/15th of a second without using a stand or a tripod; movement is sure to show. A tripod is a photographic necessity if the light is anything but the best except for express lenses.

Needless to say keep your camera vertical and level, especially for architectural subjects. If not level, your seas look as if they were rushing out of the picture like a flood and the hills drifting with them; if not vertical you get foreshortening effects which while funny are very unsatisfactory as photographs. Use your rising front sparingly, unless you know how much rise you can give without cutting off light from the film; some cameras are very bad in this respect having lenses only just large enough to cover the plate and yet fitted with a rising front; when it is used on such a camera the result is the lower portion of the film gets no light and in the final print is a dark or even black patch. The sliding front is of course simply a rising front when the camera is used horizontally although in theory it can be used otherwise.

Lastly, use your camera from as high a level (up to eye-level) as you conveniently can; if you have a direct-vision finder so much the better; but break away from the usual amateur's habit of photographing from the "lower chest" level. Why should you expect pleasing results when you take them from a quite unaccustomed view point? you are not in the habit of seeing things from a height of three feet; they why photograph them so? In the case of groups this is particularly important; get a little further away and take them as the eye sees them or nearly so. And of course do not try to photograph people in chairs from too near unless side-ways to you, and if you take them lengthways with a short-focus lens the results are far from pleasing to the unlucky subjects.

Study your errors and your failures; try to learn from each one; you may not know the cause of some of them: get someone who does know what caused it to explain the reasons of the non-success to you; and then avoid making that same error again. Your progress will then be rapid.

The problem of exposure we shall deal with in our next article, and then the snapshotter who is following us will be well on the road to our goal—95 good pictures from each 100 negatives exposed.

III.—The Problem of Exposure

To solve the problem of correct exposure one must know four factors. . . the actinic value (chemical force) of the light, the amount of light and shade there is on the subject, the amount of light allowed to pass through the lens (aperture), and the sensitiveness (speed) of the photographic film. Sounds very formidable, and now we must show how each one of these factors can be readily arrived at and combined so as to give us the correct answer.

There is but one scientific way of ariving at the actinic value of the light and that is to measure it by an actinimeter, commonly known as an exposure-meter. Therefore the purchase and continual use of either a Wynne or a Watkins exposure-meter is strongly recommended. The majority of serious workers use them as they save an infinity of doubt, particularly in difficult circumstances, and are infallible in practice while costing little more than a couple of roll-films. They last indefinitely. If you find difficulty in understanding its use at first, a little help from someone who knows how to use them will make it clear very quickly.

Next best to the meters are the calculators; such as the Burroughs & Welcome in their excellent pocket-book, of the Harvey, either of these will give very reliable results for all general work. They are perhaps simpler to use than actinimeters. Last of all there is the meter where one looks through a peep-hole of blue glass, but these are not so good as the kinds previously mentioned. If you want to get good results, use a meter or calculator. . . it pays handsomely. Take the meter time and double it, as they are based on minimum exposures.

For him that has no meter or calculator, the following exposures will work out right during the Summer between 10 a.m. and 5 p.m. 1/25th of a second at F8 (U.S. 4) on all ordinary subjects; at the seaside half of that, 1/50th is sufficient. On the sea or for views into the water a quarter is sufficient, 1/100th, as the sea acts as a vast reflector of light. Dull days, double it; very dull days treble it; you will get good pictures every time.

These speeds are for ordinary Roll Film (H. & D. Speed of 290) and for average subjects with average shadow. If there is no shadow 1/50th second will suffice. Expose for the shadows and let the highlights take care of themselves is a very good rule for photographers.

Between 8 and 10 a.m. and 5 to 7 p.m. give from three to twice these exposures; soon after dawn and towards dusk the light becomes very yellow and as yellow light makes little impression on ordinary photographic film increase the exposures from five to ten times according to the light.

For heavy shade, as in the woods, 1/5th second at F 8.; for indoors, increase the outdoor exposure by 100 and it works out right for a moderately well-lighted room. If in doubt that the exposure is long enough, make another with four times the exposure. Always err on the side of over-exposure rather than under-exposure, the reason for this being that the latitude of modern films and plates is so great that several hundred per cent. increases in exposure make practically no difference to the final print if development is done right; it merely increases the printing time, which is of no importance. Whereas even 50 per cent. under exposure ruins the picture. When in doubt. . . over-expose.

The exposures given above can be relied upon to give first-class results from May to September and need modification only as regards time of day for the rest of the year. The Winter day is of course shorter and the sunlight less intense. If your results when using these times are not entirely satisfactory either the developing and printing is being carclessly done (some amateur finishers turn out very poor work) in which case take your work to one of the British chemists in town, who do that sort of work very satisfactorily, or else your shutter is not working properly. Thoroughly cheap work in developing and printing is poor economy as naturally it does not pay to spend time in doing it carefully. And almost any sort of a print is passable when an extra sheet means that much less profit; the amateur should soon be able to figure out for himself what sort of a print any given negative can produce.

The difficulty of a shutter not working properly is very common; in fact, most shutters are not quite accurate, only a few of the really good ones being thoroughly reliable as regards giving the marked speeds. But the differences in many cases are small and of no practical acount. Generally the slower speeds are faster than marked and the faster slower. Most 1/100ths work at about 1/40th, which is perhaps rather fortunate for the average amateur. Single-speeded shutters work, generally, at about 1/25th and as these are usually fitted only to meniscus lenses working at about F 16 it is obvious that they can only give good results in good light.

Shutter testing is not easy; at 1/25th second, looking through the lens, one should distinctly see the view, shutting out extraneous light between the face and the back of the camera with a cloth. The best way for the keen amateur desirous of testing his shutter-speeds is to spin a wheel with a bright disc attached to the circumference (a piece of tin does very well) at exactly one revolution per second. A bicycle or ricksha wheel jacked up serves the purpose admirably. Photograph this in full sunlight and from the prints it is not difficult, by marking off the circle into quarters and eighths etc: to arrive at the actual exposures the shutter gives at definite settings. Sometimes one gets great surprises!! Keep careful record of what those settings were or the work is of course wasted. Then correct your shutter markings.

Many cameras have nothing slower than 1/25th; this means in a poor light brief time-exposures must sometimes be given. You recollect what we said about stops in our last article? That exposures must be increased twice from F8 to F11 (U.S. 4 to U.S.8) and twice from F11 to F16 (U.S.8 to U.S.16). About the briefest time-exposure possible is given by setting the shutter at "B" and saying quickly "click". . . pressing the release at the first word and releasing at the second. This takes about exactly 1/5th of a second to perform. As the jump from 1/25th to 1/5th is too great at the same stop, stop down to F 11 (U.S. 8) and it is the rough equivalent to 1/10th second at F8 (U.S.4).

Your watch may have a seconds hand, which comes in useful for exposures of many seconds duration, but it may not have one. In any case you cannot use it for such short times as one or two seconds. Most watches tick at five times to a second; some four. Most people's idea of a second is nearer a half-second. A simple and surprisingly accurate method of counting seconds is to say not too quickly first the words "nought little second," "one little second," "two little seconds" and so on; after practicing this a little by this simple means one can easily count up to sixty seconds or so with only a second or so error. A weight at the end of a ten-inch string or chain makes a pendulum beating half-seconds. These are practical methods.

Groups require much more exposure than single figures, the shadows being very heavy; give four times ordinary exposure. And avoid brilliant mid-day sunshine if possible as contrasts are too violent.

Exposures with a sky-filter must be a little more than without one, but the exposures given here will take care of that slight increase. The best all-round light-filter for roll-film, rendering greens and blues far more satisfactorily than without it and getting the clouds into the picture, is the Kodak 1 pale yellow filter; when using it increase your exposures three times. The use of such a filter is strongly recomended as results are very pleasing and only surpassed by specialists using panchromatic material with fuly-correcting filters. The latter are used for the highest class of portraiture and fine technical work where correct rendering into monochrone of all colours, including red, is of supreme importance; but such materials are entirely outside the range of the snapshotter, whereas the use of K 1 filter is simplicity itself and quite suited to the average amateur.

All roll-film is orthochromatic . . . sensitive to greens and yellow. . . but the film is so much more sensitive to the blue and ultraviolet light of sunlight that a filter, holding back those rays, is needed to prevent them swamping all the other rays. We cannot pursue this most fascinating subject deeper in a brief article, and hope enough has been said to make clear the purposes of a filter and what it does. By a kind of photographic habit and convention that has grown up through years of seeing incorrect monochrone renderings people are content to accept ordinary photographs, which represent green (a light colour) trees and foliage as black, yellow and red (light colours) as black, and blues as plain white. Happily a new era in photography is dawning and we can do better now.

Exposures for correct photographic negatives have nothing to do with sufficiently fast exposures to stop motion; frequently the two are incompatible and a compromise must be made. And this is why special ultra-rapid lenses and plates are used by speed experts. All that the amateur need know on speed-work we shall deal with in our next article on "Subjects and Composition."

WHAT the inventor described as a motor-ricsha drove up to the "Straits Times" office the other day. It was a remarkable contrivance, and its main features can best be indicated by saying that the passenger sits in an ordinary ricsha body. The driver sits on a saddle between the passenger and the engine, and the engine is situated on top of the front wheel. The engine is a 3 h.p. Jap, and the vehicle, which is driven by chain transmission, is without a speed gear, but is driven on the throttle, and is fitted with a clutch and brake. The inventor is Mr. J. S. Ruchwaldy, who has taken out a patent in Malaya, and who has had this vehicle constructed by Messrs. D. J. Smith & Co., of London.

THE SUMMER PALACE AGAIN:

A Reply to Mr. K. C. Tchen: A Few More Wild Charges to Correct

BY R. F. JOHNSTON
(Tutor to the Ching Emperor)

I have read with great interest the article by Mr. K. C. Tchen in which he takes me to task for some of the views expressed by me in my memorandum on the subject of Mr. Li Hsieh-yang's recent attack on the Manchu Emperor and myself. I am not sure that the long-suffering public is sufficiently interested in the subjects at issue beween us to tolerate a further statement from me, but I trust this is the last time I shall have to crave its patience and indulgence in connexion with this rather arid controversy.

Imperial Ownership.

Mr. Tchen begins by questioning my statement that the Summer Palace is part of the "private property" of the Manchu House, which the Republic solemnly undertook to respect and protect. His views on this point seem to be directly opposed to those of his own Government. No attempt has ever been made by any President or Cabinet, since the establishment of the Republic, to deny the proprietary rights of the Imperial House in the Summer Palace; on the contrary, those rights have been ungrudgingly recognized by the Government on many occasions. For example, some time ago the Imperial House on its own initiative raised the question of the ownership of the stream that flows from the Jade Spring to the Summer Palace; and it was decided, after a perfectly amicable discussion, that within the enclosures of the two parks the stream belonged to the Imperial House, while the stretch between the western water-gate of the Summer Palace and the east walls of the Jade Spring Park belonged to the Republic. In every case in which the Republican Government and the Imperial House have had occasion to discuss matters connected with the lands and houses occupied or administered by the Imperial House, including the Summer Palace, the status of the Imeperial House as owner of such property has always been tacitly or explicitly recognized by the Government of the Republic. It seems rather late in the day for a private citizen of the Republic to call in question rights which his own Government has repeatedly admitted.

Worn-out Propaganda.

I am greatly surprised that so well-informed a lawyer as Mr. Tchen should have introduced that venerable piece of revolutionary propaganda about the whole Chinese Empire with all its lands and "everything growing or living on them" having been the "private property" of the Imperial Autocrat—a monstrous state of affairs which was happily terminated for ever by the establishment of a Republic which guarantees and maintains the rights of all its citizens. Mr. Tchen very well knows that when we speak of the ultimate ownership of all lands in China being vested in the Emperor, we are merely stating a legal theory which had obvious advantages from the point of view of the State and which hardly ever affected the rights of individual landholders. Under the Empire, as at present, China was pre-eminently a land of peasant-proprietors, and the farmers' proprietary rights, though technically limited by the ultimate ownership of the "Son of Heaven," were not interfered with except on the rarest occasions. The real limitations on the Chinese cultivator's proprietary rights came not from the Emperor but from the cultivator's own family or clan. Most Western writers on Chinese social life would, I think, agree with that in spite of the Emperor's ultimate ownership of every inch of the soil, Chinese landholders were less hampered by State interference than the landowners of any country in Europe. I have very frequently heard Chinese farmers complaining of the restrictions and limitations imposed upon them by the fact that in China land-rights are vested in the family rather than in the individual, but never heard a Chinese cultivator complaining of any inconvenience arising from the legal fiction which vested the ultimate ownership of his land in the Emperor. Here I will leave a subject with which I dealt rather fully in a book entitled Loan and Dragon in Northern China." I will only add that Mr. Tchen gravely misunderstands my position if he supposes that when I refer to the Summer Palace as part of the "private property" of the Manchu House I am alluding to the old legal fiction (which of course long antedates Manchu rule in China) of the Emperor's ultimate rights over all the soil of the Empire.

Secondly, Mr. Tchen questions the correctness of my view that the Imperial House would be justified, in certain circumstances, in developing some of the commercial possibilities of the Summer Palace. On this subject we must agree to differ, and in any case the matter is of no practical importance, as the rumours about extensive commercial exploitation were untrue.

Wholly Baseless Libels.

Thirdly, Mr. Tchen discusses the question of a Manchu restoration and informs me that such an event is still possible. It may be so just as all kinds of improbabilities are "possible." This does not justify either Mr. Li Hsieh-yang or Mr. K. C. Tchen in publicly stating or suggesting that the Manchu Emperor "long for" the restoration of the dynasty or that his British Tutor shares those longings and is engaged in inciting his imperial pupil to realize them. Surely Mr. Tchen must see that such statements, if allowed to go unchallenged, are likely to be regarded by a large section of the public as based on fact, and might easily lead to a new anti-Manchu agitation with results not only harmful to the interests of the Imperial Family but also most damaging and disastrous to the good name of the Republic.

I am glad to see that there is little or nothing in Mr. Tchen's aricle to justify the thought that he has any wish to injure the young Manchu Emperor in any way; but unfortunately the same cannot be said of Mr. Li Hsieh-yang's attacks, which seem to me to be very obiously inspired by a desire to stir up public feeling against the Manchu House. In this view I may be wrong, but I fail to see how we can otherwise explain the studied discourtesy of Mr. Li's references to the Manchu Emperor, not only on this occasion but on several previous ones.

Some Questions of History.

Fourthly, Mr. Tchen finds fault with me for declaring that even if the Summer Palace had never been rebuilt the result of the China-Japan war would have been the same. Perhaps I expressed myself too dogmatically on this point. I therefore take this opportunity of amending my remarks on this subject by saying that in my opinion (which may be totally without value and erroneous) the building of the Palace made no practical difference to the final result of that war.

I may add that I purposely referred to the "rebuilding" of the Summer Palace, because it is not as well known as it should be that the Palace was not a new creation by the Empress Dowager but a partial reconstruction of a palace that existed long before her time. The destruction of the Yuan Ming Yuan, Ch'ing Yi Yuan and Ching Ming Yuan by the French and British troops in 1860 had left the Manchu Court without a habitable summer residence in the vicinity of the capital. Naturally and inevitably, the need for such a summer residence was severely felt by the Maschu Court, and though the money spent on the buildings may have been excessive in view of the straitened condition of the country's finances, it is well to bear in mind that the Empress Dowager only reconstructed a portion of the buildings which had been erected by the Emperor Kao Tsung (Ch'ien Lung). It was in 1751 that the original palace was completed by that Emperor and given the name of Ch'ing Yu Yuan (清漪園). This name remained unchanged until 1888, when the Empress Dowager, on completing her work of partial restoration, altered it to Yi Ho Yuan (頤和園), the name which the property still bears.

A Pile of Mare's Nests.

Mr. Tchen concludes his article by telling us that "Many Chinese understand that Mr. Johnston was an active member of the British consular service in China, and that, when his Minister in Peking was recommending him to the Manchu Imperial Household as Tutor to the young Emperor, the other Legations got alarmed and each presented a bright candidate." I fear that "many Chinese," if this is what they "understand", have been grievously misled. In the first place, I never was a member of the British Consular Service; in the second place, I was not recommended to the Manchu Imperial Household by the British Minister but by a well-known Chinese ex-diplomat and by the President of the Chinese Republic. With regard to the third point, I can only say that I never heard of any "alarm" being felt or expressed by any Legation as a result of my appointment, and that the various Legations will probably be highly amused to learn from Mr. Tchen that they are believed by "many Chinese" to have competed with one another for the honour of providing his Majesty with a foreign Tutor. Mr. Tchen himself seems to have misgivings as to the accuracy of these three allegations, for he says that if he has been misinformed he offers his apologies in advance to all concerned. So far as the matter concerns me, his apologies are most readily accepted, and I have no desire to "rub it in". But in view of his doubts as to the accuracy of his information, and the apologies tendered by him in advance, it was surely improper for him to add that "the wise diplomacy of the Graet Powers thought it worth while to sacrifice the valuable services of a publice servant for a possible future advantage in a restored Manchu Empire". As his facts are erroneous the theory he built on those alleged facts is obviously not worth discussing.

Vision

THE story of Columbia is one of vision. Close upon ten years ago Columbia saw the possibilities of Chamber Music for the gramophone.

About the same time Columbia saw the lack of Orchestral Records representing the Interpretations of famous conductors and orchestras.

Columbia made the first serious issues of Chamber Music records.

The result exists in the NEW Columbia Grafonola—the gramophone that has swept the country with its revolutionary TONE—and the "NEW PROCESS" Records (the ONLY Records WITHOUT SCRATCH!)

The vision has been transformed into REALITY.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

A new "Life of Mazzini," by Miss Edyth Hinckley, is announced by the Putnams.

Sir Charles Bell has written an authoritative book on "Tibet, Past and Present," and it will appear in the early autumn with the Oxford University Press.

Mr. Walter de la Mare will visit the United States in September to deliver a course of lectures on English Literature at the Johns Hopkins University.

According to a well-known London publisher, the proportion of manuscripts accepted by his firm is about two per cent. of the total he receives in a year.

Mr. Upton Sinclair, the author of "The Jungle," acts as his own publisher nowadays. He is putting out a play called "Singing Jailbirds," which is, of course, a piece of propaganda.

There seems no end to books about Stevenson. A volume of reminiscences by Lord Guthrie has just been published, and in the autumn we are to have a two-volume biography by Mr. John A. Steuart. The birthplace of Stevenson at No. 8, Howard Place, Edinburgh, is to pass into the hands of the Edinburgh Robert Louis Stevenson Club.

Mr. John Innes, the author of the recent Scots novel, "Till a' the Seas Gang Dry," is an Ayrshire man, like George Douglas Brown, whose work has distinctly affected him. Like Brown, he was educated at Glasgow and Oxford.

Mr. Arnold Bennett has written his sequel to "Riceyman Steps," entitled "Elsie and the Child," exclusively for "The Story Teller." It will appear in the September number.

"The Story of the Savoy Opera," by S. J. Adair Fitz-Gerald, is proving extremely popular. Mr. Adair Fitz-Gerald is well known as the author of "Dickens and the Drama," "Stories of Famous Songs," and other works, and his latest, to which the Right Hon. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., writes an introduction, has a very wide appeal. The publishers are Stanley Paul.

The Bodley Head have added two new volumes of their well-known popular edition of the works of Anatole France in English. The volumes are "Thais," one of Anatole France's most popular and powerful stories, and "Little Pierre," one of the books in the delightful Bergeret series.

An edition de luxe of James Elroy Flecker's tragedy, "Hassan," which was produced last year at His Majesty's Theatre, will be published by Heinemann in October at the price of one guinea. It will be illustrated by 12 fullpage colour drawings by T. Mackenzie.

Cecil Palmer has just published a book entitled "The Art of the Poster, its Origin, Evolution, and Purpose." This book, which is under the general editorship of Mr. E. McKnight Kauffer (himself a poster artist of some distinction), traces the history of the poster from its beginning until the present day. It is fully illustrated, and examples of Chinese, French, and German posters are included. Among the many posters reproduced are the once famous "Yellow Girl" of the late Dudley Hardy, and characteristic specimens of the work of such well-known contemporaries as the Beggarstaffe Brothers, Will Dyson, and Aubrey Hammond. The published price is two guineas.

English literature, in the cheap reprint for the pocket, owes more to Mr. J. M. Dent than to almost any man of our time. His "Everyman Library," in particular, has been great and popular reading with the people. His ambition is to make it a thousand volumes strong, and at the moment its strength is 750 volumes. Early in the autumn he is to add 12 more works to "Everyman," and that will bring it up to 762 volumes, so he does get within sight of his thousand.

"SAINT LUBBOCK"

Would it be too fanciful a flight to say that there was a deeper and truer consonancy in the appellation "Saint Lubbock" than is usual in the case of popular nicknames? A saint has been defined as one who, when confronted by a choice of paths, invariably takes the highest. And that was the history of Lord Avebury's mental and moral life as portrayed in this volume by eight of his intimate friends.

John Lubbock's life was—work. Work was his gospel, and although he was, from the age of 15 to the day of his death, engaged in the strenuous labour inevitable to one of the directors of a big business concern, an enormous proportion of his effort was expended in work for the public benefit. Charles Darwin, his tutor in science and his life-long friend, once wrote to him: "How on earth you find time for all you do is a mystery to me." The secret is an open one—the secret of Napoleon, "whose day was utilization of every moment." As a youth of 20.

> He rose early and read hard before breakfast; gave his morning to natural science; his early afternoon to exercise; came back for political economy, followed by the relief of more science; and during an apparently dinnerless evening, broken by a game of whist, found time for patches of history, for mathematics, and, when his eyes were heavy with sleep, for German —which kept him awake.

Allied to this huge capacity for work was a deliberate and carefully cultivated optimism.

> If we cannot hope that life will be all happiness we may at least secure a heavy balance on the right side; and even events which look like misfortunes, if boldly faced, may often be turned to good. . . . We often distress ourselves greatly in apprehension of misfortunes which, after all, never happen at all.

Falling short of greatness, Lord Avebury attained to a fine competence in many and varied walks of life Had he concentrated on one pursuit he might have achieved a greater fame.

A WORLD WONDER

By A. J. Cummings.

"Kilimanjaro and Its People." By the Hon. Charles Dundas. Witherby. 18s.

Seventy-three years ago Kilimanjaro was unheard of. Yet it is the highest mountain in the African continent and in the British Empire, rising to a height of more than 19,000 feet above sea level; and Mr. Dundas, who has slept upon its massive bosom and has gazed upon its ice-capped peaks from a distance of 120 miles, declares it unhesitatingly to be one of the world's wonders.

Even when one's mind is still full of the mystery and unconquered might of Everest, the vivid account written by Mr. Dundas of this giant of the tropics, thrown up by some tremendous eruption at a remote point in the earth's history, is still wonderfully impressive. Just as Mallory has invested Everest with racy personal attributes, so Mr. Dundas talks of Kilimanjaro as though it were a sentient being, with the conscious moods of a man, ageless but throbbingly alive. The difference is that, while Mallory regarded Everest as an enemy to be defeated, Mr. Dundas contemplates Kilimanjaro as he would a revered and yet familiar friend.

He makes it plain in his story of this ascent how vitally important is the question of oxygen supply even at the comparatively humble altitude of 15,000 feet. The native followers could not be enticed to go higher, but remained in a rock cavity "until the folly of the white man had abated and they could return to normal regions." At that point the climbers were so quickly exhausted that they had to rest every 100 yards. In the final stages the ratio of rest for those who reached the summit was six to one, and they had to climb several thousand feet with respiration at 35 and pulsation at 120 to 130 per minute, sliding back often more than half the height gained. The view from the crater rim they found to be one of inexpressible loveliness; and the mountain itself, which has a diameter at the base of 40 miles, is a joy for ever in its rich and varied beauty.

In the great forests in the middle zone, where the heather grows 40 feet high, dwell undisturbed the elephants, leopards, wild pigs, Sykes monkeys, and other animals of the forest. A little lower down, under the shade of the banana groves, live the Chagga tribes, the traditional mountain people, whose love for their country and sense of nationality distinguish them from all other Africans. How could it be otherwise, when the secure serenity and the delicious climate of the mountain slopes is to the intolerable heat and the incessant perils of the plains below as heaven is to hell?

Without ever having seen it, but without an instant's doubt, I name Kilimanjaro as Africa's most precious jewel. But I am a little afraid of all this publicity. I am afraid that one day there will be Cook's tours to Kilimanjaro. And then good-bye to its reticent beatitudes. It will be as commonplace as Wembley.—"Daily News."

MR. BIRRELL'S ENCORE

On Taking Literature Too Seriously

By J. B. Priestley.

"Literature," Mr. Birrell remarks urbanely, "should be taken seriously, but not too seriously." He has, you see, returned to the attack. "There is an immense deal of claptrap talked, and more written, about books and reading—the Ministry of Books, the Consolations of Literature, and I know not what other fine phrases." And in another place: "As for the consolation, who was ever consoled in real trouble by the small beer of literature or science?" But when we turn to the date of this particular essay (for all the essays in this little collection are dated), we notice that it is a gentle gibe at Quarterly Reviewers written in 1890! In this year of grace, Mr. Birrell would find it a difficult task to discover persons more bookish than himself whom he could startle into attention by his occasional iconoclastic remarks.

Thirty-four years have gone by and now it is ourselves and not literature that we are in danger of taking too seriously. But Mr. Birrell, with his sturdy common-sense and salty phrases, remains as great a tonic as ever. Writing of one of our most admired works, no other than Mr. Strachey's "Eminent Victorians," he says: "Elderly folk who are beginning to move slowly above the ground, with figures 'grown convex,' may find in its pages just a little too much, despite the prevailing note of a dexterous urbanity, of that unkindness of judgment which is characteristic of critics who have not yet been judged by their juniors. Reason, as was shrewdly said by a great scholar of our own day, is the philosophy which is in vogue for the moment, and, as such philosophies are of necessity shortlived, even the test of Reason should be applied cautiously, and possibly humbly, to the lives and creeds of our predecessors."

A Startling Opinion.

The unusually great length of time covered by the various papers in this volume gives it an additional interest. Thus, we discover our author proving to his own, though not to our satisfaction that the Age of Victoria was pre-eminently an age of law reform, and of little else. "I suppose everybody," he remarks, in the course of this essay, "will admit that all our greatest poets, dramatists, actors, warriors, historians, philosophers, orators, divines, took the unmannerly precaution to live and die outside the limits of the Victorian Age." But this passage itself was written within the limits of that age, and though Mr. Birrell, with commendable honesty, has allowed it to stand, I doubt if the sight of it makes him feel quite comfortable now that he is stranded among the raging, tearing Georgians, and Victoria and her mighty men are sinking below the horizon of time, but looming ever more largely in the memory.

For the rest, this volume is very much the brother of the volumes we have been given before. There is talk of Leslie Stephen, Coleridge, Newman, Jane Austen, Fielding, Byron, Chateaubriand, and the usual amusing smaller fry, whom Mr. Birrell serves up with the dressing of his learning and the sauce of his humour. Many of these papers are only reviews, and the practice of reprinting reviews is not to be encouraged; indeed, it would not be a bad idea if writers were compelled to take out a licence or some form of official permission to reprint their reviews. But if I were in charge of the department that granted such licences, I should send one to Mr. Birrell even before he had asked for it. If he has still more gleaning to do from the periodicals of the last 30 or 40 years, let him glean again, and Mr. Heinemann will print and publish, and we will read and rejoice, only too delighted to see again that cunning hand administering the oil and vinegar of his criticism to the salad of literature.—"Daily News."

COUNTRY LIFE

"The Cornfield." By A. R. Williams. (Jonathan Cape. 7s. 6d.)

The author of a book unusually distinctive and original in quality seems to have conspired with his publisher to advertise his aim and accomplishment as commonplace. The title, the sub-title, and the early chapters, all suggest that the volume is a collection of rural essays about nothing in particular. "The Cornfield," which opens the book, is an indifferent effort in the Jefferies vein, designed to give a general picture of a wheatfield. The few references to the field's inhabitants are inadequate, if not ignorant, even in allusions to that far from esoteric bird, the sparrow; and the botany, as in later reference to "Hemlock," is superficial. A subsequent chapter devoted wholly to the pheasant is almost ludicrously naïve, and the detailed account how this bird and that was seen in this and that is a model of the worst sort of rural essay—a fervent and sometimes ill-written record of unessential and unselected episodes. Some misprints do not improve the impression.

These faults notwithstanding—they are chiefly faults of false emphasis—the bulk of the book has virtue of a rare sort. A conscientious objector—so it may be inferred—is sent off to serve on the land, first in one sort of traffic, then another. He is new to the work and awkward; and his sensitive mind—to some extent his much-enduring body—rebels against both the toil itself and the crudity, sometimes the cruelty of the rural employer. Incidents—as of the murdered pony in the lane or the boy killed in the hop-field—are told with admirable reticence and an almost French skill in the bringing out of grim, essentials. They are inspired by a passionate hatred of brutality. Apart from such stories, which presumably overflow from fact into fiction, the successive pictures of life on the land are admirable in their realistic drama. The shepherd at lambing time combines in his character and actions a wonderful love and understanding of animals with a philosophic hardness that appears to the townsman as merely insensate. Fastidious persons, living among secondary things, can only wonder at the elemental countryman combining indifference to death with infinite care for the living. It is the personal illustration of this conflict of views that gives Mr. William's "Cornfield" its chief claim to attention. Each mentality illuminates the other.

The book is a strange study in contrast in many ways. Disrespect for grammar is associated with an admirably restrained and effective manner of writing; and some of the delightfully human sketches of work on the land—as in an account of a struggle with the Planet hoe—have quite ludicrous daubs of ingenuous ignorance. But what is good—and that is the greater part—is very good, because very real; and the mood of pity for suffering is never spoiled by self-pity or adjectival excess.—The "Observer."

A DIPLOMAT'S PUPPET-SHOW

"Things Remembered." By Arthur S. Hardy. (Hutchinson. 18s.)

Mr. Arthur Hardy is an American who in his time has played many parts; he has been a soldier, taught mathematics, written poetry and novels, edited an American magazine, and represented his great country very diplomatically in Persia, Greece, Rumania, Serbia, Switzerland and Spain. It is not surprising then that he writes with fluency and ease, revealing a garnered store of very varied knowledge. For the most part, he recalls the days of "ease with dignity" which he spent as U.S. representative in the smaller European and Near-Eastern countries. And he makes clear that the otium cum dignitate of diplomatic life is intensified in the case of America's representatives. Indeed, it would appear that Mr. Hardy's chief official task lay in wearing the prescribed uniform of a waiter with ease and dignity in daylight.

Having regard, then, to his most agreeable literary style and his great opportunities for quiet observation, I could wish that the Near Eastern and Balkan Courts had presented to him their puppet kings and courtiers in melodrama rather than in drawing-room comedy. As it is, Mr. Hardy himself admits life in Teheran was not interesting, and though we are introduced to the events that led up to the Draga tragedy in Serbia, and to the Shah's assassination in the Mosque of Abdul-Azim, nothing very fresh or startling comes to light.

But Mr. Hardy is not a sensationalist. He has charming things to say of several English confrères, notably Sir Edwin Egerton, and of Queen Marie of Rumania and her family life. He has things to say of the discomforts of travel in Persia in the old days and of its female society, of education at West Point, of shooting on the Nile, and life in Spain and Greece. Towards the end his recollections of his life as an editor introduce us to letters from one or two famous literary men. Such letters—provided they are part of the main context of a book—are pleasant enough reading, but otherwise they are rather tiresome. On the whole, my criticism is that "Things Remembered" is too much like the trunk of an American globetrotter returning triumphantly to New York—a hotchpotch of labels. But Mr. Hardy has no need of proof that he has travelled widely. I would prefer that he take one or two of his labels from the trunk and recount one day at greater length and with more particularity his impressions of the places from which he collected them. —"Sunday Times," London.

NEW FICTION

"The Wishing Well."

A good strong plot of the old-fashioned order is to be found in Mr. Samuel Gordon's new novel, "The Wishing Well" (Melrose, 7s. 6d.). Here a husband is obliged to efface himself, paradoxically enough, in order to save the honour of his wife and daughter. 18 years pass before he returns, and then it would seem as if the problem he is called on to face has become even more difficult than before. Indeed the utmost ingenuity is required of the author before matters can be put straight. Mr. Gordon, however, never falters, and even the inevitable tragedy which befalls the iniquitous Grandcourt and his unpleasant and unhappy wife does not seem a too artificial device. And the final chapter, with its unexpected sidelight into the heroine's character, comes as a welcome surprise.

"Barney."

Whether the readers of Mr. S. B. H. Hurst's new novel "Barney" (John Long, 7s. 6d.) like it or not—and there will be very wide differences of opinion among them regarding its likeability—they will be unanimous at least upon one point—that it is a very unusual and original book. It is at once a philosophical treatise and a series of melodramatic adventures—a sufficiently curious hybrid. It details the adventures of "Barney" Hilliard, a young Englishman of good family, driven from his home by a disgraceful and quite unfounded accusation. Barney combines a love of adventure and colossal physical strength, and these attributes lead him into and bring him through a perfect Iliad of strange incident in the wildest parts of North America—incidents mainly of a magical cast. And through them all he is seeking, with the tensest effort of a powerful mind steeped in philosophical study, for an explanation of the mystery of existence, for a reconciliation with the vast, vague Power which created and sustains the fabric of creation. A strange book, containing much powerfully, if sometimes crudely, expressed thought, and many striking adventures by flood and field.—London "Sunday Times."

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

THE WELL DRESSED MAN AND HIS HAT

"Few men realize what an important part the hat is in a well dressed appearance. Great care should be exercised in the choice of hats; for with men, as with women, they may be becoming or unbecoming. Certain hats suit certain types of men: and this consideration should be borne in mind before conforming to the dictates of fashion."

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Thus spake a London Correspondent on the Smart Englishman and pushed home more poignantly than ever the truth of Oliver Wendell Holmes' remark: "The hat is the ultimatum moriens of respectability." When so much depends upon the choice of a topper it would be unkind, it would be mean, it would be positively inhuman to deny the masculine society of Shanghai the opportunity of profiting by what we understand to be absolutely the dernierest cri from dear old London.

The rigidity of certain rules of hat etiquette makes mathematics itself seem an inexact science. One shudders to think what would happen if, relaxed by the free and easy ways of the Orient, the careless male should land at Home ignorant of what is being worn and should commit some irretrievable faux pas before his family could get him in hand. Hence we hastily run over the occasions on which the top hat is essential, at Ascot, the Eton and Harrow cricket match, weddings, receptions at which Royalty is to be present. It must be either black silk, or for summer, a grey felt, and its precise specifications may be obtained upon application.

Sensational Disclosures.

The town hat, of course is the bowler, and for heaven's sake, my dear boys, do be careful to patronize the best hatters, and then you will feel quite correct, even when wearing it to the Derby. The usual Homburg, you will be interested to know, is being superseded by a more careless looking affair, with a softer brim, worn flat. But, and this is the startling truth, a black felt Homburg, is being worn this season in the evening, with a dinner jacket. Wembley may be responsible for the innovation, which may never happen again. Still, it is well to be informed. Of course all my readers will be sure to wear a silk hat with a tail coat and white tie.

The boater straw hat is a sort of hanger on in good circles. It is frowned upon and yet one can't deny, that men who ought to know better do wear it, even in London. Of course the straw Panama is reserved for the water or country wilds. The good old tweed cap, one rejoices to hear, is still with us for sports and travel, and coarse linen caps are permitted in summer.

Which Hat Expresses Me?

Bearing all these points in mind, one must not forget that certain hats suit certain types, as our friend has told us, and before sallying forth to the hatter's it would be well to do a little psycho-analizing. "Am I a Hamburg type or is my style the perfect Bowler?" you should ask yourself. "Have I the force of character to insist upon a boater or is the sweetly careless felt more in my line?" Think this over carefully. Then you will be the better fortified to withstand the flatteries of the salesman who tells you that the particular tile he wishes to get rid of is "simple, but O so sweet and boyish."

Although your resemblance to "Our Young Man" may have been commented upon, do not feel that you must always copy his latest purchases, no matter how the adroit young clerks may suggest it. When they say: "It's not every face as could stand that rough straw sailor, but you look just too doggy for words in it," be strong. When you are urged to buy a brown bowler because it brings out the shade of your eyes so perfectly, have courage, my boy, to say no. Any way, the safest purchase for Shanghai at this precise moment is the handy helmet.

MUSIC OF MANY VOICES

By Fanny Pomeroy Brown.

The nun kneels quietly to be filled with the spirit of God. The musician waits on the sounds of God. He sits in the open court yard of a Chinese farm house. He hears spring in the breeze that, warm with the sun, plays softly on the withered bamboo leaves. It is not yet their time to refreshen. He hears the liquid notes of birds as they sway on a branch. Thousands of bees give a soft bass note as they fly to suck the soy-bean honey. Faintly comes the sound of the boatman's oar in perfect rhythm, as he makes his steady way along one of the many canals.

On the narrow paths that make a net work though the paddy fields, the wheel-barrow man comes staggering under some great weight, and as he comes he mutters sounds deep from his stomach pit, as if he would say, had he the strength to spare, "Oh God let not the burden fall." Far across the fields comes the Hay Ho, Hay Ho from the carrier coolie as he nips along with light quick steps, the split half of a bamboo pole across one shoulder with a heavy load hanging from each end. His stacato voice keeps time with his feet. Down from the hills echoes the sharp click of the stone cutter's chisel. Then the most beautiful of songs,—the stone cutters' chantey as the men carry the huge slab of stone down the mountain, a song so rhythmic and of such clear tone that the heaviest burdens might seem as nothing when singing coolies carry them.

Mellow Temple Bells.

From inside the high wall of the temple come enchanting sounds. The Buddhist monk worships with chanting prayer and as he chants we hear the clear resounding mellow tone of the hollow wooden drum somewhat the shape of a bell which he strikes as he prays. From a dark corner comes the deep tones of a huge bell, and glorious meditative vibrations, which reach the depth of one's soul.

Into the musician's court come the sounds from the street. He knows them all and from the sound he can picture the drifting vendors, the passing workmen, all the myriad parts of the busy life that China lives on its streets. For in China they never vary; the act is father to the sound. He hears the itinerant cotton piece merchant call out in song to advertise his gay goods; his voice is hoarse and loud and his song has a stiff rhythm that seems to make the people buy. The old dried olive man sings in quavering tones "one copper, two olives."

"Topical Songs."

The hollow penetrative tapping of a bamboo cylinder announces the traveling kitchen and the intervals of quiet speak of the patronage of the passers-by. The gay jingling of many brass strips tell of the advent of the petty hardware man who carries his stock in an open case. Over all and under all is a steady chorus, now loud, now soft, from a new building where a hundred coolies are carrying mortar, or lumber and singing a kind of antiphonal chant whose monotony makes strange contrast with the lusty voices of the singers. And from time to time comes the song of the pile-driver, that classic among chanteys, with the clear tenor of the leader ringing out gloriously in a melody that begins with a high note of challenge and proceeds until it reaches the long succession of deep abdominal tones that are timed perfectly with the pull of the men on the ropes that lift the heavy driver for its next drop on the pile it is sending straight into the ground beneath. The musicians smile to catch the words of the leader as he uses the rhythm of his song to remark on the passing events in the street,—some comment on the big feet of a foreign woman perhaps, or a reminder to his hard-working colleagues that it will soon be time for rice and tea.

The Windy Flute.

Quietly in a little shop across the narrow street a man plays his flute as he awaits his customers, the Chinese flute that is plaintive and mysterious, full of purity of tone and yet of the wildness of the winds in the trees. How can one tell the importance of the flute in the Chinese life? It is played happily in the wedding procession; played sadly in the funeral march; played in the crowded city streets, and on the boats so thickly crowded at the river's edge. In the twilight this sound seems to mingle with sounds of another world.

With all this natural music that seems to well up easily as if from a common throat, the contrast in the Chinese opera is remarkable. They seem to have turned away from the beautiful pure tones that predominate in the whole symphony of the Chinese people. Is it because until very recently men have always taken the part of women on the stage that they sing with this high nasal penetrative tone; or is this unnatural sound to amuse the people?

The musician prefers the quiet chair in his courtyard, with the song of the birds, the bees, the sounds from the fields and from the streets, where he can meditate on the beauty of a people who make a song for labour.—"Chinese Triangles," published by the Y.W.C.A.

N.B. THE FIGURED CREPE, THE CAPE, THE SMOCKING AND THE FLORAL GIRDLE.

MIDSUMMER

Along the sun-baked undercliff
The white bloom of the blackberry blows:
The sea shimmers: a salt sea whiff
Hangs between the high hedgerows.

The lane climbs up from yellow sand
Through fields of yellowing corn: but steep
The honeysuckle hedges stand.
We tunnel through a world asleep,
Winding a narrow way, until
A wave of sweet, hay-scented air
Breathlessly lands us on the hill.

Within the foxglove bell the bee
Noisily honey-hunts. Up the lane
Flashes a dragon fly. Too soon
The hours rest even in the scale
And forenoon tilts to afternoon;
Pale evening weighs down morning pale.

The twelve strokes of the midday clime
Ring through the silence of my brain;
And folded on the dial of Time
The hands point heavenward again.
High at the zenith burns the sun,
Deep at the nadir night lies drown'd:
And half the course of love is run:
Midsummer passes without sound.

Three months hence, when we hear the hum
Of threshing up the combe and see
Across the stubble gleaners come,
Let us part gladly, silently,
And standing in the autumn haze
Let fall the gathered sheaf of hours,
As children after long, bright days
Turn home and scatter dropping flowers.

—George Rylands

FASHION'S LAST WORDS

Or More Appropriately Her Latest-to-date

Shanghai is not greatly concerned about clothes these days. The fewer the better is about our standard. Under the continued heat, those who stood firm for the costume modestly opaque have succumbed to the superior coolness of the translucent, while those who once advocated the latter are now frankly transparent and would cheerfully be less were it possible. Illustrations of the newest fur coats seem in as bad taste as the proffer of a boiled dinner to a seasick man.

Still, clothes are being worn. Society compels us to take some interest in them, so we might as well know the current gossip regarding green and white sandals for the country and the prediction of plaids and large checks for autumn fabrics. Very likely Shanghai will never see the feminine adoption of the man's high hat. All the same it gives one a mild thrill to know that daring pioneers are wearing them, one with a black silk crown, all same man's opera hat, with a rough straw brim, giving the effect of a modified knot of straw on the right side. This topped a suit patterned in black and white checks.

French heels are disappearing from New York's daytime vogue, and Cuban and low heels are the comfortable substitutes. White dresses trimmed with ostrich are most worn for evening. Brocaded dresses of materials with metal backs are seen and chiffon as well. Vionnet has astonished all beholders by a series of masculine tailleurs, with waists nipped in at the side.

Betwixt and Between

Wardrobes, however, seem to be standing with reluctant feet where the fall and summer meet, and nobody wants to take the first plunge. Short and trim continues the line for day time, with evening dresses bouffant and straight. The more usual tunic which flares at the hip or below it is rivalled by the long straight variety that drops to within a foot of the hem-line. The Directoire influence is tactfully suggested, but it is even less seen than in February. The short, two-toned skirt seems very smart at this identical moment. Visitors from America express their surprise at seeing such long skirts worn here.

The mid-season collection in Paris shows two styles of evening gown, the long line with two or more train panels and the straight slip beaded or embroidered. One charming evening wrap has a low, wide belt, which goes round the back only, with a gathered ruffle below and long, hanging panels. The little frocks are smartly tailored and the lingerie chemisettes are very becoming. The redingote—only fancy a redingote again!—repeats the long tunic effect. Frocks will continue to combine two materials and two colours.—Elizabeth Pepys.

New Way to Cope With Bandits

Miss Clarice Moise, business manager and assistant editor, of the China Journal of Science and Arts, is now visiting at her home in San Francisco. When interviewed by a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle on the dangers of banditry, Miss Moise said laughingly. "Id never be afraid of a Chinese bandit; I'd just take off my hat and shake my head at him!"

As her red hair is a characteristic shared by the Manchu devils it can be understood that Moise is a fearsome object to the superstitious Chinese of the interior. During her stay in California Miss Moise will lecture on China and the Chinese, especially with reference to commercial and economic questions.

A WOMAN IN THE U.S. CABINET?

Will there be a woman in the next U. S. Presidential Cabinet? If John W. Davis, the democratic nominee, succeeds to the presidency this may reasonably be expected. Mrs. Izetta Jewell-Brown's speeches made both at San Francisco and New York seconding the nomination of Davis for the nomination were so successful that many people are saying they merit Cabinet recognition. Mr. Davis himself gives Mrs. Brown much credit for presenting his claims so adroitly before the two conventions.

Mrs. Brown as Izetta Jewell, began her theatrical career as a member of a stock company in Oregon. She later played with Poli's stock company in the East where she was very popular with Washington audiences. Here she met William G. Brown, democratic congressman from West Virginia, and married him. Widowed after a year and a year and a half of married life she did not return to the stage but turned to politics and the public speaking incident thereto. She has twice been a candicate for the democratic nomination for U. S. senator from West Virginia, but lost, it is averred, because West Virginia is conservative enough to reserve its honours for native sons and daughters. At all events, Mrs. Brown made a gracious, winning speech in behalf of Mr. Davis and will doubtless be of much service to him in his campaign.

A Conceit?

The girl opposite me
In the car
Has a book in her lap.
It is a copy of Shelley;
And though she might appear
To the casual observer
Engrossed in the words
Directed to her
By a prematurely old young man,
I can tell,
By the nervous ply of her fingers
Along the edge of the book,
That she is bored
To the point of revolt
By the devotions
Of her companion.
I wonder would it be different
Were I the young man—
At least Shelley
Would be a link.

—Le Baron Cooke.

Shanghai Lullaby

Dogs of the summer night,
Deep in your narrow lane,
Still, still your bark and bite,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps.

Motors that honk and scare
Through starlight or through rain
Muffle that noisy blare,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps.

Hawkers that rise too soon,
I beg you, but in vain,
Cry not your wares till noon,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps.

Barrows that groan and creak,
Of wakeful souls the bane,
Grant but the peace I seek,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps.

—Elizabeth Pepys.

THE RENDITION OF THE MIXED COURT

PEKING LEGATION GIVEN TO SOVIET

Legations Reserving to Themselves Right of Action if Moscow Renounces Protocol of 1901: The Note Refused: America's Cutting Message to Red Ambassador

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 18.

According to a Note which Mr. Yoshizawa, Japanese Minister to China, handed to M. Karakhan today, in the name of the Diplomatic Corps, the former Russian Legation is to be handed over to the Soviet.

This action has been taken in view of the Soviet's assurance that it considers itself a co-signatory of the Boxer Protocol, says the Note. However, in view also of M. Karakhan's intimation that the Soviet might in the future renounce their interest in the Protocol, the Diplomatic Corps reserves liberty of action in the event of such renunciation.

Mr. Yoshizawa also presented a communication from the U. S. Minister, Dr. Schurman, to the effect that his action in acquiescing in the Note in no way constituted or implied American recognition of the Soviet.

Peking, Aug. 19.

In handing the Note to the Soviet Ambassador, Mr. Yoshizawa expressed Dr. Schurman's reservation that his acquiescence in the Note in no way constituted or implied American recognition of "the régime known as the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics."

After reading the memorandum M. Karakhan returned it to Mr. Yoshizawa. He is expected to make a vigorous protest against what he regards as a gratuitous insult.

Peking, Aug. 18.

The Note is as follows:—

"On August 1 the senior representative of the Powers signatory to the Protocol of 1901 laid a communication you addressed to him on July 26 before his colleagues (the Diplomatic Representatives of the said Powers), and informed them that in his conversation with you on July 24 you informed him that the Soviet Government considered itself still a co-signatory of the aforesaid Protocol.

"I am now requested by my colleagues to inform you that in view of the above circumstances and the consequences thereof, namely, that the Soviet Government enjoys all the rights, and is impressed with all the obligations of that Protocol and the Protocol of 1904 and also all the subsequent arrangements which bind all the co-signatories to the maintenance of the conventional status of the Diplomatic Quarter, the representatives of the signatory Powers have decided to hand over to Your Excellency the Russian Legation and the keys thereof, and have appointed the Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires to represent them in this business.

"As to the intimation given by Your Excellency in the conversation above referred to, that the Soviet Government might in the future renounce its interests in the Protocol of 1901, which was also reported to my colleagues, I am requested to say that the representatives of the other Powers signatory to the 1901 and 1904 Protocols, must reserve full liberty of action for their Governments in respect of the effect of such renunciation upon the rights, privileges and mutual obligations which will accrue to, or devolve upon, all the signatories of these collective agreements. (Sgd.) Yoshizawa.—Reuter.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR REJECTS THE NOTE IN A HUFF

Peking, Aug. 19.

M. Karakhan this afternoon sent back the American memorandum of August 18 which he refused to accept. M. Karakhan's Note to the Japanese Minister, Mr. Yoshizawa, is as follows:—

"Monsieur le Ministre, "I have the honour to inform Your Excellency that I do not consider it possible to accept the Note of August 18 which you presented to me at the request of the American Minister. I really regret very much that you could not decline this American commission at a time when Japan herself is engaged in negotiations whose very object is to restore normal relations between the Governments of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and Japan. I hope, however, that if and when the U. S. S. R. recognizes the Japanese Government while the latter recognizes the U. S. S. R. this will not be interpreted in any sense that the U. S. S. R. will have recognized the bourgeois, capitalistic régime in Japan or taken to mean recognition by Japan of the socialistic régime of dictatorship by the proletariat. I likewise express the hope that you will have no doubt as to the fact that the negotiations we are carrying on with you are being conducted not between two régimes but between the Governments of the U. S. S. R. and Japan. This understanding may make it easier for Your Excellency, it seems to me, to explain to your American colleague the limits of courtesy beyond which his fear may lead him. It should also be added for the information of your American colleague and for that matter for your other colleagues who may not have had time yet, like the American Minister, to formulate their anxiety that there does not exist in international law and practice any method of restoring the diplomatic relations between two Governments by way of returning to one of them the Legation of the latter Government situated in the capital of a third Power by the other of these two Governments, which, but accidentally and without the consent of the real owner, has in its hands the keys to the buildings of such a Legation. Herewith I beg to return the above-mentioned Note of August 18. Signed: KARAKHAN."

M. Karakhan retained the Protocol Note.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

M. Karakhan's Outburst Followed by An Exordium on American Virtue

Peking, Aug. 20.

M. Karakhan's Note yesterday is the subject of widespread comment in Peking to-day, the general tone of which is an expression of hope that his slashing attack is not an example of the neighbourly relations which he promised to establish when he enters the Legation Quarter.

The Rosta News Agency yesterday circulated an interview with M. Karakhan in which the latter, inter alia, says that the idiosyncrasy of American diplomacy forces it to act foolishly and incorrectly vis-à-vis of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, thus differing widely from the American people who are endowed with common sense which favourably distinguishes them even from other nations. M. Karakham says that no wonder American diplomacy in China is sensitive with regard to the U. S. S. R. for here America more strongly and more acutely than the others Powers felt the blow dealt her policy by the straightforward policy of the U. S. S. R. Indeed, says M. Karakhan, the hypocrisy and Christian bigotry in which Americans enveloped their policy in China have been fully exposed to the eyes of the Chinese people.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Japanese Minister's Vain Attempt to Make Him Withdraw the Note

Peking, Aug. 21.

According to the published reports the Rosta interview yesterday was with a member of M. Karakhan's staff and not with M. Karakhan himself.

It is understood that Mr. Yoshizawa yesterday sent his secretary to urge M. Karakhan to withdraw his note relating to the American communication of August 18. M. Karakhan declined to do so but he subsequently visited Mr. Yoshizawa and a lengthy and heated discussion resulted in an arrangement by which, it is hoped, M. Karakhan will forward an amended note which will then be communicated to the other protocol Powers. Meanwhile M. Karakhan's note of August 19 remains in Mr. Yoshizawa's hands.

With the return of Sir Ronald Macleay, the British Minister, to Peking, Mr. Yoshizawa will cease to be the Senior Protocol Minister in Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RUMOURED FIGHTING ON KIANGSI BORDER

A Peking Report of Attack by Fukien Leader

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 21.

A well founded report reached Peking last night that hostilities had been started on the Fukien-Kiangsi border by the troops of General Sun Chuan-fang, the Kiangsi General.

There are no further particulars available, but the report bears out what has been generally anticipated, namely, that the Kiangsi problem will be tackled before a move is made against Chêkiang. Sun Chuan-fang and Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan of Nanking are said to be in perfect agreement on these tactics.

THE THREATS OF WAR AGAINST CHEKIANG

Tupan Said to Be Threatened on all Sides by Northern Generals

A Peking telegram to the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce" states that in a confidential memorial to the Government, Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan reports that Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang has been reinforcing troops commanded by Gens. Chang Tsz-ping and Yang Hua-chao, who effectives are now said to be 20,000 strong. The memorial adds that Gen. Lu has ordered the Shanghai Arsenal to supply him with munitions with which to equip these two forces, which are gradually moving towards the Kiangsi border. Marshal Chi asks the President to issue him explicit instructions.

President Tsao Kun is also said to be planning a joint attack upon Chêkiang by the four provinces, Kiangsu, Anhui, Kiangsi and Fukien, when the opportune moment should arrive, on the pretext of suppressing brigandage.

A Tientsin telegram reports that after their arrival at Mukden, Gens. Hsu Shu-tseng and Wu Kuang-sing conferred with Chang Tso-lin, Yang Yu-ting and Chang Hsueh-liang on taking action against Chihli. Little Hsu assured Chang Tso-lin that Tang Chi-yao of Yunnan had decided to act in concert with Dr. Sun Yat-sen, as a result of a consultation he had with Hsiung Keh-wu and Tan Mou-hsin. When Dr. Sun was ready to lead an expedition northward, Marshal Tang, it was promised, would send two divisions and two brigades of Yunnan troops to join him. Marshal Lu of Chêkiang, it was stated, had organized and equipped Gens. Tsang and Yang's troops as one division and one mixed brigade, and had made all necessary preparations; and as Marshal Chi of Kiangsu was planning to unite Anhui, Kiangsi and Fukien to launch a joint attack on Chêkiang, Fengtien should at this moment join Chêkiang, in resisting Chihli. Marshal Chang is reported to have agreed to do so, promising to send his newly trained soldiers inside the Great Wall in the event of Marshal Chi actually taking hostile action against Chêkiang.

A Hankow telegram of August 14 to the "Journal" reports that Hsiao Yao-nan, Sun Tan-lin, Chang Fu-lai, Ma Chi, Tang Seng-chi, Chen Fu-cho and other high officials are at Loyang. Wang Chen-ping is sending a delegate there also; and an important military conference on questions concerning the situation in the south will be held in Loyang soon.

In the opinion of the "Shunpao's" Peking correspondent, the war scare need not be taken seriously, as the Government lacks funds for every purpose including the prosecution of a civil war. China has reached such a pass that not only will it be difficult to do any constructive work, but it will be not easy to execute a destructive plan.

Troops Massing on Border But No Joint Attack: Unfounded Rumours

Peking, Aug. 14.

In spite of reports from various sources indicating increased military activity, there was a tendency in foreign circles to-day to discount the current rumours that Chêkiang is likely to be invaded at any moment by combined forces from Kiangsi, Kiangsu, Anhui and Fukien.

From what is believed to be an anti-Chihli source it is announced that on August 5 representatives of the four provinces last mentioned conferred with the Minister of War in Peking and discussed the measures which should be taken against Chêkiang in view of the re-entry into Chêkiang of Generals Tsang Chih-ping and Yang Hua-chen and their incorporation under the banner of General Lu Yung-hsiang. It is said that the plan adopted by the conference was immediately to mobilize two divisions from Kiangsu, three brigades from Fukien and one brigade from Kiangsi. Other reports from Foochow indicate that Gen. Sun Chuan-fang has ordered Gen. Meng Chao-yueh to re-inforce the troops along the Chêkiang border and is concentrating his forces north of Fukien. This is not, however, taken to mean that Gen. Sun intends to invade Chêkiang, or that his concentration of troops has any connexion with the reported scheme of Marshal Wu Pei-fu to attack that province simultaneously from the south, east and north.

From Hangchow comes a report that there are obstacles in the way of a fusion of the forces of Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, who is the Inspecting General over Kiangsi, Anhui and Kiangsu, and those of Marshal Wu and that these are likely to prevent the close co-operation necessary for a successful joint attack.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Aug. 19.

Chinese official circles assert that the Chihli Party has not the slightest intention of warring against Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang and voice the opinion that the recent scare was probably caused by parties interested in lowering the price of Chinese bonds which depreciated considerably during the last few days.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Gentry's Fear of "Market Crisis"

Although the war rumours are discredited by officialdom, during the last few days, numerous organizations have been bombarding the authorities in Kiangsu and Chêkiang with telegraphic inquiries and appeals for peace. From these telegrams, published in the Chinese press, we reproduce one despatched from Shanghai on August 19 by the most influential members of the Kiangsu gentry to Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan at Nanking:—

"Since your Excellency and your colleagues condescended to sign the Peace Pact last year in deference to public opinion, people in the south-east have enjoyed the blessings of peace for a year. Although I-lin, Yi-ling, Yen-pei and Liang-tsai had concluded their duties as peace delegates, they have not forgot for a moment to pray for the maintenance of peace. Recently, in view of the difficulties in our foreign intercourse, the depleted state of our finances, the visitation of floods and other terrible calamities and the prevalence of brigandage, a person of such high intellect as your Excellency cannot and will not embark upon any military venture and violate your own oath. Nevertheless, recent reports published in the Press have greatly alarmed the masses, as if mobilization of troops and transportation of supplies had taken place in fact.

"I-lin and others, who took an active part in the name of peace, are now more than ever conscious of their responsibility. We beg that your Excellency will give us an explicit reply, in order to dissipate the rumours and avert a market crisis. Or, should there be any force majeure compelling your Excellency to modify your attitude, we also beg of you to disclose your position to all persons of the two provinces who took part in the signing of the Peace Pact, so that they may mediate for a settlement; if they should fail, you may denounce the mediators for their incompetency and exonerate yourself from blame before the Kiangsu people. We may mention that at the same time, the Chêkiang people are addressing a similar telegram to the Chêkiang authorities.

"To our frank question, we wait anxiously for your reply.

"(Sgd.) Chang I-lin, Huang Yi-ling, Shen En-u, Yuan Hsi-tao, Fang Huan, Chien Sung-ku, Huang Yen-pei, Shi Liang-tsai, Chen Tao-yi."

The "Shanghai Tribune" says that there is great activity in Nanking in securing boats for the transportation of troops, and that nearly all steam launches in the interior have been seized. At the same time the authorities are assuring the people that these are not military preparations.

A Reuter Peking message says it is reported that a ministerial conference held at the Ministry of Communications on Saturday discussed the question of devoting boxer Indemnity funds to railway construction in the first instance. It is understood that a tentative scheme was drafted, whereby the revenues of the railways would be used for education, strict supervision being exercised over the collection and disbursement of the railway revenues. A joint conference will shortly be held on the subject by representatives of the Ministries of Communications, Foreign Affairs and Finance.

CHEKIANG AND THE FUKIEN TROOPS

Reduced by Tupan Lu from Divisions to Brigades: His "Peace Policy" Reaffirmed

In reply to a telegram from ten members of the Chekiang gentry in Shanghai, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang and Civil Governor Chang Tsai-yang have jointly declared the attitude of Chêkiang in connexion with the recent rumours of hostilities.

"Kiangsu and Chêkiang, says the Marshal, are adjoining provinces. Since we signed the Peace Pact at your request last year, Chêkiang has consistently aimed at cultivating the friendship of its neighbour and preserving peace and order within its own borders; it has never once deviated from this course. It is entirely because of the jealousy and distrust felt in certain quarters towards us that the present trouble is deliberately fomented. Our admittance of Tsang and Yang's troops is only a pretext to justify a violation of the Peace Pact.

"The facts relating to the entry of Tsang and Yang's forces into Chêkiang were given for your information:—Both Tsang and Yang commanded a unit of the National Army in Fukien, their total strength being over two divisions. Sun Chuan-fang and Chou Ying-jen wanted to remove them, but were unable to do so even with the large military forces in Fukien wholly at their disposal They only compelled them to leave Changchow and Tungan and, travelling 1,000 li, the retreating troops entered the province of Kiangsi. The latter province also employed the whole of its military forces in a futile endeavour to intercept them; but without avail. They then succeeded in reaching and entering Chêkiang.

Chekiang Forces Not Mobilized.

"When they were fighting their way to Chêkiang, Chêkiang had had, no communication with them. But when they did arrive within our midst, we could not possibly be so callous as to do nothing for them. If we had driven them to bay at that time, fighting would have been unavoidable, and the Chêkiang people would have been the first to feel the clash. This would be contrary to our repeated declaration to preserve our territory and protect our people.

"As these troops expressed their readiness to accept control and reorganization, we took them in and reduced their divisions to brigades, to diminish their strength; we assigned them certain placse to restrict their movements. The Chêkiang people may thus enjoy peace and our neighbours may remain undisturbed too.

"Now, instead of understanding our true intentions, some quarters have apparently taken umbrage at our action in this matter. Fukien and Kiangsu have been making military moves against us, as it is known far and near. But we in Chêkiang have not mobilized a single man or officer, a fact also well-known to all and sundry. However, if others are planning our ruination, although we are entirely peaceful and non-combative at heart, we cannot help taking proper defensive measures for the sake of our province and people, as you gentlemen will readily admit. We shall still try to preserve our territory and protect our people without breaking peace if we are unmolested. We will never be the first to take any offensive action, we assure you. —Dated Hangchow August 19, 1924."

Sir F. Aglen, Inspector-General of the Maritime Customs, left Peking for Peitaiho on August 17 on a month's leave. The Deputy Inspector-General will be in charge during his absence, but important questions will be referred to Sir Aglen at Peitaiho for decision.

The Peking Government in its efforts to control the narcotics traffic in China is said to have proposed a plan whereby all such drugs for medical and scientific purposes will be imported once a year. When the lots are admitted and passed, the Customs and officials can seize all other consignments.

MOVEMENT TO OUST SUN YAT-SEN

Will Chen Return to Canton?

Politically, Canton is at the moment in a very unsettled state, and persistent rumours are prevailing that before very long Dr. Sun Yat-sen will be forced to again leave the city, (writes the "Hongkong Telegraph").

It has been known for some time past that Gen. Chen Chung-ming has been perfecting his plans for another attack on Canton, being, it is said, backed up by Marshal Wu Pei-fu, both with funds and ammunition. The latest report in circulation is that he may be in Canton within the next two or three weeks.

Recently, the floods have delayed General Chen's operations, but with the gradual subsiding of the waters it is thought the decisive blow may be struck very soon.

It is being openly said in the city that there is now no Government in Canton, Dr. Sun having lost control, which is now said to be in the hands of labour leaders and agitators.

Opinion seems varied as to the likelihood of the situation being composed for any length of time, even if General Chen should return. People are asking whether, if he comes, he will be able to hold the situation, though it is realized that if Wu Pei-fu can provide a good backing, Chen may be kept in power for a very considerable period.

A gentleman who returned from Canton last night assures us that many rumours of an impending change are in circulation, whilst quite a number of wealthy Chinese have already left the city.

Success for Chen.

Regarding the actual fighting, a Canton report states that a detachment of General Hsu Sung-chi's forces, comprising three regiments and fighting for Dr. Sun, suffered heavy losses during an attack made on the troops of General Chen Chiung-ming. It appears that the attack was made on Chen's right wing from the rear. The latter's men purposely retreated step by step until a favourable opportunity presented itself, when a counter-attack was delivered. General Hsu's troops suffered the loss of 500 men and about a thousand rifles.

Yunnanese Going Over?

It is rumoured that two of the leading Yunnanese Generals who have hitherto been supporting Dr. Sun have concluded negotiations with a representative of Marshal Wu Pei-fu for the purpose of transferring their allegiance to the North. It is said that the terms will not be made known until Chen Chiung-ming's concurrence has been obtained.

The Headquarters in Canton have withdrawn the Honanese forces from the East River in order to reinforce the north-east front.

THE HOUSE TAX IN PEKING

Not Recognized by Diplomatic Body: Payment Left to Nationals' Discretion

Peking, Aug. 18.

The House Tax which it is proposed to impose upon foreigners residing in Peking was discussed at the meeting of the Diplomatic Body this morning. It was decided that the Ministers should send in identical notes to the effect that, while they do not formally recognize the tax, they propose to leave it to the discretion of their nationals whether or not they make any contribution, by way of donation, and if so what amount.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

According to an unconfirmed report the Government contemplates sending Gen. Tang Tsai-lin to Outer Mongolia as Pacification Commissioner, says Reuter. Tang, who is now Director-General of the Railway Protection Bureau, was in charge of the Chinese garrison at Urga in 1909, when Mr. Santo was at Amban. Gen. Tang is acquainted personally with many of the Mongolian nobles. The same report says that Mr. Hsieh Chia-chu will be given a mission to Lhassa.

RENDITION OF THE MIXED COURT

Chinese Note to Diplomatic Body: Suggested Temporary Measures

Peking, Aug. 18.

The Chinese Government sent a Note to the Diplomatic Body on August 9, in which, after commenting on the Diplomatic Body's Note of June 5, on the subject of the rendition of the Mixed Court, the Government submitted a draft formula of six articles, the most important points of which were as follow:—

(1) The Court shall be called the Special Court of Shanghai, the judges to be appointed by mandate. Chinese law shall be applied to civil and criminal cases in which only Chinese or subjects of non-extra-territorial Powers are concerned, but in mixed cases in which citizens of extraterritorial Powers are concerned foreign assessors may be appointed. Where Chinese violate the Municipal regulations an assessor may sit with the judge.

(2) Sentences of 10 years and upwards must be approved by the Minister of Justice. Death sentences may be passed and, if approved, shall be carried out by the Special Court. Where preliminary investigations in mixed cases are necessary attorneys approved by the Court and foreign assessors may appear.

(3) Gaols and lock-ups of the Special Court shall be under Municipal police administration.

(4) Appeals in mixed cases may be lodged either with the Consul concerned, or the Foreign Commissioner at Shanghai, and a new judge and a new assessor must be appointed to hear the re-trials.

Point (5) deals with the Court's financial affairs and provides for a chief clerk of foreign nationality being in charge of revenue and expenditure. The Senior Consul shall recommend the chief clerk, whom the Government shall appoint.

Point (6) emphasizes that the above are temporary and that when extraterritoriality is abolished they will lapse.

Several of the articles emphasize that subjects of non-extraterritorial Powers will be dealt with in the same manner as Chinese.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. YEN'S PREMIERSHIP ASSURED

Opposition Diminishing Owing to Promise of Salaries for Poor M.P.'s

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug. 13.

The attitude of the Parliamentary groups composing the opposition to the election of Dr. W. W. Yen as Premier is now being clarified. Many of them say frankly they are willing to sell their support for the arrears of their Parliamentary salaries; and if they get the money they are strong enough, I understand, to swing the scales in favour of the Premier-Designate when the nomination at length comes to a vote.

The indigent among the M'P's cannot let Dr. Yen have their votes for nothing. They have to live on their Parliamentary salaries, and when they are not paid they have to makeshift as best they can. If their votes are wanted, they are in clover; if not, they go begging. Pay days are dependent on these occasions when their support is solicited. In these circumstances the merits or demerits of a question are the last consideration, the poor Chinese M.P. regarding it much in the same light as the whig elector in the days of the British rotten borough system who, being a man of principle, charged the Tory candidate £5 for his vote and the whig candidate £3. If the Government party can scrape together enough money to pay the M.P.'s a few months' salary, there is no room to doubt Dr. Yen's eventual election. And there is little doubt now that the money will be forthcoming.

SAFETY AT SEA

Aug. 18.

THE problem of the safety of ships at sea, and the preservation of the lives of their passengers and crews, is one that man has been battling with for centuries, and though a perfect condition of safety probably never will be attained—if indeed it is attainable—the progressive strides in this direction that have taken place during the last few decades have rendered travelling by sea incomparably less hazardous than it was a century ago. In this quest after safety Great Britain, as the world's premier shipping nation and the greatest carrier of passengers and cargoes, always has been well to the fore; British shipping laws and rules, though they may be not entirely beyond criticism, always have had as their premier and their main object that of safety; and British ships always have enjoyed, and enjoy still, a reputation second to none for all that is good in ship construction, in life-saving appliances and in the efficiency and seamanship of their crews. The Board of Trade passenger certificate for a vessel trading to and from British ports is an unimpeachable guarantee that that ship is all that reasonably can be desired so far as good condition and the provision of everything to save life in an emergency are concerned. For that reason, if for none other, it is a matter for regret that the Hongkong passenger certificate (which is based generally on the Board of Trade requirements, but in which a certain amount of latitude is permitted) cannot be taken as a guarantee that the vessel it concerns conforms to those rigid and necessary requirements laid down for British passenger ships at Home.

Fortunately, this matter of the inadequacy of the Hongkong certificate is now receiving attention. An ocean-going ship holding a Hongkong passenger certificate was found, on arrival in Australia, to fall short of what the Board of Trade considers necessary in the interest of the lives of passengers and crew. A report on the matter was made to London, the result being the receipt in Hongkong of a communication from the Home Government suggesting that the life-saving appliances rules in force at Hongkong appeared to fall far short of what was necessary from the aspect of safety. The Governor of Hongkong appointed an expert committee to consider the whole matter, and the report of that Committee has just been made public. There is no need here to go into details of the report or to discuss its technical aspects. Briefly, the Committee, for the purposes of its investigations and recommendations, divided shipping into three classes, these consisting of (a) foreign-going vessels carrying passengers outside the limits of the Far East; (b) foreign-going vessels carrying passengers within the Far East; and (c) river steamers certified to carry passengers within specified limits from Hongkong. It was recommended as regards (a) that the certificate for such vessels should be in all respects the same as that issued by the Board of Trade, which includes, of course, the compulsory adoption of wireless telegraphic apparatus. As to (b) the Committee recommended, among other things, that the use of wireless also should be made compulsory, that additional freeboard should be enforced during the typhoon season and that the unsuitable type of raft at present in use should be improved. More or less similar recommendations were made as to (c), it being further recommended that life-belts should be provided for all on board.

The report leaves no doubt that, from the British point of view, the Hongkong passenger certificate is far from satisfactory and that the conditions governing its issuance are in need of drastic revision. The most significant and important of the recommendations, however, is that advocating the compulsory adoption of wireless on all ships carrying passengers, irrespective of whether they are employed on long voyages or short ones, or whether they are river ships or ocean-going ones. This adoption of wireless on vessels in the Far East is long, very long, overdue, and in view of the number of disasters which have occurred in recent years, and in which the loss of life would have considerably been lessened, or prevented altogether, had wireless been installed on the vessels, it is surprising that the force of indignation on the part of the public, of the fitness of things on the part of the shipowners, and of duty on the part of the Hongkong Government, have not resulted in its adoption years ago. It surely cannot be delayed much more.

While, if the recommendations of the Committee are given full effect to at Hongkong, as we have no doubt they will, and that the passenger certificates of vessels using the port soon will be above criticism, the whole question of shipping in China Coast waters presents a glaring and regretable anomaly, which rests solely and entirely on the fact that China, a country with thousands of miles of seaboard and hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping, possesses no single shipping law of her own. It is true that she has acknowledged the International Rules for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, but that was a matter in which force of necessity was and is more powerful than independence or choice. About a year ago, a Chinese official from Peking wrote to us, giving an outline of certain laws relating to Chinese maritime matters which, he assured us, were soon to be promulgated throughout the length and breadth of the land. Those rules have not, so far as we know, yet been put into operation, and we can come to no other conclusion than that both the official and the rules have faded into twilight's purple rim. Although, therefore, vessels carrying passengers to and from Hongkong are compelled to maintain a certain degree of efficiency and safety—which will considerably be augmented if the recommendations referred to above are carried into effect—there is no provision, no law, that compels a Chinese passenger ship trading to Shanghai, for instance, to comply with any or all of the requirements that apply to ships of shipping nations which have their own well thought out and necessary laws. There are no Shipping Acts in China; no facilities for the examination of Chinese candidates for certificates of competency; no regulations as to apprentices on Chinese ships; no seamen's licences; no standards of efficiency for any rating; no rules regarding provisions, health and accommodation on board ship; no hard and fast rules regarding Chinese ships, their construction, their upkeep, their equipment and their survey; no national court in China at which marine cases can be tried; in fact there is practically nothing in legal form that would compel any reasonable standard of efficiency and safety in Chinese ships.

Admittedly the Marine Department of the Chinese Maritime Customs carries out—apparently largely, if not entirely, on its own initiative and responsiblity, for it has no laws to guide it—important and appreciable duties concerning shipping; and the Coast Inspector's Department especially performs work in furtherance of safe navigation, the importance of which cannot be over-estimated. There are, at most of the treaty ports, official harbour regulations, and other rules—some written, others not—dealing with both foreign and Chinese ships, but it appears to be a fact incontrovertible that while the harbour and other authorities do their very best under the most difficult of conditions, that best would not pass muster in other countries. We have it on good authority that local maritime officials at times receive neither that assistance nor that support from Peking to which, doing their best in the absence of shipping laws, they indubitably are entitled. As an example, we may mention that, although Chinese ships are supposed to have a Customs survey, the owners of many of them absolutely refuse to comply with this order. The Hwah Jah was not surveyed by the Customs before she left Shanghai on her famous voyage of instruction. Vessels are licensed to carry only a certain number of passengers, yet frequently they carry hundreds more than the licence number, their owners apparently unmindful of every consideration but that of money. One well-known vessel cleared from port recently with a considerable number of passengers more than her licence permitted. The harbour authorities imposed a substantial fine, but the owners refused to pay it and "pulled some strings" at Peking, from where an order came to the harbour authorities to reduce the fine by one-half!

One may argue that casualties to Chinese ships are few and far between. That may be so, but it is a fact for which no credit can be given to China, and it is a tribute more to unfortunate officials doing their best in the absence of regulations, and possibly to a great deal of luck, than to any efforts, visible or invisible, that are made at Peking, either to frame even a few essential shipping laws or to give moral support when needed to that department without whose activities the conduct and control of shipping in Chinese waters would be as chaotic as the internal affairs of the country.

THE JAPANESE AND MORMONISM

Aug. 19.

IT has been recently announced that, after twenty-two years of missionary effort in Japan, the "Latter-Day Saints" have withdrawn their workers from that country. The statement is made, apparently with official sanction, that there is not at present a single Japanese man or woman who has been converted to Mormonism. Work of this kind is very discouraging. What is the cause of the failure? The recent earthquake disaster and international difficulties over immigration laws may have had some effect in hastening the decision to end the mission, but the main cause or causes must be deeper. The subject is of general interest, as whatever throws light on the Japanese response to Western religious appeals illuminates also, to some extent at least, their general reaction to whatever is novel to them in our Western civilization.

In the popular imagination, Mormonism consists mainly in the claim and practice of its founders that, as part of their religion, they had the right to follow the example of King Solomon and other Old Testament worthies and marry a plurality of wives, a reversion to a primitive custom which aroused intense hostility in the United States. No doubt much emphasis was formerly laid on this custom by the Mormon Church, but for some years past polygamous marriages have been officially prohibited by it in accordance with the demand of the United States Government. At any rate, it is doubtful whether the preaching of polygamy, in and by itself, would be an insuperable obstacle to missionary success in the Orient. The failure must be due to other difficulties. Probably the decided objection of the Japanese to acknowledging the supremacy of a foreign organization in a foreign country has much to do with it. Loyalty to their own government is part of their religious creed. In 1889, the Mormons were refused admittance to the full rights of American citizenship on the ground that "the Mormon Church is a treasonable organization hostile to the Government of the United States, and that the oaths administered to its members on the occasion of their passing through the initiation ceremonies of 'endowment' bind them to render implicit obedience, not only in things spiritual, but also in things temporal and political, to the priests and officers of their church." The long and unfortunate history of the opposition of the Mormon Church to the United States Government and its claim to the unquestioning and full obedience of all its members throughout the world would be quite sufficient to render its propaganda of little or no avail with the intensely patriotic Japanese. Moreover, it is part of its teaching that the millennium is coming and that Zion, the Mormon Church, then will be established in all its glory in America. The Japanese may ask, why should America, of all countries in the world, have this particular glory? Briefly, if the Japanese desired to become Mormons, it would be incumbent upon them to give their principal allegiance to the Mormon Church in the United States, their own country, government, and national and family ties taking a very subordinate place. This is a very serious handicap to any missionary organization desiring to convert people so intensely patriotic as the Japanese. Apart from polygamy, there is much that is good in Mormon teaching, but it is not surprising that Mormonism has utterly failed to gain a foothold in Japan. Nor is it likely that it will succeed in China.

To the dispassionate observer, the present struggle of religions in the East must be very informing and interesting. The native religions will soon discard the customs, practices and beliefs which make them peculiarly vulnerable to adverse criticism, and will thereby become more formidable, more national, and their followers less likely to change. Missionary religions from other parts of the world, Christianity included, to win success must rest more and more exclusively on purely spiritual principles, and minimise whatever in their teaching is foreign or peculiarly temporary and local. The Chinese Christians are not wholly unreasonable when they object to being burdened with the denominational differences of the West, although it would be well for them if they understood the religious principles, the points of contention, which lie at the root of these differences. There is no short cut to sound religious thinking and yet the teaching must be in a form assimilable by the people to whom it is presented. What doctrines and ceremonies will be part of Christianity in China, after foreign Christian teaching has passed through the alembic of the Chinese mind and the doctrinal and other divergencies of the numerous foreign denominations have been weighed, it is hard to predict. Perhaps it might lessen the confusion and help the missionary cause generally if denominations which are not succeeding would either retire, as the Mormons have done in Japan, or unite with stronger denominations from which they differ only on minor points.

THE CANTON STRIKE

Aug. 20.

THE most serious phase of the Shameen strike, or of any strike, is the period when those in authority have completely lost control of their constituencies and are unable to enforce an agreement for settlement. After that, the strike usually settles down to a question of attrition, to a struggle for time. There can be no further compromise, in the circumstances. It is for one side or the other to lose. It is for one side or the other to give in. Fortunately there has been no great delay in this conclusion being reached, as the latest telegram now shows.

Last week we were informed that terms had been reached and that the strike had been settled. The terms generally were favourable to the Chinese, their "faces" being saved on most issues. The Chinese merchant of the Shameen and Canton, who has been paying dearly for all the political activity which has settled on his city like a blight, was undoubtedly satisfied with the conditions of the settlement. The strike was a matter of "face." On only one point did the foreigners hold out, namely, on the dismissal of the Lukan, the police of the Shameen.

The foreigners contend that the Lukan are policemen and are therefore required to abide by the semi-military discipline of municipal employers. According to this theory, a police strike is an impossibility. A policeman, when he strikes, neglects his duty, deserts his post, endangers the city. He does not strike. He deserts. The question has been fought out in other countries and in the highest courts. President Coolidge owes his present position principally to his attitude in the Boston police strike. He used the strongest possible measures to force the deserters back to their duty.

The Chinese, on the other hand, do not recognize these men as police. They call them watchmen. Their very name indicates a watchman. If then they are not police but watchmen, the situation would be quite different. But is this not a quibble over words? In the 18th century, were not all police called watchmen? Did not the watchman, who walked through the night, crying "All is well," perform a police service? It is this endless quibble over the definition of words, this play for time by mental gymnastics which confuses the masses of the Chinese people and makes it possible for an articulate minority to enforce their will on a

The masses of Canton cannot benefit by this strike. They are faced with economic dangers which are not to be underestimated in this situation. The hinterland of Canton has for almost a decade been disturbed by civil war and the marching to and fro of coolie-armies, mostly of troops foreign to Kuangtung. These armies have destroyed crops, interfered with the transport of goods, robbed the merchants and generally retarded the economic life of the province. Yet, the trade of Canton continued to thrive. It continued because on the little island of Shameen were foreign firms which kept the port open, which took goods in and out of the port, which maintained a financial stability in spite of the irregularities of the fiscal processes of the province. When the Chinese merchants in Canton shut their hongs as a protest against illegal taxation by the military leaders, they knew that the foreign hongs and foreign godowns were keeping trade alive in spite of adverse and oftimes impossible political conditions. The Chinese hong profited by these transactions, although it is extremely doubtful whether foreign firms have made any profits in Canton for some years.

It can be no secret that foreign firms have for years regarded Canton as a dying port—after the fashion of Chinkiang. From the premier port of China, it has come down to fifth place, contributing only 6.05 per cent. of the Maritime Customs Revenue for 1923. There has been a slight increase of trade during the past year which must be attributed to the successful operation of the revised import tariff, some Hk. Tls. 400,000 of the excess of Hk. Tls. 577,000 over 1922 falling under the heading of import duties. The increase in shipping is also not very important as the gains are due to the fact that native cargo is sent by steamer instead of native conveyances to avoid the dangers from the military and exactions of the officials.

It is obvious then that the trade of Canton is dependent, in present circumstances, upon the general movement of goods under foreign protection and the last remnant of stability which the foreign firms and foreign banks afford. It had been anticipated that under the modern régime instituted by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, young men, educated abroad, would develop trading firms which might, in time, take the place of some of the old foreign hongs on the Shameen. This has proved another chimera. The younger men have not proved as capable merchants as the old compradore, nor has their financial and business stability proved encouraging. Even here in Shanghai, the various trading companies organized by Chinese during 1919-1920 went smash during the ensuing slump, although none of them carried enormous obligations like those of the foreign firms which had operated during the war years. Of these Chinese firms surviving very few have proved themselves equal to the intricacies, the financial stability required in international trade. What great name can one mention off-hand in referring to a Chinese import and export house? The one, which comes easily to mind, is American-registered and is managed in New York.

Should then the foreign firms decide to close their hongs and leave the Shameen, what would happen? The trade of Canton would disappear, as the trade of Ningpo and Chinkiang has lessened with the advent of the greater Shanghai. The entire province of Kuangtung would become an economic hinterland of Kowloon and perhaps Lappa. For trade seeks stability; it seeks financial regularity and integrity. It must have order and peace. The unending political troubles in Canton and the irridentist movements on the Shameen drive trade away as surely as bad money drives out good money.

A STORM IN A SOVIET TEACUP

Aug. 21.

WHEN great ones of the earth fall out, especially when they use such very plain language to each other, common folk may well be allowed to laugh. Taken piece by piece in daily reports full of rather difficult words, the controversy over the Russian Legation may have appeared dry. Viewed as a whole, it reveals itself as a piece of comedy for which in these dull dog days we may well be grateful, from the time when Dr. Wellington Koo made an ingenious but defeated attempt to assert rights to dispose of property in Legation Quarter, down to M. Karakhan's outburst of bad temper, and, it must be added, bad manners—for there was no need for him to insult Mr. Yoshizawa, in the way reported in yesterday's telegrams, seeing that the Japanese Minister was no more responsible for the Note that he had passed on from Dr. Schurman than if he had been a postman delivering a letter; and as the Soviet Ambassador is actually in negotiation with Mr. Yoshizawa, out of whom presumably he hopes to get something, it was also surely very bad tactics on his part to be so rude.

The basis of the whole dispute is, of course, that, after the Boxer outbreak, the Legation Quarter was specially protected by the Protocol of 1901, set aside as the peculiar preserve of the Diplomatic Body, over which the Chinese Government has practically no rights. As Mr. Oudendijk, Doyen of the Diplomatic Body, put it in answering the Waichiaopu's note of June 27:—"From that time onward the properties within the limits of the Quarter have been subjected to international servitudes which bind the Chinese Government and the Governments signatory to the Protocol. The Chinese Government can only exercise or dispose the rights or properties of the Quarter within the limits fixed by these international servitudes." In 1920 when the Chinese Government broke off relationships with Prince Koudacheff, the former Russian Minister, the Diplomatic Body, in view of the Protocol, took charge of the Russian Legation and, again to quote Mr. Oudendijk: "The Chinese Government, when informed of this measure, declared that it would not be responsible to any party whatsoever for the safeguarding of the Russian Legation." Clearly, therefore, the charge of the Legation was doubly hedged about, first by the Protocol of 1901, and secondly by China's disclaimer of any responsibility for it in 1920.

On June 9, ten days after the announcement of the Sino-Soviet Agreement, M. Karakhan instructed the Waichiaopu to request the Diplomatic Body to hand over the Russian Legation to him. The Waichiaopu does not appear to have been at all reluctant to play the part of the cat pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for the monkey, because, if the Diplomatic Body handed over the Russian Legation to it, obviously it would have established a right to have some say in the management of property in the Quarter. The Diplomatic Body, however, were not to be caught. M. Oudendijk wrote back politely but firmly, that the disposal of the Legation was no concern of the Chinese Government, that the Diplomatic Body were responsible for it, and could only consider handing it over "if a request in that connexion should be addressed to them by the Diplomatic Representative duly accredited to the Chinese Government by the Russian Government." The annoying nature of this rebuff was accentuated by a request that Dr. Wellington Koo would lose no time in informing the Diplomatic Body who was this accredited Russian representative, in order that they might wash their hands of the Legation as quickly as possible.

On July 31 M. Karakhan presented his credentials to President Tsao Kun as Soviet Ambassador, and on the following day the Ministers of the Powers who had signed the Protocol of 1901—there were only eight of them originally, Great Britain, the United States, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Japan and Russia—met to discuss the situation. They had no difficulty in agreeing that the Legation must be handed over to M. Karakhan, and the note as reported in yesterday's issue, was duly drafted. In this note, however, it will be remembered, the Protocol Powers were careful to point out that, if the Soviet Government at some future time renounced its rights in the arrangement of 1901 (and there is of course no telling what the Soviet Government may or may not do at any moment) the Powers reserved to themselves "full liberty of action in respect of the effect of such renunciation." This very plain intimation that if the Soviet Government did not behave itself, it might find its ambassador put out of the Quarter again, would be quite enough to infuriate M. Karakhan. But worse was yet to come. An accompanying note was written by Dr. Schurman, senior member of the Protocol Ministers, to the effect that his acquiescence in the other note "in no way constituted or implied American recognition of 'the régime known as the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.'" These two communications were delivered on August 18. One imagines M. Karakhan dancing round his bedroom all night long, grinding his teeth, and occasionally stopping to relieve his feelings by smashing another piece of furniture or crockery. In the morning he sends for paper and ink, drafts one of the rudest messages to Mr. Yoshizawa that could well be imagined, and sends it over to the Japanese Legation accompanied by Dr. Schurman's detested missive.

The foreign policy of the United States Government does not, any more than that of other Powers, always meet with the approval of outside parties. But there can be no question that Dr. Schurman's message was not only justified but necessary. It is mere futility for M. Karakhan to say that the restoration of the Legation implies no act of recognition of Soviet Russia by America. Obviously it does not. But in China as she is to-day, Dr. Schurman, remembering his position as senior Protocol Minister, remembering also the respect and attention which the Chinese pay to American policy in the Far East, was bound to protect himself and his Government against the adroit uses to which Bolshevik propaganda agents in China might put the handing over of the Legation. No one can tell how these oily-tongued gentlemen might not misrepresent the matter as a special mark of favour paid by the American people to the Soviet Government. And of course it was most necessary for the United States Minister to make it plain that, though he might have to live next the Red Ambassador, he certainly would not meet him at dinner. It was equally necessary for the Protocol Powers to remind the Soviet representative that they would not stand any tampering with the integrity of Legation Quarter; for this is, as it were, a citadel to them, the importance of which both morally and materially is not to be underrated. It will be noticed that M. Karakhan kept the Note from the Protocol Ministers. Presumably, therefore, he means to enter into possession of his Legation, or, as it must now be called Embassy. But how the anticipated triumph of that entry has been shorn of all its glory!

THE NATIVE BANK FAILURE

Aug. 22.

NATURALLY the failure yesterday of four native banks was followed by all sorts of wild rumours. In the middle of the afternoon we were assured quite positively that all passenger and freight traffic had been shut off on the Shanghai-Nanking Railway to give way for the passage of troop trains. There is not one word of truth in the story as any scaremonger might have learnt by ringing up the railway station. As the report we print elsewhere to-day shows, the rumours of a possibility of fighting, such as come up every summer, had an indirect connexion with the bank failures. But they would really appear to have been overdue. There has been an orgy of gambling in Domestic Loans for some time past, here, in Tientsin and in Peking, as our correspondent in the latter city amusingly described a few weeks ago. Some of these so-called Chinese banks are mere cash shops which live, like the celebrated inhabitants of the Scilly Isles, by lending each other two dollars, and when the houses with real money at command shut off supplies, they went smash. It is a case of good riddance to bad rubbish, the lesson of which it is to be hoped, will not be lost.

But while war rumours have had little enough to do with the failure and will in all cases, we sincerely trust, be soberly received, it would be idle to pretend that they do not exist. Not quite a fortnight ago we published the first news of the displeasure excited in Marshal Wu Pei-fu by the retreat into Chêkiang from Fukien of two generals whom he does not like and of the Chinese expectation that he, Wu Pei-fu, would mobilize Tuchun Chi of Nanking to attack Tuchun Lu of Hangchow. Since then we have said no more on the subject, because the less publicity there is of such talk, the less danger of its being realized. Furthermore we feel confident in saying that neither Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan nor Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang wishes to fight. What people about them may want, what others at a distance may conspire, is another matter; and the influence of such as these, if only sufficient scare can be worked up, is not neglibible. But, after all, it is the Tuchun who moves troops about and we are sure that the two immediately concerned will realize the danger of giving substance to gossip by any such movement.

Less than a year has passed since Marshal Lu and Marshal Chi, acting under the pressure of public opinion, but we are sure not at all unwillingly themselves, signed a plenary peace agreement. That treaty has stood the strain even of the awkward question of the appointment of the Chief of Shanghai and Woosung Police and it would be cruel that it should break down because two fugitives from Fukien take refuge in Chêkiang. For eleven years there has been no fighting in Kiangsu and Chêkiang. They are among the best governed provinces in China. Their peoples are on the whole content and certainly not unprosperous and their Tuchuns are men of good and deserved repute. There is not one scrap of material benefit to any living soul in their going to war; there is, on the contrary a vast amount of misery and loss that must ensue. The general who fires the first shot will be guilty before his fellow-countrymen and before mankind of a heartless, dastardly crime. These facts are well known to the Tuchuns of Nanking and Hangchow and they are far too shrewd, not to mention motives of humanity, to fight against the logic of them.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

Aug. 22.

MANY people will have read with dissent, many with sympathy, all with respect, Mr. Harry Kingman's article in another column on why he does not play baseball on Sunday. And, perhaps one might venture a word of tribute for its simple sincerity and the very real sacrifice it implies. It is difficult to say more on the question of Sunday observance than Mr. Kingman has said; because, while he has no doubt at all what he himself ought to do and equally little as to what it is really best for others to do, he feels that each must be left free to make his own decision. And unless we are to return to methods of discipline which now seem almost mediæval, though they are strictly practised by the Roman Catholic Church, that is where we must all leave the matter.

Nevertheless the question of Sunday observance is exercising many people, neither Chadbands nor Sabbatarians. Very few, we suppose, really wish to go back to what Mr. Kingman calls the "blue, cheerless, painfully-pious" Sundays of the past. But from this to the total disregard of all religious practice in which vast numbers of people spend their Sundays, the recoil is too great. In a recent issue of the "Nineteenth Century" Bishop Frodsham discussed the so-called "Continental Sunday," showing that the idea which the words convey to English minds is quite untrue of the reality. He wrote particularly of Italy, where he felt bound to admit that Sunday was in general much more really kept than in England. The confusion of Sunday with the Hebrew seventh day abstention from any kind of doing not absolutely necessary, has never, Bishop Frodsham thinks, been made on the Continent. Sunday is a day for worship and praise and also for holiday-making and as such it presents a sympathetic spectacle to the unbiassed observer. From the present writer's experience, this is perfectly true of Italy. At first, it is almost a shock to see how easily and unconcernedly the Italians treat their religion and their churches. A peasant woman, coming into Rome to market, drops in to Santa Maria Maggiore almost as if it were a club, hears Mass, which is nearly always being said in one of the chapels and then stands about in the nave chatting with her friends for a few minutes on every-day affairs, before going on to work. But soon one realizes that religion is a part of the ordinary life of the people, not calling for any special parade, but certainly not without its influence upon them.

The present laxity as regards Sunday is, perhaps, rather to be regarded as a symptom than as a thing in itself, an expression of a phase in the life of mankind that will pass. The intensely depressing and wearisome nature of the average modern novel is due not so much to their authors' delusion that vigour and reality require them to load their pages with "swear words" and intimate descriptions of scenes once thought unprintable, but to their unrelieved materialism and apparently unquestioning acceptance of the principle that we must eat and drink for to-morrow we die. It must not be forgotten that the working classes had begun to stop going to church long before Sunday games became as general as they are now; and as Mr. Kingman's friend says, people are thus probably better employed in hitting a ball about or in watching others do so than they would otherwise be. Whether they are as genuinely happy as they might be, is another question. There was certainly never a time when nerves and restless dissatisfaction were as prevalent as now; and in spite of the common non-observance of Sunday, we venture to think that there is a far wider, though perhaps unconscious, demand for religion than appears on the surface. Biblical critics so called, no doubt with excellent intentions, have, we believe, done a great deal of harm, putting ideas into the air, of which the practical value, even if properly grasped, is questionable, while, when half apprehended, they are disastrously unsettling. With Mary, the layman might cry, "They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid Him." And in trying to meet the growing irreligion, clergymen have not, perhaps, always been very wise. People going to church do not want politics and science from the pulpit or, if the word may be forgiven, "stunts" in the service; and the man who preaches plain religion, even though not in the least a great orator, can still fill his church without the adventitious aid of novelties and diversions. One thing may be said. If religion appears weak in its appeal to-day, it is not sunk half as low as in eighteenth century England; and it is to be remembered that the world is still very sick and shaken from the Great War, so that it cannot think normally of anything and the deepest, most abiding desires of man are temporarily obscured by fretful caprice.

THE HANTAN TABLET

Aug. 23

DURING the spring, the rain-producing iron tablet was brought from its resting place in Hantanhsien, Chihli Province, to Peking and later to other places, to bring rain to a parched and arid countryside. A fearful drought was anticipated. For months there had been no rain; the ground was hard, dry and burning under the unrelieved glare of pitiless sun. Processions preceded the tablet as it was brought from temple to temple, and civil officials gathered about it in awe and hopefulness. Then the rain fell. It fell in torrents, rivers overflowed their banks, and cities were inundated. From Tientsin to Paotingfu the country became a lake, Kalgan was visited by a dire flood, millions of people became homeless, millions of dollars were irretrievably lost and thousands of lives were taken.

Did the tablet work its wonders? Were the prayers answered? Were the gods extravagant in granting the wishes of their votaries? Are the floods the answer of the dragons? It is difficult to believe that in this century one must ask these questions. Yet, they are uppermost in the minds of the thousands of superstitious people who believed that the rain came by divine intervention and that the bit of iron which was taken from place to place was their intermediary. Thousands believe that in North China to-day. Thousands will point with pride, that the superstitions of China are truer than the religions of the West, truer than the science of the West, because the tablet brought rain when otherwise there must have been drought. Thousands will refuse to believe that the rain might have come without the aid of the tablet, that the forces of nature work orderly and that, had the almost desert wastes of North China been afforested, there would have been rain without flood, there would have been a natural agency for collecting the waters as they fell to the ground. Yet, how can one make these people who have themselves witnessed the efficacy of the tablet believe that the planting of trees can do any good when the tablet has already proved its efficacy?

The accidental confirmation of superstitions by natural phenomena has been one of the greatest impediments to human progress. The Hebrews fasted to prevent a drought, believing that that would appease the angry heavens. In some countries in Europe the peasants have curious dances to insure the growth of large crops. In other places, there are ceremonies denoting the driving of death out of the villages to assure a good season. The persons who believe in these primitive customs remember only the occasions when their folk habits brought them the desired results. They do not note the years when nature steadily moves her way across fields and orchards, bringing rich and bountiful crops. They forget the years when drought or flood destroys their crops in spite of a strict adherence to their superstitious customs, vestiges of another and earlier day in the history of the human race. Only the marvellous day is recalled when such a tablet as that at Hantanhsien is propitiated and the prayer is answered. It is like the Western superstition that a change of the moon affects the weather. We note and remember the times when two such changes coincide, but overlook the hundreds of occasions when the new "quarter," gradually approaching day by day, is registered, but without any alteration in the weather.

Those who are concerned with the enlightenment of the Chinese people now are faced with a most serious problem—that of undoing the harm arising from the accidental confirmation of the power of the tablet. They will have to fight the dragon of ignorance and primitive superstition with all their energy and learning. For as men come to believe in the efficacy of a piece of iron, so may they believe that metals must remain in the bowels of the earth to appease a dragon or that secret society members are invulnerable to the modern machine-gun and its bullets. In a word, superstition blinds the eye. It leaves its victims without the capacity to reason. It makes it difficult for them to understand that knowledge is power and that there can be no development of a great and prosperous national life in the modern world without science and its practical applications.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Floods and Afforestation

The phenomenal floods in North China must cause Chinese to realize that unless something is done by their central and provincial governments in the way of reafforestation in the northern provinces, thousands, if not millions, of their countrymen will lose their lives every time nature is especially generous in its rain supply. These floods would not have happened had the northern provinces had large wooded areas, such as exist in European countries. China has organized conservancy commissions, which have been entrusted with huge funds, much of which, particularly in Chihli province, were to have been spent on forestry work. The floods of several years ago, when Tientsin was inundated, caused widespread alarm. Yet, within a few years, the reason for the organization of these commissions was forgotten and now we have a repetition of those causes. This time, however, the floods are more widespread, are doing greater damage and are affecting a larger number of people. It is impossible to believe that the officials of China and of the provinces can disregard their responsibility at such a time. Relief funds will be raised, but that will not save the situation. What is required is scientific and constant reafforestation, the covering of North China with trees, the guarding of those trees against vandalism—the saving of the people from floods.

Keeping Young

"Surgeon," whose letter appears in to-day's correspondence columns, has written briefly but very strongly, a policy which always may be recommended, but which does not necessarily carry final conviction. He asserts that vasoligation was described many years ago, investigated thoroughly and discarded, but that is no proof that the rejection of it was not an error. In the early days of the war, the Lewis gun was investigated and discarded, but very fortunately for the British Army there was another investigation later on and then Lewis guns could not be manufactured sufficiently quickly. Might it not also be the same with vasoligation, especially in view of the fact that a very considerable body of evidence has been collected in support of it, including the living evidence of rejuvenated elderly men? It was stated in our article that Professor Chetwood performed vasoligation many years ago with lesser objects in view, and that after Professor Steinach's discoveries were published he reviewed his cases and found that the results obtained corroborated Professor Steinach. He had done the same thing, but not for the same purpose. Most remarkable things are scoffed at when first brought to public notice, and not infrequently the later developments in a science are more wonderful than the first discovery. Edison and the early pioneers in electricity were styled "wizards," but they did not dream of wireless telegraphy and telephony and it may rightly be said that Marconi and other inventors of to-day have surpassed Edison. Col. Cody was scoffed at and his strange flying machine was treated as a joke, but eventually it won a War Office prize, and see what has developed from it! Vaccination once was scoffed at, and still is by many, but its efficacy has been well established. Vasoligation may have been discarded 20 years ago, but is it not possible that it has successfully defended itself since then?

The Eyes of the Law

The many little comforts which the O. C. Luxuries (Police) continues to heap upon members of the force soon will make service therein something eagerly to be sought after. Not so very long ago he took away the old-fashioned Chinese hats from all the police except a few veterans who are allowed to sleep away their remaining days under the Magistrate's desk in the Mixed Court, but not being satisfied with the cheese-cutter millinery that took their place, he discarded this also and gave them helmets. To balance this favour the Sikhs were decorated with khaki and blue turbans instead of the old red. Next the Chinese police on night point duty were draped in long white kennel coats and the Sikhs in summer-weight linen Sam Brownes. It was a happy day when someone issued a few miles of braid for the foreign inspectors and sub-inspectors to stitch on the cuffs of their tunics, for hitherto they appeared to have been ignored. For a time the O. C. Luxuries rested, but the storekeeper at the depot now has had to open a new book in which he keeps stock of "Goggles, sun, Sikh and Chinese P. C." The ricsha coolies were awestruck last Sunday when they noted all the pointsmen arrayed in sun-goggles and it was satisfactory to see the careful distinction that has been made. The Chinese wear big round glasses, tortoiseshell rimmed, of the nature affected by earnest scholars, whose eyes are focussed directly on their books, whilst the Sikhs, no doubt as a tribute to their sporting nature, have been given the side-flap type, suitable to men ever on the move, looking this way and that for a flying ball or a menacing opponent, and catching the sun at all angles. Yet perhaps it is not the glare of the sun that is the cause of the issue of sun-goggles. Maybe the installation of so many warning lights in Nanking Road is responsible. Incidentally it may be mentioned that motorists are complaining that the lights just put up at Honan Road, Fokien Road and Tibet Road crossings all are masked at certain points by the tram shelters and therefore are useless. This should be attended to immediately.

Church Unions

Reuter reports from Ottawa that the Church Union Bill, uniting the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational Churches of Canada, has passed its final stages in Parliament and thus another effort at union among the sects of the Christian Church has been consummated. The Inter-Church Movement, which some years ago was organized in the United States to achieve such a union, failed largely through the doctrinal differences amongst the American churches. The possibility of a better understanding between the Anglican and Russian churches was impeded by the aftermath of the war, the revolution in Russia and the attendant difficulties of the Russian church. The effort of Christians to meet together on the common ground of Christianity, to overlook or even forget the differences which gave rise to sectarianism, continues in many places. The historic origins of the various sects of the Christian Church are often disregarded by those who oppose union, and the genealogy of a sect is sometimes found altogether outside the sphere of religion. Yet, men continue to cling to the name of their particular form of Christianity as though the substance were nothing and the outward garb everything. The union of the Canadian churches is a step in the direction of a still greater union—that of all Christians in the faith of the Founder.

S. N. Ry. Bonds

London newsspapers of July 28 just received contain an important announcement of a definite agreement made between the Chinese Government and the British and Chinese Corporation, Limited, as trustees for the bondholders, under which the former will exercise its option to redeem the Shanghai-Nanking Railway Five per Cent. Sterling Loan of 1904. The loan, which amounts to £2,900,000, is redeemable in 50 years from June 1903; but the Chinese Government has the option to redeem on six months' notice, up to the first 25 years, at 10½ per cent., and after 25 years at par. In explanation the "Daily Chronicle" says:—

> Under the agreement now come to, which has been sanctioned by the High Court in this country (i.e. Great Britain), the Chinese Government will redeem the bonds at par by 25 equal annual drawings, commencing in June 1929 and terminating in June 1953. The amortization of the bonds will be at the rate of £116,000 annually.
> The funds required for the redemption of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway Loan will be derived from the Chinese Government's four-fifths share of the net profits of the railway, and will be set aside by the Railway Administration annually, and deposited with the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation. In the event of the Government's share of net profits in any one year being insufficient to produce the required amount, the deficiency will be made good by the Government.
> The agreement also provides for setting aside annually from the Government's share of net profits $250,000, to be used for capital expenditure or to serve as security for short-term advances from the corporation for expenditure on capital work required by the railway to increase its earning capacity.

It is curious that Reuter did not, so far as we recall, report this agreement, unless it went into that Commercial Service which absorbs so much which the news sheets ought to get. The financial arrangements, so far as the Chinese Government is concerned, may raise a smile. How will the Railway Administration make sure of its money? Twice in the past few years it is notorious that dividends have had to be paid by outside assistance, so cruelly does Peking milk the railways. The S. N. R. is an admirable property, excellently managed, earning good money. It could easily earn a great deal more if it were not consistently starved of the extra plant it urgently needs. Perhaps Peking will mend its ways before the date of first redemption—five years off still. Perhaps the British & Chinese Corporation thought so. Touching faith!

The Labour-Soviet Treaty

If the Russian accounts of the treaty signed between the British Labour Cabinet and the Soviet are to be believed, it becomes more and more incomprehensible how Mr. MacDonald ever consented to it. When the signature was announced the Foreign Commissariat of Moscow published a jubilant statement of which the following is worth quoting:—

> The Soviet, whilst insisting on the maintenance of the decrees nationalizing big industry and cancelling debts, consent as quite an exceptional matter to give partial satisfaction to British subjects on condition that the British Government will grant a loan, the British claims being covered by the amount of the loan, the balance of which will be devoted to Russian reconstruction. Concessions eventually to be granted to tht former holders of nationalized property will be based on a strict business calculation, and will not be handed over unless really advantageous to the Soviet Republic."

The same note is struck at a plenary meeting of the Moscow Soviet, reported to-day, with even more distinctness. Comrade Rakovsky, the chief delegate to London, contended, > that the Agreement did not infringe the laws of the Soviet with regard to nationalization and annulment of debts while Soviet Russia had only to pay claims which were recognized as advantageous to itself or for which social justice demanded compensation. He predicted ratification of the Treaty because otherwise property owners and bond holders would get nothing.

It does not look as if "big industry" in Britain were going to get much out of this bargain. Who would get anything out of it, but the Soviet, which has some of its debts to Britain paid with a British loan, guaranteed by the British Government (at least that is the notion) and repudiates all the rest? And what, one wonders, is to prevent the Soviet from repudiating this debt too, when it has got the money? Certainly no sense of decency or honour on its part, for that it does not possess. Mercifully none of these astounding arrangements is yet final. The whole of the treaty is still subject to approval, alteration or rejection by Parliament, which has shown its opinion of it unmistakeably.

War Scares

Every summer war rumours fill the minds of those who find no other madness to think about. War between Chêkiang and Kiangsu is perennially discussed and never seems to come off. As a matter of fact, no one wants the war to happen, perhaps no one less that Marshall Chi Hsieh-yuan and General Lu Yung-hsiang, for both are comfortably placed in their respective yamêns and neither could support himself against the opposition of the people of his province. The gentry of Chêkiang and Kiangsu are bitterly opposed to a war between their respective Tuchuns and have required both to sign an agreement of peace. There is only one serious outstanding issue at the present time between Nanking and Hangchow, namely, the appointment of the Chief of the Shanghai Constabulary to succeed the late General Hsu Kuo-liang and surely that is not an issue over which two clever and apparently well-intentioned governors will make war. Shanghai, the heart of the two provinces, represents too much in wealth and vested interest to the Chinese of both provinces to permit any war to transpire within its environs and a war distant from Shanghai probably would be inconclusive and surely insufficiently spectacular to win acclaim for either general. Lu Yung-hsiang is the only survivor of the Anfu Tuchuns and therefore has much to be thankful for, while Chi Hsieh-yuan has gone far in the Chihli party, in spite of his comparative youth. Neither can afford to risk the possibility of defeat and loss of position, and therefore neither will risk a war, unless drawn into it by a greater struggle among all the forces of militarism in China.

The Good Old Days

Our contemporary, the "Hongkong Telegraph," has been comparing the days of old with the present time and, having considered such disadvantages as lack of sewage systems, bad (if any) drainage, absence of labour-saving devices, bad morals, dungeons, ignorance, medical and other superstitions, and so on, that obtained in the days of our forefathers, against the advantages, comforts and amenities that characterize existence in these modern times, comes strongly to the conclusion that it has no desire to set back the hands of the clock of time, and that the best frame of mind for us all is to regard the present as the best of all times. That is no doubt more than true, for few of us would care to be deprived of most of the things that the best developments of science, industry and civilization have given us; but none the less there are occasions when some of us, having maybe been tried and tested beyond endurance, would care for some of the blessings of modern civilization to be eliminated from our lives, as in the days of yore before they came into being. One can appreciate the days of old—in the abstract—in that in those times there were no saxophones, gramophones (owned by next-door neighbours) or telephones; no Fords, brokers' traps or bicycles; no jazz with its jazz-gymnastics; no chits and therefore no shroffs; no tramcars (species Shanghai); no Bolsheviks and no commercial politicians; no newspapers . . . But enough!

Trams and Bluff

The Tramway Company has perpetrated another of its merry jests. It must be admitted that the present Council, as judged by recent happenings, is taking the tramway problem as a really serious matter, but unfortunately, as has been the case with all its predecessors, it appears to be too much inclined to allow the company to argue, instead of saying bluntly, "Do as you are told," and seeing that it is done. When the bother about riding on the steps was at its height the Tramway Company posted notices on the cars warning offenders that they were liable to prosecution, and the notices invariably were obscured by the people who continued to ride on the steps without hindrance. The Company's answer to the Council's demand that overcrowding shall cease is more notices as to the number of people allowed in a car, but one would like to hear of a single instance of a company's servant compelling excess passengers to dismount. The Company's announcement is not easily understandable and it is not clear whether the notices refer to compartments or whole cars, but it is very evident that it is iniquitous to allow even six people to travel on the platforms. That is one of the very worst of the many tramcar nuisances, for how can people get in or out of a car in comfort, with safety and in the shortest possible time, with six people blocking a platform? It is absurd.

The Consortium

Our London correspondent sends us an interesting letter, indicating that there are differences of opinion within the Consortium and that its continued existence is by no means so certain as the resolution passed at the London conference would suggest. The cause of difference appears to be that the British Group wish for freedom of action in respect of loans that might be necessary for railways built with British capital, for example the Shanghai-Nanking and the southern section of the Tientsin-Pukou. The French bankers oppose this; they have no such interests in China likely to need further capital and although they do not appear to be in a position to lend much money abroad, and, we are told, would even have to borrow elsewhere in order to partake in any loan in this part of the world, there would be profits even in that transaction and more particularly prestige, not lightly to be thrown away. The point at issue is a difficult one. The Consortium was formed to put a stop to the orgy of petty loans that raged during the last year or two of the war, which impoverished Chinese finances and did nobody any good but a number of Chinese officials. And there was considerable difficulty in perfecting the organization of the Consortium, because Japan wished to exclude from its operation Manchuria and portions of Mongolia. If freedom of action is asserted for, say, railways built before the Consortium came into being, its integrity will soon be undermined for other less defensible purposes, the Consortium becomes a dead letter and once more officials will make merry with the financial bagmen. At the same time, it is absurd that if a railway, the construction of which was obtained by the British in fair competition with other nations, wants more money, it should be allowed to get it only in international markets. Of course if the Ministry of Communications would refrain from milking every railway of every penny of its profits, it would earn ample money for all its developments. But the Ministry is not likely to do that to please the Consortium, which is peculiarly disliked in Peking.

The Drought

Unless rain comes soon in this part of the country there will certainly be an appeal to charity on behalf of drought sufferers. A recent journey through a part of Chêkiang revealed a sad state of affairs. What are usually deep, wide creeks are now but a thread of stagnant water between high arid mud banks. Mountain streams, which should feed an endless network of little rivulets to distribute water among the rice fields, were for the most part dry, with here and there acupful of water among the stones. The rice-fields alongside waterways too big to be seriously affected, and whence water can be pumped up by the treadmill, looked well enough. They were the measure of the backwardness of other fields less happily situated. The soil, which should be practically liquid mud, is caked and hard, the rice stunted in height and hardly any grain on it. Even if rain comes now, the harvest cannot be more than a fraction of its proper amount. Part of the journey had to be taken by launch, but at one point the water is so low that the launch cannot get through and one must tranship to native houseboat, which lengthens the water journey by a full three hours. It is curious how quickly and irresistibly China lays hold of us. Everybody knows those up-country friends who arrive at our busiest moments, settle themselves tranquilly and prepare to spend a pleasant afternoon in conversation as if there were nothing else to do on the face of the world. They have acquired the Chinese habit of mind, for which time does not exist and next week is the same as to-morrow. As soon as we get away from the rush of treaty ports, we begin to understand them. When first we change from launch to houseboat we chafe horribly at the slowness of movement, shout at the laodah, demand more yulohs, offer large cumshas for another li a day. Which troubles the boatmen not at all. Gradually the calm, unhurried temperament of China descends upon us, laps us gently but inexorably about, stills our fretfulness, blunts our sense of time; and presently we are sitting on the deck as indifferent to considerations of to-day, to-morrow, next century as everything in the landscape about us—"counting the strokes and forgetting the hundreds, the happiest animals" in China. Of course fine weather is rather necessary to the acquisition of so much contentedness. But then if it rained, conditions would be quite different, because the launch would get through. One wishes it would, not for the speeding up of the journey so much as for the poor anxious farmer.

"Tu Quoque"

If the whole affair were not comparatively serious and fringed with unpleasant possibilities, there would be something humorous in the situation which has arisen in regard to U.S. vessels visiting French ports. Briefly, the facts are that American "President" vessels are now calling regularly at Marseilles, and while the first three or four of the ships were allowed to pass without submitting to inspection by French officials, it is understood that the owners have been notified that in future vessels calling at French ports must comply with the requirements of the French Bureau Veritas. As such an inspection, for classification, usually entails a ship being completely unloaded and going into dry-dock, considerable delay and expense are incurred. The matter appears to have been taken up seriously in U.S. shipping circles, and one prominent U.S. shipping official, in discussing the matter with a press representative, said that the situation is indeed a delicate one and needs to be handled diplomatically. He considers that American shipping men are justified in their opinion that this refusal on the part of the French authorities to recognize the classification of the American Bureau of Shipping is tantamount to discrimination against American ships. Now we come to another side of the question: Four years ago there was passed in the U.S. a world-famous measure known popularly as the "Jones Act," from the name of its parent and sponsor, Senator Wesley Jones. In that Act are several sections (No. 28 has been in the public eye and mind during recent months: Section 34 caused a great outcry some four years ago) the application of which would constitute definite discrimination against foreign ships in favour of American ones. This was pointed out by many and the opinion freely expressed that foreign countries might retaliate. The very idea was laughed at. And now, with the first sign of discrimination against American vessels, the Shipping Board is making a protest and threatening retaliation. We cannot here do better than quote a comment on this subject by the "Nautical Gazette," one of the most influential, far-sighted and patriotic shipping journals in the U.S. This is what our contemporary says: "Regardless of the merits of Section 28 and kindred clauses of the Jones Act, and regardless of the wisdom of discriminating against foreign vessels, let the Shipping Board bear the present experience in France in mind when next it begins to think about the imposition of discriminatory duties and preferential rates. The French incident only serves to show what foreign countries can do in the way of retaliation for discrimination against their ships, and this retaliation is no bugaboo. Retaliation is a very real monster whose wrath American ships cannot afford to incur."

Many Masters in Canton

To-day's news of the ending of the strike at Canton might be more detailed, but appears satisfactory so far as it goes. The main point was that the police must not be reinstated and that point the foreign authorities of Shameen have successfully upheld. They have won and the whole community of Shameen are most heartily to be congratulated on their stubborn and successful stand against the Communist agitators' attempt to intimidate them. The importance of the conflict cannot be overrated both from the viewpoint of the foreigner and of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. In their struggle with the latter, the Communists clearly had the weight of public opinion against them, the losses to Chinese trade resulting from the strike being enormous. But the situation in Canton is decidedly interesting. There is the Constitutional Government of Dr. Sun and his friends; there are the Communists who, for two or three days, thought themselves strong enough to defy Dr. Sun; and there are the Merchants Volunteers, who include, according to a letter on the opposite page, not only the parent body in Canton, but branches in 120 villages and towns of the province and who feel themselves strong enough to threaten a general strike if their arms and ammunition are not handed over to them. These movements are of the deepest interest. The Tuchuns began by defying Peking, the bureaucracy defy the Tuchuns and now the people begin to defy both. In the break-up of all ordered government what complaint have the ruling classes against the populace? It is they who taught it the way of anarchy.

CHINA has been invited to send delegates to the International Telegraph Conference at Paris next spring.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

SEIZURE OF ARMS IN CANTON

Norwegian Steamer Ransacked by Government Troops Without Protest

Canton, Aug. 13.

Chen Lien-pei and Chen Kun-shou, Commander and Vice-Commander, respectively, of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, have fled to Hongkong. Company commanders have resigned en bloc today.

In connexion with the detention of the Norwegian str. Hav, there is a positive proof that on the 10th instant, Ying Tieh-cheng, Chief of the Public Peace Bureau at Canton, addressed a Note to the captain of the steamer, threatening to fire on her if he disobeyed the order.

Yesterday, some 1,500 members of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps forced their way to Dr. Sun's General Headquarters in order to negotiate with him regarding the transfer of the seized arms and ammunition. After his interview with representatives of the Volunteer Corps, Dr. Sun made an appearance before the assemblage. The latter withdrew soon afterwards. In celebration of the establishment of the United Headquarters of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, crackers are being fired all over the city and Merchants' Volunteers are making a demonstration.

As the Canton authorities, without orders from the Harbour Master, arbitrarily arrested the Hav which had entered the Canton port after going through legal formalities, the Consular Body here, in compliance with the request of the Norwegian Consul, have taken the matter up and it has been decided to refer the case to the Diplomatic Body.—Eastern News Agency.

Canton, Aug. 14.

The Norwegian steamer Hav, which is being detained at Whampoa and which is under supervision by the Chinese warship Yungfeng, was attacked yesterday by troops on board over 20 junks and all the arms and ammunition as well as two packages of goods to be discharged at Hongkong were carried away by these troops. Owing to intimidation by these troops, the captains and crews of the Chinese warship Yungfeng and the Norwegian steamer Hav were at a loss how to prevent the troops from looting, and merely allowed them to do as they pleased. It is still unknown to which faction these troops belong.

Later.

The authorities of the Canton Government explain that the reason why the arms and ammunition were discharged from the Hav, ignoring the protest from the captain of the steamer, was that instructions were received from Dr. Sun and that they are now being stored for protection, and are not confiscated, within the premises of the Canton Military School. With regard to the transfer of the said arms and ammunition, declare the Canton authorities, they will give a definite answer by Tuesday next. The Merchants' Volunteer Corps has petitioned the Canton Government to allow its Commander, Chen Lien-pei, who has fled to Hongkong, to return to Canton, as the Commander has nothing to do with politics.

Aug. 15.

The controversy between the Canton Government and the Merchants' Volunteer Corps over the arms question has attracted the attention of all quarters and the public is attaching much importance to the point at issue. It is noteworthy that labour organizations here have decided to support the Government and issued circular telegrams to that effect. It is reported, in this connexion, that in going over to the side of the Government, the labour organizations have ambition to receive a portion of the arms and ammunition which they intend to use when their scheme for the organization of a Labourers' Volunteer Corps has been put in force.—Eastern News Agency.

Shameen, Aug. 16.

Mr. Chan Lim-pak, the compradore of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank and the Chairman of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, has tendered his resignation as head of the Merchant Volunteers owing, it is alleged, to the Government detaining the Norwegian steamer Hav, with 10,000 rifles and pistols. It is stated that the manifest was altered after departure from Antwerp from machinery to arms and ammunition. The Government will hold the shipment until is is proved that all the arms were ordered by the Merchant Volunteers.—Reuter.

Chinese Merchants' Protest: Importation Said to be Quite Legitimate

Peking, Aug. 16.

With reference to the action of the Canton authorities which sent a gunboat to the Norwegian steamer Hav on the latter's arrival in Canton waters and by threats induced the Hav to proceed to Whampoa, according to unofficial reports reaching Peking, the Merchants Volunteer Corps at Canton on August 13 and the Canton Chinese Chamber of Commerce sent a telegram to the Diplomatic Body at Peking pointing out that there was a danger of the arms and ammunition falling into the hands of people who were not favourable to the early restoration of peace in China. The Volunteer Corps and the Chamber of Commerce state that they legally obtained permission to import the arms and ammunition on the Hav, for the purpose of defending property and maintaining their organization, and they trusted that the Diplomatic Body would not fail to understand the position, for they had not violated any international undertakings.

On August 12 2,000 members of the Volunteer Corps assembled at the headquarters of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, requested him to hand over the arms and ammunition to them and threatened to shut up all the shops and stores in Canton.

Representatives of the Chamber of Commerce and the Volunteer Corps, numbering 132, held a meeting also on August 12, as the result of which the Canton Government was informed that the volunteers would fight against the Canton Government if the arms and ammunition were confiscated.

According to various reports the arms on the Hav are of German manufacture, they were shipped from Belgium. It is thought that the foreign Powers may think it necessary to take some action over the case.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Volunteer Corps Concentrating at Foushan in Case of Emergency

Canton, Aug. 19.

Apropos of the arms question, Dr. Sun Yat-sen is expected to give the Government's reply to the Merchants' Volunteer Corps regarding the transfer of the arms and ammunition. In the meantime, the Merchants' Volunteer Corps has removed its headquarters to Foushan in the suburbs of Canton where its forces are being concentrated to prepare against an emergency. In case the Government fails to give a reply satisfactory to the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, it is likely that a general strike will be carried out throughout the City of Canton In view of the these circumstances the Government has stationed military guards under the command of General Wu Tieh-cheng at important points in the city and the situation here is begining to assume a grave aspect.—Eastern News Agency.

M. Nemon, who is stated to be a journalist, and A. Clias, an artist, two Russians who left Peking on July 19 on a walk round the world, reached Hankow on August 14. They were only 24 days on the road, although many difficulties were encountered due to floods. At one place, where a bridge had been carried away, the pair swam across a river in flood—a dangerous feat that nearly cost them their lives. From Hankow they will proceed to Canton and thence to Saigon and Calcutta, following a direct route to Europe almost along the same line as that taken by the world fliers.

THE VOLUNTEERS OF KUANGTUNG

Amalgamation of Provincial Bodies Under Canton Headquarters

From Our Own Correspondent.

Canton, Aug. 11.

The Kuangtung Merchants' Volunteer Corps, an amalgamation of volunteer organizations in the province, with a central command now in Canton, will be formally inaugurated on August 13, notwithstanding the attempt of the Canton Government, now controlled by the Labour element and Communists, to mar public interest and enthusiasm in the self-defence movement by having issued an order instructing that the former status quo of the Canton Corps shall not be modified until the proposed regulations governing similar forces in Kuangtung are promulgated. It is also of interest to note that the recently organized Traders' Union of Canton, an association of more than 5,000 business firms, which was ordered by the Canton Mayor on August 6 to be dissolved, for having failed to register in advance, and as it conflicted with the functions of the General Chamber of Commerce, appears to be functioning as usual and is asking all shops in the city to declare next Wednesday a holiday.

Reflexion on Government.

The "Seventy-two Commercial Guilds' Commercial Journal," of Canton, in its editorial of August 9, says the action of the Civil Governor in discouraging the volunteer movement is uncalled for. That the volunteer organizations in their several individual bodies have been legally recognized no one will question, and it should violate no law when they come together under a central command. Moreover, the right to assemble in the Republic of China is guaranteed by the Constitution. Of course, the necessity for such a movement, and the enthusiasm shown by the people reflect unfavourably on the incompetence of the existing government. At the same time, as the corps is composed purely of Cantonese, it will form the only trustworthy force the Canton Government will have, should the mercenaries whom Dr. Sun Yat-sen has brought into Canton from eight different outside provinces decide to encroach upon the Kumingtang.

120 Towns and Cities.

The resolution of the volunteer corps of the 120 towns and cities joining the movement to amalgamate was passed at a conference held in Canton on May 27, and the central command of the movement was created a few days afterward. The inauguration of the movement on August 13 will be but a formal affair, in which the commanding officers and staffs will inspect a parade. The chief officers are Mr. Chan Lim-pak (Chinese Agent of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation in Canton and a former president of the Canton General Chamber of Commerce, and is commander-in-chief of the Provincial Corps), and Messrs. Chan Kungshau and Tang Kai-she, lieutenant commander-in-chief. Mr. Chan Lim-pak and Mr. Tang Kai-shek are colonels commanding the Canton Merchants' Volunteers, while Mr. Chan Kungshau is a colonel commanding the Fatshan volunteers.

Well-founded Distrust.

The work for the Canton Delta Flood Relief is now in the hands of the volunteers, aided by the Hongkong General Chinese Chamber of Commerce and the Tung Wah Hospital. It is significant that Chinese overseas are remitting relief funds to the volunteer officials instead of to the Government officials, who may be ousted at any moment and are liable to carry the funds with them in present circumstances.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mr. Harvey A. Franck, the traveller, will return to America in the autumn, after wandering about Southern China for half a year. He writes his publishers, the Century Company, that he has been decorated by the King of Luang Prabang. The official bestowal came in a bamboo waterproof holder, and it permitted Mr. Franck to purchase his own decoration, which he did, for 140 francs, in a French general shop in Hanoi!

CANTON AFRAID OF THE VOLUNTEERS

Movement Spreading All Over Kuangtung with Central Command in Southern Capital

From a Correspondent.

Canton.

The Cantonese as a people and provincial unit are not divided, in spite of a division among the political leaders. The Merchants Volunteer Corps of Swatow, a port controlled by Gen. Chen Chiung-ming, has on August 3 decided to join forces with the 120 other volunteer bodies recently amalgamated with a Central Command in Canton. That the Cantonese are tired of their present political leaders no one who has watched recent happenings in South China will deny. In spite of an order from the Canton Civil Governor a few days ago expressing disapproval of the changing status of the volunteer movement, the united corps, known as the Kuangtung Provincial Merchants' Volunteer Corps, has been formally inaugurated. Official disapproval of the movement is quite natural, as it reflects upon the present incompetence of the government. Moreover, the leaders of the movement, in plain terms, have said that the people of Kuangtung will no longer permit the militarists to have their own way. In Kaukong, an important town along the West River, the volunteers have ousted Dr. Sun Yat-sen's mercenaries from the business section and are still driving them from the territory.

Sale of Opium now Unrestricted

Dr. Sun Yat-sen having failed to pay them, the mercenaries in Canton are openly selling opium by advertising in the local papers like any other legitimate business. The former Opium Suppression Bureau in Canton is now a regular agent for distributng this drug. A notice in the principal journals of Canton states that agency commenced selling the drug on August 8.

Part of the relief funds being raised by the Hongkong Chinese for the benefit of the sufferers in the recently flooded districts of Canton Delta may be used for the repair of certain damaged dykes. A delegation of Hongkong Chinese visited Canton on August 8, They were welcomed on landing by the chief commander of the Kuangtung Merchants' Volunteer Corps, which has undertaken to do relief work. Nearly $150,000 has been raised and turned over to the Canton committee for relief by Hongkong Chinese in the last few weeks. The contributions received within the last week from Hongkong include some 2,000 sacks of rice sent in four different consignments since August 6, and also 212 sacks of rice,(38,200 catties in all), six sacks of cooked or baked rice, dried vegetables, fish and shrimps cakes and biscuits, medicine, and $267.40, (Hongkong currency), from post office employees.

Govt.'s Confiscation of Lands

During the last six months the Canton property owners have paid more than $800,000 to the deeds inspection department of Canton Municipality in the form of fees, notwithstanding the frequent violation of the spirit and order of Dr. Sun to relieve the people of the anxiety and fear of having to be called upon to hand in their deeds for examination within a short period to be declared defective or technically wrong somewhere and then confiscated. Since the offer of the people to have their deeds examined voluntarily, the Canton Mayor has not ceased in his constant tracking down of helpless people for unlawful possession of land. The excuse advanced for the revival of this heartless and heartrending proceedings is that many property owners have failed to submit their deeds for inspection and pay the required fees, and that many of these deeds must be defective, otherwise their owners will not object to their being inspected. According to the Mayor's order, lands of defective deeds will be confiscated and sold through the Municipal Department of Public Finance.

Tax on Cosmetics

The latest tax to be imposed upon the residents of Canton is a 10 per cent. stamp duty on the sale of cosmetics amounting to $10 or more per case or transaction. This tax will be collected for the Municipal Department of Finance by a syndicate, Wing Sing Kung Shee, which has farmed out the tax for collection at a guaranteed return of $2,000 a month. The Municipality once attempted to impose this form of tax, but it was then opposed by the merchants and in a time when the labour element of the city had not been enlisted to the support of the government through the labour division of the Kuomintang Political Party.

The joint financial bureau of the three principal hordes of mercenary troops in Canton the Yunnanese, Kuangsi-ites, and Hunanese, has decided on a war tax on passenger and freight receipts of the junks and two-boats plying on the principal rivers in sections of this province actually under the control of Dr. Sun Yet-sen. This tax was imposed once last May by the Yunnanese mercenary commanders, but it was successfully averted by a strike of the ship-owners. This time three army units worked together to oppress the Cantonese shipping merchants and travellers, and there is on doubt that it could be averted this time.

UNSECURED BANKNOTES IN CANTON

Canton, Aug. 12.

Canton will soon be again flooded with unsecured paper money. The Central Bank of China, authorized by the General Headquarters of Dr. Sun Yat-sen in Canton, will commence business on August 15 with $10,000,000 capital. This capital has been raised through the issue of Government bonds, which has been fully subscribed, according to press reports from Canton. As the financial agent of the Government in Canton, the Central Bank will have the sole privilege of floating foreign and domestic bonds for industrial purposes, issuing banknotes, and acting as the treasury of the Government in all receipts and disbursements. The managing director, two assistant managing-directors, the chairman and eight members of the board of directors, and a supervisior will all be appointed by the General Headquarters of Dr. Sun Yet-sen. It is understood that many million dollars' worth of banknotes have been printed, and Dr. Sun's picture is on the centre of each. The denominations of the notes are $1, $5, $10, $100, and $500. Mr. Soong, a brother of Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, has been appointed managing-director of the new bank with Mr. Lum Lai-sang, a Japanese subject, as one of the assistant managing-directors.

Whether or not the public will honour the proposed bank notes of the Central Bank is not known. It appears that the Cantonese are tired of the paper money which, it is feared, the Government itself may be the first to repudiate later on. It is remembered that when Mr. T. T. Cheng, managing-director, and Mr. Yung Hin-lun, accountant, of the Provincial Bank of Kuangtung, issued several hundred million dollars' worth of notes and circulated them with the full consent of Dr. Sun, the Government recognized them at first but repudiated them all later on.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE FAMINE SURTAX

Measures While Awaiting Powers' Agreement

Peking, Aug. 20.

A Chihling mandate to-day approves the suggestion of the Minister of Finance to institute Customs and likin surtaxes in the provinces to aid flood relief and authorizes the Ministry to inform the organization concerned. The above mandate is ambiguous and merely says the Customs and not the Haikuan, presumably owing to the fact that the extraterritorial Governments have not yet sanctioned the Customs surtax.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CANTON VOLUNTEERS v. MERCENARIES

Possibility of Conflict over Detention of Arms Shipment: Merchants Well Armed

From a Chinese Correspondent.

The Kuomintang Government in Canton led by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, Generalissimo, and Mr. Liao Chung-hoi, Civil Governor is attempting to wreck the Kuangtung Provincial Volunteer movement. The government has attempted to prevent the inauguration of the movement and is holding up more than a million dollars worth of arms and ammunitions imported for the equipment of the force. Dr. Sun Yat-sen, in holding up the arms and cancelling the import permits has stated that the application for the huchao, as submitted by Mr. Chan Lim-pak, says that the arms may not arrive before 40 days after August 4. But they have come August 10, only six days after the permit was granted. The Volunteer Corps authorities are now contending that whether the arms and munitions have come after six or 40 days is immaterial.

His reason for preventing the inauguration of the amalgamated volunteer movement, Governor Liao says, is that the conference of delegates was to take place without government sanction and that the central command is too much like an army headquarters when it issues orders to the divisional corps in the districts.

The Seized Arms.

The arms involved in the government hold-up consist of 4,850 rifles with 1,150,000 rounds of ammuntion for them, 4,331 Mauser pistols with 2,060,000 rounds of ammunition, and 660 revolvers with 164,200 rounds of ammunitions, which have come in 1,129 cases in the Norwegian steamer Hav.

The Kuomingtang, by opposing the movement, is embarrassing nearly 150,000 members of the amalgamated force actually in Canton and districts. These 150,000 volunteers are supported by 33,000,000 Cantonese.

That there will be a conflict between the people of Kuangtung and the militarists now oppressing is expected, but it is somewhat a surprise that it has begun early.

The strength of the Canton Merchants' Volunteer Corps alone is 13,000, some 8,000 of whom are fully armed and trained for service. In an armed conflict between the volunteers and the Kuomingtang in Canton City, the latter would probably be victorious at the outset owing to the number of mercenaries employed by Dr. Sun. The volunteers outside Canton, however, would undoubtedly come to the relief of their comrades in the city.

Strong Trade Union Spirit.

Not only the foreign employers in Shameen, but also the Chinese in the native city of Canton are bowing to their employees these days owing to the present Labour complexion of the Kuomingtang. Waiters in Canton are celebrating their victory just now, as their demands for a 40 per cent. increase over their minimum wage schedule has been granted and will become effective within the next few days. It is not believed that the teahouse and restaurant owners will care much about this, as they have the option of changing their bills of fare and listed prices. Following the success of the waiters, rice mill hands are asking for an increase of 25 per cent., the minimum henceforth of which must be not less than six dollars a month even for a beginner. The mill workers demand non-employment of non-union men, medical attention and regular wages for those injured while in service for their employers. Dressmakers too, are asking for more than they are getting just now.

Bolshevik Labour Leaders.

The labour leaders of Canton have been asked to support the Kuomintang Political Party, and a special division headed by Mr. Liao Chung-hoi, present Civil Governor of Kuangtung, has been created by Dr. Sun Yat-sen to look after Labour's interests. These leaders will meet on August 17 under the auspices of the Kuomingtang, and among the speakers advertised for the gathering are Mr. Wang Ching-wei, Mr. Tom Ping-shan, and other Communists friendly to the Reds of the Soviet Republic, which still maintains a representative in Canton.

DR. SUN'S PROMISE TO GIVE UP ARMS

Hongkong, Aug. 21.

In connexion with the recent importation to Canton by the Merchant Volunteer Corps of a large quantity of arms and ammunition, which were seized by the authorities, Dr. Sun Yat-sen has sent a letter to the Volunteers promising delivery in accordance with the regulations for the acquisition of arms by volunteers, thus settling the question.

At the same time Dr. Sun Yat-sen states that a plot has recently been discovered in which the Volunteers and others are concerned, the object of which was the overthrow of the present authorities and surrender to the North. He accuses Mr. Chan Lim-pak, the compradore of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, of being the ringleader. With the exception of the latter, the authorities, the letter declares, will overlook the past in the case of accomplices who are now repentant, but they are desirous of punishing those who still continue plotting.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen says that he is determined thoroughly to investigate the organization of the Volunteer Corps and to eliminate traitors, in order to enable the Volunteers and the authorities to co-operate for the welfare of Kuangtung.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Labourers' Volunteer Corps Organized

Peking, Aug. 18.

Telegrams from Canton report that the leaders of various labour bodies there have begun the organization of a Labourers' Volunteer Corps and are trying to get hold of part of the arms and ammunition brought by the Norwegian steamer Hav, which was seized by the Canton authorities. This movement seems to have been given a fillip by the Shameen strike and has also been helped, it is said, by growing feeling against the merchants over the arms question.

The Merchants' Protest to the Diplomatic Body

Among the matters which came before the Diplomatic Body when it met this morning under the presidency of the Japanese Minister (Mr. Yoshizawa) was the protest forwarded by the Merchant Volunteer Corps in Canton against the action of the local authorities there in forcibly detaining the steamer Hav, which was carrying arms and ammunition imported by the Corps. As the matter was reported to be in course of settlement locally the Diplomatic Body decided not to take any action in regard to it.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY IN CHINA

Peking, Aug. 18.

A contract is being negotiated between the Chinese Naval authorities and the Telefunken Company for the German Company to supply and erect seven wireless stations along the coast of China. The stations are to have a range of 2,000 miles and will be used for communicating with ships at sea. The wireless station at Pratas Island is not included in this scheme, but was negotiated as a separate contract at an earlier date. It will be remembered that the Hongkong Government expressed a wish for the Pratas Island Station to be erected in order that Hongkong and the mainland should receive timely warning of typhoons and their course.

Meanwhile the contract whereby the Telefunken Company undertook to replace the old stations, with a range of 3,000 miles, at the Temple of Heaven, Peking, Wuchang and Foochow with modern stations on the Telefunken new system has not been carried out beyond delivery of the stations at Shanghai, Hankow and Tientsin. It is understood that delivery of these stations and erection at the points named merely awaits payment on the part of the Chinese Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MR. ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS' COMING EXPEDITION TO MONGOLIA

The Search for Mankind's Birthplace

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 15.

Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews is going to Urga next week to arrange for his next expedition into Mongolia. When he comes back he will begin the task of assembling the loads of equipment that are now on the way to China. Already about 40 crates have arrived, and the cars and trucks are due in a few weeks time. The other members of the Third Asiatic expedition, 14 foreigners in all, as compared with the eight who formed the foreign personnel last year, will follow in due course.

The organization of the new expedition is an affair of no mean proportions. It is impossible to give an account of the multitudinous details that have to be attended to, but just to afford an idea of the nature of the undertaking, it might be mentioned that Mr. Andrews has to arrange for a caravan of 200 camels, he has to equip the expedition with 4,000 gallons of petrol, 100 gallons of oil and two tons of flour. He has to provide food of all kinds, except meat, for 40 people who will be away from all contact with their fellows for many months.

The caravan will be started on its way to Mongolia sometime in November or December. By starting at this time of the year, it will have the best chance of missing the blinding snowstorms that beat across the Gobi desert in the winter months. On April 15 next year the members of the expedition will set off, travelling in motor-cars, and the entire party will assemble in the heart of Mongolia at a point toward the eastern end of the Altai range of mountains, where the expedition finished its work last year. It is expected that the cars, which are specially designed for this difficult trip, will reach the rendezvous almost at the same time as the caravan, which has of necessity to follow a circuitous route.

The expedition will then divide into four divisions, working west and south of the Altai. Each division will be entirely self-contained, and with the addition of new scientific groups, it is hoped in this way to do more comprehensive work than was done last year. An innovation of first-rate interest is the inclusion of a mapping division. When the party returns, the chief cartographer will probably be in a position to supply the world with a new and accurate map of large areas of unknown Mongolia. On the last expedition existing maps were found to be sometimes 150 miles in error in their latitudinal and longitudinal terminations.

The Cradle of Man.

In the course of a chat with Mr. Andrews, I was given a survey of the aspirations of the new expedition. These are well-known by this time in outline, but in view of the importance of the expedition may be interesting in detail.

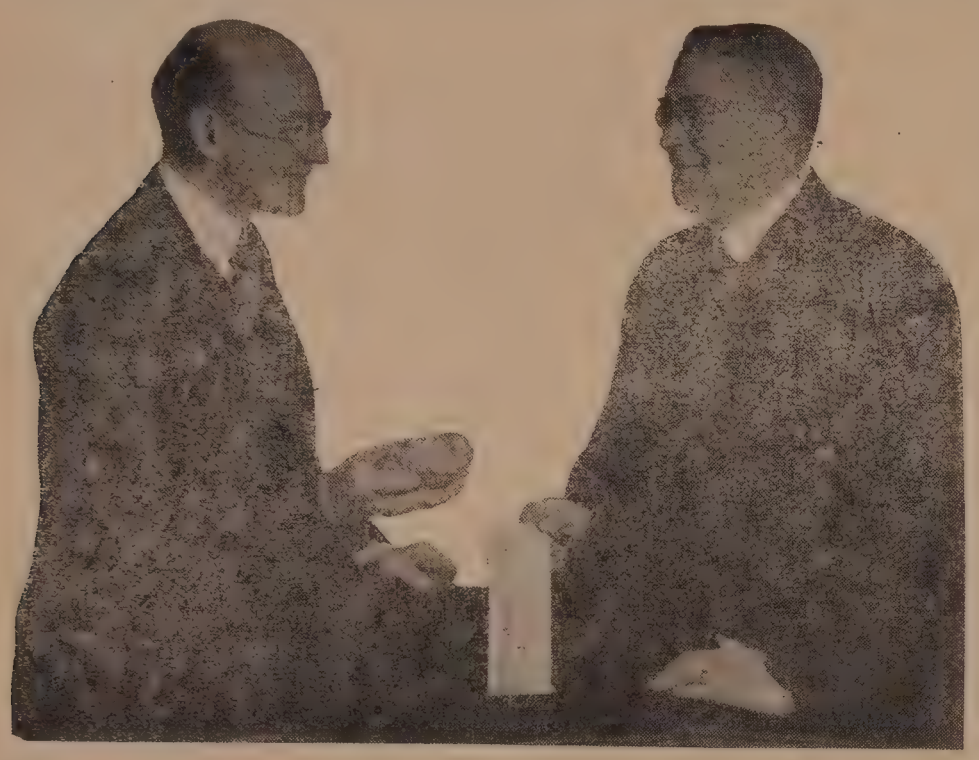
"We are going to work on human evolution," said Mr. Andrews. "In the past we have tried to test the theory that Central Asia is the point of origin of a great deal of the animal and reptile life of the world. But for 25 years it has been said that this region is also the birthplace of man. We have found that Mongolia and the Central Asian plateau constitute the palæontological Garden of Eden. Why should it not prove to be the place where man originated? The new expedition will work on rocks of a later period than those which were worked on last year. Those rocks, which yielded among other things the eggs of the dinosaur, are of course too old to contain any evidences of man. This time we shall concentrate on the younger rocks.

Mr. Andrews agreed that the task was like looking for a needle in a haystack; but, he said, "All the evidence points more and more strongly to the Central Asian plateau as the birthplace of man, and this time we are bringing together all branches of science to assist us in bearing on this one problem. We hope—only hope, mark you—that we shall secure some evidence at any rate to shed light on the problem of human evolution. In any case, we are bound to return with many interesting specimens. The country where we shall work is the birthplace of so many different groups of animals that it is inevitable that we shall unearth some things of the utmost interest.

The Dinosaur Eggs.

I questioned Mr. Andrews on his discoveries last year, particularly on the eggs of the dinosaur. It was then that he showed me the original of the accompanying sketch which he had just received from the American Museum of Natural History. Ever since he arrived in New York with a huge block of red sandstone which was supposed to contain only three dinosaur eggs, the Museum's experts have been at work on it, endeavouring to expose the eggs embedded in the stone without damaging the eggs. As a result of this extraordinarily delicate task, no fewer than 13 eggs have been revealed, bringing the number found by the expedition up to 25. All the eggs were found at the eastern end of the Altai range, where the expedition intends to take up its work again.

"In view of the world-wide interest that has been taken in these eggs, and the misapprehension that has been caused in some quarters, I would like you to make clear that only one egg was sold," said Mr. Andrews. "I only put one up for auction. I did so to arouse some publicity for the next expedition, for which I had to raise a quarter of a million dollars, I had bids from all parts of the world, and eventually disposed of it to Colonel Austin Colgate for Gold $5,000."



THE LEADER OF THE EXPEDITION, MR. ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS, SELLING A DINOSAUR EGG FOR GOLD $5,000 TO COLONEL AUSTIN COLGATE, WHO WAS THE SUCCESSFUL BIDDER.

THE NEST OF DINOSAUR EGGS FOUND BY MR. ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS, AND TAKEN TO THE NEW YORK MUSEUM BY HIM LAST YEAR. THE MUSEUM AUTHORITIES HAVE BEEN WORKING ON THE STONE EVER SINCE AND HAVE SUCCEEDED IN EXPOSING 13 OF THE EGGS.

HUGE TRANSACTION IN HOTEL SHARES

Hongkong, Aug. 19.

A record transaction was carried out on the Stock Exchange to-day when Messrs. Fred Kew & Co. sold and Messrs. Ellis & Co. bought a single line of 100,000 shares of Hongkong and Shanghai Hotels at $25 for December delivery.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

 The announcement of this transaction was received in Shanghai on Wednesday with general surprise, and in the absence of details, speculation is rife as to its significance. It is believed that the purchase was made on behalf of a syndicate, but whether Chinese or foreign cannot be stated at the moment. The price paid represents a very considerable advance on the last quotation, which was $19.50, whilst yesterday only $19 was offered in Shanghai.—Ed.

COMPLETE DEADLOCK OVER SAGHALIEN

Negotiations Again Blocked: No Progress Regarding North Saghalien

Peking, Aug. 12.

Although it was emphasized that the talk of a deadlock is premature, it was admitted, in response to inquiries at the Japanese Legation to-day, that on the main questions arising out of the negotiations with the Soviet Representative in regard to North Saghalien the respective views of Japan and the Soviet Government are as widely divergent as they were months ago. Beyond crystalizing the Japanese attitude, small progress towards settlement seems to have been achieved, up to the present, by the Japanese Minister's visit to Tokyo. Since his return, Mr. Yoshizawa has had six meetings with Mr. Karakhan, the last of which took place on August 9. At the first of these conferences, Mr. Yoshizawa outlined the stand taken by the new Japanese Government and the other five occasions were devoted to an expression of views in reply by the Soviet Ambassador.

The Japanese claim that they have said their final word and that there is no question of getting further instructions from Tokyo, as the instructions already given are sufficiently definite. On the whole, unless there is some early and important modification of the Soviet Government's attitude, it looks as though the Japanese troops in North Saghalien may quite likely be there another winter.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Japan Adamant Against Any Compromise; Concessions a Preliminary to withdrawal

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking Aug. 15.

If an agreement is not reached by Mr. Yoshizawa and Mr. Karakhan by the end of this month, there is no likelihood of Japanese troops being withdrawn from northern Saghalien this year. Add to this that there has not been the slightest progress in the negotiations since Mr. Yoshizawa returned from Tokyo with revised instructions and that both parties are deadlocked on the subject of concessions, and one has a pessimistic view of the outcome of the present conversations.

According to the Japanese authorities, the views of the two conferees are flatly contradictory. Mr. Yoshizawa and Mr. Karakhan have had several meetings but they have done nothing but present their cases. There has been no argument and no effort at compromise, The last interview occurred a week ago, and the Japanese do not know when Mr. Karakhan will attempt to enter into conversations again. His case rests on recognition and the withdrawal of troops from northern Saghalien as a preliminary to any discussion on concessions.

Even if Japan were willing to adopt this course (which she is not), it will soon be too late to enforce such an undertaking. It is pointed out that the northern part of the island is ice-bound by the end of October, and remains in that condition until well into the new year. To withdraw their troops before the ice comes, the Japanese require an understanding by the first of next month.

No Compromise.

Present prospects do not indicate any such speedy completion of the discussions, if one can so describe the present one-sided interviews. For one thing, the Japanese are not willing to accept Mr. Karakhan's proposition that the occupation force should be evacuated before a definitive agreement is signed respecting concessions. On all other matters, debts and the like, Japan is prepared to follow Great Britain's example and leave them to a formal conference; but on the question of Saghalien, Mr. Yoshizawa's instructions are that he must insist on details being settled before Japanese troops are withdrawn. The Japanese Minister is armed with explicit instructions on this point, and he cannot deviate from them in any compromising effort.

The opinion of the new Japanese Cabinet, it is understood, is united on the subject of the necessity of concessions before recognition can be accorded. Mr. Yoshizawa has advanced certain suggestions that are a "sort of compromise" on the Kiyoura Cbainet's proposals; but as they merely affect the term of concessions, they are really apart from the main issue. And because of this they have not yet been discussed.

The next move lies with Mr. Karakhan. Seeing that a week has passed since the last interview, he does not seem to be in any hurry to adjust the conflicting opinions of the two parties. Some time ago he said that Japan would not get any concessions as a right or a reparation; the recent agreement in London would seem to strengthen that uncompromising stand.

Long Conference But No Result

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 18.

Although the Russo-Japanese negotiations were resumed to-day, at the instance of Mr. Yoshizawa, Japanese Minister to China, ruptures are expected. The Russian Embassy (?) officials freely predict a breakdown of the negotiations as a result of to-day's meeting.

One official said: "There has been no change in Japan's attitude. Only a Central African State, with no such power as Russia, could accept their demands."

Questioned on the subject of Mr. Yoshizawa's instructions, received personally from Tokyo, the Soviet representatives said that they are not a compromise on the attitude of the Kiyoura Cabinet, as generally supposed and as the Japanese Legation allows it to be understood, but, on the contrary, are more drastic in scope.

Last week Mr. Yoshizawa asked Tokyo if his instructions might be modified, but the reply, it is understood from the same source, was to the effect that no concession on Japan's original stand can be entertained.

That is the reply Mr. Yoshizawa is submitting to Mr. Karakhan today. The conversations are expected to last until late in the evening.

Aug. 19.

No progress was made as the result of last night's meeting between Mr. Yoshizawa and M. Karakhan. Although the conference lasted about five hours, I understand the main issue was scarcely mentioned, Mr. Yoshizawa concentrating on the question of compensation for Japan's improvements in northern Saghalien in the event of Japanese withdrawal from the territory. At present this would seem like putting the cart before the hourse, as no detail in connexion with the withdrawal of Japan from Saghalien has been decided upon, according to information from Japanese and Soviet sources.

A meeting is to be held tomorrow, but the opinion still prevails that a breakdown is imminent.

SPECULATION IN SHARES

Forward Dealings Restricted in Hongkong

Hongkong, Aug. 20.

With the object of checking overspeculation, the Committee of the Hongkong Stock Exchange has decided to restrict forward dealings to those not exceeding three months ahead, the decision to become effective in November.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FILIPINO LEPERS' PLEA FOR FREEDOM

Manila, Aug. 16.

More than 100 women relatives of the lepers of the Culion Colony broke into the House of Representatives this morning and presented a petition for freeing the lepers from Culion or for at least improving their lot. The House suspended the session. The Speaker, Mr. Roxas, promised his good offices to grant the demands.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SHAMEEN STRIKE AT AN END

Shameen, Aug. 14.

The strike has been resumed owing to misconception over the reinstatement of the police. The situation is more serious than was anticipated.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hongkong, Aug. 15.

Publicity was given in Canton to the Gentlemen's Agreement referred to in the statement issued by the British and French Consuls-General in view of an accusation voiced by the "Canton Gazette" that the police had been deliberately deceived.

It was agreed that the Councils should accept the resignation of the police and grant each a gratuity based on the length of service, subject to re-employment of such of the men as the Councils may select for police or other service. The strikers accepted the offer of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, whose good offices were solicited, to incorporate the men not so re-employed into the Chinese police force.

It is not known by whose action the arrangements so carefully concluded between the Consuls-General, the Canton authorities and the strike leaders have been temporarily upset. The fact remains that the leaders agreed to terms which include removal of prevention of return of workers and that that prevention has not been removed.

The Councils have warned the workers that after four o'clock this afternoon their places are liable to be filled permanently. It is hoped that what appeared to be a breach of faith in reality has been a mistake which can be satisfactorily rectified.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hongkong, Aug. 19.

A wireless message from the Senior Naval Officer at Canton states that the Shameen strike has ended and that the men will return to work this afternoon.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Aug. 19.

An official telegram from Canton says that, as a result of a general agreement between all the parties concerned, the Shameen strikers will resume work to-day. The Chinese police will send in their resignations through their representative.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Earlier Incidents

Note:—Although the following correspondence from a Canton Chinese correspondent is somewhat belated (owing to postal delays in south China), we issue it as it throws some further light on the Shameen and Canton labour situation.—Reuter.

Canton, Aug. 10.

Students in Canton are unable to assist the committee in charge of the Shameen strike en masse in the work of agitating for a complete "boycott" against the foreign concession, as all the schools are now closed for the summer holidays and will not be opened until early in September. However, the Young People's Division of the Kuomintang Political Party, a large part of which is composed of students, has informally assured the committee in charge of the strike of its support.

The strike and "boycott" are not so much anti-foreign as anti-British and anti-French. The offer of several students in Canton from the French Sacred Heart College and the British Holy Trinity College to assist the proposed "boycott" movement, and the hesitation of the boys from the Canton Christian College and other American dominated missionary institutions to participate in the agitation, bear this out.

Soviet and German Influence

Persons closely connected with the present anti-British and anti-French movement in Shameen and outside Shameen are responsible for the information that the Canton Government in its indirect encouragement of the Shameen merchants has been duped by the advice of the several Russian and German advisers under Dr. Sun Yat-sen. The Germans are now excluded from Shameen, and their business establishments are now confined to the large office buildings along the Bund. The Russians used to have a consulate building in Shameen, and the failure to find a responsible Russian representative in Canton a few years ago has resulted in its having gone to some other property owners. The Germans and Russians mostly live in Tungshan these days. For a time the Shameen strike was to have extended to Tungshan. It is said that the presence there of the Germans and Russians prevented that.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Former Settlement Re-affirmed: Dr. Sun's Assistance

Shameens, Aug. 19.

The Shameen authorities have consented to publication of the following:—

"The strikers promise to return at four o'clock this afternoon. The former settlement has been re-affirmed. Pickets will be removed."

It is understood that Dr. Sun Yat-sen persuaded the recalcitrant faction of his own party to accept the "Gentlemen's Agreement" as meaning non-reinstatement of the police.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Strikers Resuming Work

Shameen, Aug. 20.

Practically all the strikers have returned.

Hongkong, Aug. 21.

For the first time since the strike, British river steamers yesterday night loaded full cargoes for Canton. Silk and other valuable produce from Canton is being shipped to Hongkong.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OPIUM SMUGGLING EVIL IN SHANSI

Why Not Deport Principals to Opium Provinces?

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiangchow, Sha., Aug. 14.

Foreign residents in this province cannot but cordialy endorse the letter you recently published addressed by Governor Yen to the International Anti-Opium Association. There is no doubt about this Governor's good intentions and vigorous attempts to fight the narcotic evils in this province. Plenty of Officials, too, are successfully following his lead. The difficulty, however, in bringing about anything like total suppression lies, as the Governor himself points out, in the facility with which smuggling is carried on from the neighbouring provinces.

The general opinion is that the surreptitious use of nardics drugs is on the increase and that the number of registered drug addicts in each village rarely covers all who have fallen victims to the habit. In this connexion the Governor has impressed upon his officials the importance of moral suasion and sympathetic treatment of habitual drug takers.

If only the Governor could order the transportation to opium provinces of the rich opium smokers who being treated leniently by the authorities not only break the law but encourage others to do so Some measure of this kind is needed for smuggling is undobutedly becoming more prevalent.

Russian Hawkers.

Russians are to be met in every city new, laboriously hawking rugs and piece goods at prices which are not acceptable.

Many speak no language but their own, and communication with them is difficult. They seem to carry no personal luggage and live entirely in Chinese fashion. If those who supply them with goods would give them credentials in English and Chinese explaining their presence in such numbers in the interior and informing those interested if these men are seeking employment, working on their own account, or under a charitable organization, some such plan might lead either to better business opportunities or to some amelioration of the wretched conditions under which these poor fellows seem to travel.

It is announced that the new commander of the 15th U. S. Infantry at Tientsin will be Lt.-Col. George C. Marshall, who served as operations officer in France, and later on Gen. Pershing's personal staff. Col. Marshall is now on his way to Tientsin by way of San Francisco and Manila.

GAMING AT TSINGTAO

Casino Club Attracting Scores of Visitors: Only the Wretched Are Wise

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Aug. 13.

Three houndred-dollars on the first night, eight-hundred on the second, and one-hundred and 60 on the third, on a capital of $50. That is what a (Tientsin) visitor made at the Casino Club which operates under government licence.

There having been rumours that all was not above board, I visited the resort the other might. Sitting on one side of a long table were two prominent Shanghai business men, a Tientsin magnate, wealthy Russian from Harbin and his wife, an American lady, two Japanese and another Russian. At one end of the table was the dealer and at his right the croupier. The game was roulette—not the wheel, but what is popular amongst Mexicans, card roulette.

I went with a determination to watch, just to watch—but before I went home I had "dropped" a hundred. "Come again the next opportunity you have," they invited me. One heavy loser looked very melancholy. The Japanese were $400 down between them; the Shanghai business men, having just started, were about even; the Harbin Russian was making a couple of hundred, but, on the other hand, his wife was about that much to the bad; the American lady was losing five dollars at a time up to the moment I left, but she was the most cheerful of the whole lot; but the man from Tientsin lost not even once. He would put down forty chips at a time, spreading them over on every other card, and never overlooking the joker and double joker. When I went into the Casino he was two hundred to the good. When I left, and he left with me, he was $800 to the good. The previous night he had won $300 and the night after I was here, he took in another $160. He missed one night and went again the next and made another couple of hundred.

This man's luck is phemomenal—or perhaps he has a "system." I am told the Casino people feel a bit nervous each time he comes in. But, of course, he is not the only winner. There are others who, to quote a popular Americanism, "have more luck than brains."

Refreshments Gratis.

Like all other such institutions, the Casino furnishes you with free drinks and smokes. I have heard of a man who goes there every night with just five dollars. If he loses, he would drink that much worth of whiskey and soda. If he wins—well, you can picture the whole thing for yourself.

The club takes chits. One man went in, signed a chit for half a stack (five dollars) and walked off with a hundred! Another went there, gave a cheque for a thousand, and took all the equivalent in five-dollar chips. He was at one time two-thousand to the good and should have gone home. But he remained just too long to lose everything. When the Casino sent the cheque round for collection, it was returned "insufficient funds." He had just $13 to his credit.

There are people here who consider that the Government should not have issued the permit. The whole point, however, is this. Will others apply for similar permits? Will this beautiful Tsingtao, already boasting of an excellent Race Club, be turned into a miniature Monute Carlo?

ANOTHER WARSHIP BOUGHT OVER?

Peking, Aug. 15.

The Cabinet this morning discussed a Japanese press report to the effect that the cruiser, Haichow, had suddenly left Admiral Lien Chien-chang's squadron at Shanghai and that its whereabouts is not known. As the Government had not received a report in that connexion, the Cabinet resolved to telegraph to Admiral Tu Shih-kuei and Marshal Chi Hsueh-yuan asking for information.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KULING ANNUAL LANDRENTERS' MEETING

Much Talk but Little Business Done: Water Supply Scheme Again Shelved: First Woman Councillor Elected

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kuling, Aug. 9.

The Kuling Annual Landrenters' Meeting was held on the morning and afternoon of Friday, and concluded this morning. On Friday morning, several important resolutions were passed. On Friday afternoon, the greater part of them were rescinded. On Saturday morning the remainder were rescinded. Total business done:—nil. Nevertheless, several important subjects were thoroughly discussed, and looked at from different points of view; and no doubt the time was well spent and the opinions given voice to will help to mould and guide future policy.

On Friday morning the most important question discussed was water-supply. With the advice and energetic assistance of Dr. Atwater, a scheme has been prepared by the Council for constructing a system of water-tanks throughout the two valleys, so that each bungalow may be readily supplied with good water by means of pipes. The total cost of the scheme is estimated to be $30,000. It is calculated that the supply would be sufficient to provide 20 gallons of water per head daily for each resident on the Estate during the whole summer.

Owing partly to the fortunate sale of the telephone system, and partly also to the increase of taxes for 1924, the finances of the Estate are in a much more flourishing condition than they have been for years. Nevertheless, the taxes will have to be increased still further in order to finance such a costly scheme as this, and there were not a few who raised the cry of "frantic finances" against the proposal of the Council. The benefits of the new system will be unequal. Those who do not happen to have bungalows situated near a spring, or who have to rely upon a more or less polluted stream for their water-supply, would no doubt welcome it, and be prepared to stand the racket. But many lots in the valley already posses very pure springs, and some of the residents have been to no small expense to laying pipes by which they may tap the best sources. To the two latter classes, the idea of launching upon a very large and to them unnecessary expense, was by no means welcome.

On Friday morning, the scheme was passed. On Friday afternoon, it was resolved that it should be carried out in the first place only in the West Valley, where good water is not so easily obtainable as in the Old Valley. On Saturday morning, it was decided that the whole proposition should be laid on the table and postponed for at least another year.

New Taxation Popular.

The new system of taxation met with very little real objection. The main criticism raised was that while the land on all the lots has been valued according to its intrinsic character, no account has been taken of proximity. But no satisfactory criterion of value on the ground of proximity was put forward. People who are fond of going to conventions and other religious services, no doubt value proximity to the Kuling Church. Those who are engaged in business, will consider it an advantage to be near the shops. But in both these cases, there are those who will set greater store on a plot which is far removed from both the sounds of praise and from the bustle of commerce. Consequently no criterion of proximity will be acknowledged as fair all round. On the other hand, a plot which contains a limpid spring of water, is obviously more valuable than one which is near a barren hill-top; and ground which is full of good building stone is worth more than soft soil. So it is probably that Mr. Berkin's assessment will stand, as the fairest that could be made. Mr. Berkin was accorded the thanks of the community for the hard and exacting work which he has done during the winter in surveying the Estate and an honorarium of $2,000 was voted to him in acknowledgement of the services which he has rendered.

Some remarks were made about the traffic department, for which Mr. Cuff is responsible—about the increasing obstreperousness of the coolies, which seems to become worse every year. Mr. Cuff has an arduous and difficult task, and it is probable that there is no other man upon the Hill who could tackle it as he has done year by year. Yet there is no doubt that things are getting worse, and the demands of the coolies for wine money, their rowdiness and inclination to quarrel, are getting more claimant. Perhaps the only possible solution lies in the motor-road, which it is hoped will be completed by the end of next summer.

The "Kuling Bulletin."

Attention was also drawn to the bad taste which has been shown in the "Kuling Bulletin" by the flaunting therein of scripture texts, also by several articles which deal at large with the subject of hell-fire and how to escape it. Such articles are no doubt well meant, and their author is quite in earnest in his desire to strike into unrepentant sinners a terror of future torment. But it does not please the Kuling community to be called—even in scriptural language—an "adulterous generation." Nor does it please the reverent-minded to see texts with a sacred association printed at the bottom of a page of doggerel or wedged in between advertisements for soap and lime juice. In answer to the complaint, it was pointed out by the Chairman of the Council that no formal complaint had been made to the Kuling Council about this matter; but if such complaint were made, it would probably be dealt with.

During the Saturday morning session, a proposal made by the Rev. J. S. Helps, the secretary of the Landrenters' Meeting was passed, to the effect that an order and form of business shall be drawn up and printed, for use in future at this annual meeting. It is hoped that by this means, subjects of discussion will be brought up in a logical order, and much inclement talk and dragging-in of side-issues may be avoided.

First Lady Councillor.

The four members of the Kuling Council whose term of service expires this year are: the Rev. S. H. Littell, Chairman of the Council, Mr. J. Berkin, the Rev. E. C. Cooper and Dr. Garrett. The former three were re-elected to a further term of service. The latter being at home on furlough, Miss Tilley, the headmistress of Redcroft School, was elected to fill the vacancy. Miss Tilley is the first lady ever elected to a seat upon the Council, and her election was received with acclamation.

The Kuling census this year shows the following results:—

YOKOHAMA STILL A RUINED CITY

Reconstruction Delayed: The Prior Claims of the Capital City

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tokyo, Aug. 8.

Yokohama has adopted for its slogan: "Bring Yokohama Back," and both foreigners and Japanese are co-operating heartily to this desired end.

The rehabilitation of the port city has been taken in hand rather apathetically by the central authorities, though the local officials have worked indefatigably to put the city back on its feet. However, whether in weal or in woe, Tokyo has always been the pet child, so that, while the capital has made gratifying progress, the port city has been neglected in veritable step-motherly fashion. Even places like Kamakura and Odawara have had proportionately more spent on them. Yokohama, especially the foreign portion of Yokohama—or what was once the foreign portion—is the Cinderella of the household. It is only to be hoped that this Cinderella of Japan's stricken cities will outshine her sisters in time, as did the Cinderella of the fairy tale.

The former settlement of Yokohama, the hub of business and the pride of the city a brief 12-months, ago, still remains a wilderness of burnt-out buildings. The plain and simple fact is that there is no money available. What has been got from foreign lands and from local sources, after relieving the immediate distress of the people, has gone principally to the embellishment and reconstruction of Tokyo, for is not Tokyo the capital? And is not Tokyo the city where lives the Imperial Family "whose throne is co-eval with Heaven and Earth?" Hence the return of Yokohama to convalescence is slow and painful, but the efforts being made are gallant and inspiring.

Lack of Hotels.

The lack of suitable accommodation is among the big problems that confront recovering Yokohama today. Ships come here with former residents who have been in other-lands since the earthquake and who desire to take up the threads of life in the old city once again; they look the place over and, simply because of the lack of living accommodation, decide to move over to Kobe instead.

Fully awake to the necessity of inducing foreigners to recommence trade in Yokohama, the authorities are devising all manner of measures to coax them to return to their former abode. The city magnates have decided to erect dwellings for such as return, renting these at a nominal price; while the Raw Silk Association of Yokohama, realizing that the prosperity of the port depends to a great extent on getting back the raw silk trade, around which has really clustered the other activities of the port, is also erecting dwellings for silk men. Kobe, however, is determined not to relenquish trade it secured after the quake, and, as former Yokohama foreign firms have taken fairly firm root there, Yokohama's inducements will have to be more substantial and profitable.

The only hotels in Yokohama today worth mentioning consist of the Tent Hotel, which, as its name implies, is a collection of tents; and the Club Hotel, a two-story, wooden structure, run in foreign style, under Japanese management. Other hotels, like the Bluff Hotel and the Cherry Mount Hotel, are erecting new structures, proof that Yokohama expects its former foreign dwellers to return.

The Tent Hotel which has been the only place for foreigners to live in for many months following the earthquake disaster is now taking down the tents and putting up a semi-permanent, wooden structure.

Foreigners in the port city are enthusiastic and optimistic when they talk of Yokohama's prospects of returning to normal. The American consulate general to-day is a knot of little wooden buildings and tents; so is the British consulate-general and the office and residence of the French consul-general now familiarly known as French House. Masses of flowers, blooming goregeously, almost enshroud these in gorgeous bloom, speaking volumes for the fertility of the soil around the diminutive structures erected on the sites of the former imposing buildings. The consulates of the other Powers are, for the most part, wooden shanties, some of them hardly bigger than a garage.

Land for Warehouses.

If one except the war boom period and the period immediately following the earthquake disaster, there are more vessels calling at Yokohama now than at any previous time in the port's history. Arrangements at the port, despite broken piers and other obstructions, are beyond censure, and shippers have nothing but praise for the strides that have been made despite what some regarded as insurmountable obstacles, the greatest of these being Tokyo red-tapeism.

The destruction of lighters, all of which were reduced to ashes when the tanks of the Standard Oil Co. and the Rising Sun Petroleum Co. burst and the oil flowed seawards setting the harbour afire, was one of the biggest difficulties business men had to cope with. The number of lighters now is on a par with the number before the quake, and most of these are roomier and better constructed..

Several acres of land are being reclaimed along the water front, opposite the bund, the débris being used for filling in. It is proposed to erect several warehouses on this of land, and the municipality is leasing sections for short periods, not to exceed five years. The warehouses must be of a semi-temporary character. At the end of five years, the warehouses are to be pulled down and this tract of ground converted into a large park with a marine museum, tennis courts, baseball diamonds, cricket pitches and swimming pools.

Better Streets.

The streets of Yokohama are in a horrible condition. A start in road making cannot yet be made; this will occupy some time yet as the plans call for wider thoroughfares which will necessitate encroaching on private property. At present the streets of Yokohama are dangerous to negotiate in a vehicle; when one walks in the dry season, one sinks ankle-deep in soft, reddish-brown dust; when the weather is wet one slop-slops in a morass of several inches of oozy mud. The proposed new streets are to intersect the city at right angles and are to be from 60 to 90 feet in length.

FUKIEN TROOPS ACROSS CHEKIANG BORDER

News Received in Hangchow with Indifference

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, Aug. 11.

The troops from Fukien have crossed the border and are now stationed at Chuchow, but the fact is not regarded here as of any importance. At any rate the man in the street hardly knows about it.

The draught still continues, but refreshing showers fell yesterday and revived the farmer's hopes. In time of draught the sluices of the West Lake are opened for the benefit of the farmers in the Hai-ning district. This has not been done so far. Canals are nearly dry and tansportation is greatly interrupted.

Five-hundred thousand dollars have been subscribed for the Waterworks scheme and the directors have been asked a hurry up and get the water running in good time for the great Exhibition, the site of which will be in the old Hang-fu Yamen, now the Military Club grounds.

PANCHAN LAMA'S VISIT TO PEKING

Peking, Aug. 16.

Two high officials of the Panchan Lama's suite arived in Peking yesterday evening after calling on Marshal Wu Pei-fu at Loyang, where they were well received. The Government has made elaborate arrangements for their accommodation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FALLACY OF CHINESE "LAW"

Very Fine in Theory but as Barbaric as Ever in Practice

By Our Mienchow Correspondent.

In its May number the "Contemporary Review" has an interesting review entitled "Law in China." The writer begins by remarking "the unstable social and political conditions (in China) have been much emphasized in the West during the past year. It is therefore proper that the evidence which points in the direction of better and more stable conditions should also be emphasized. It is not an unfamiliar phenomenon in history for a dominant system of law to be growing up in the midst of a very disordered society." The writer is reviewing a book translated into English by Dr. F. T. Cheng, entitled "The Chinese Supreme Court Decisions." Apart from its special interest to lawyers the book would have an interest to the plain man who knows anything of present day China as indicating that even at this time when there would seem to be very little law in China there are yet those who are working at the codification of law.

There may be attempts at codifying her laws by China, but when it comes to the application of them the hugeness of the country is a great drawback, but of the need of a law, just in content and powerful in application, the following incident is one of many proofs. It arises out of the murder of the two missionaries Messrs. Watt and Whiteside.

Attack on Foreigners.

Of the various persons charged with this crime in the Mowchow district last year three were brought to Chêngtu for trial in January last. Chang Ying-kao was proved to be implicated and therefore sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. Lin Shao-ting got 18 months for sharing in the loot. The case of the third man Yang Hsuan-hsiao is different. He was never arrested, and never charged. He was always referred to as "one who ought to be examined." At the trial it transpired that he had been at the gang's headquarters by accident on the day of the murder, over a land deal. When he knew that they were planning to attack the foreigners he went out of his way to warn them. When he heard that they had been killed he called out the "watch" and with the militia arrested Chang and started the authorities on a movement to get all the others. The court therefore acquitted him. This trial was held on January 10 and 17 and then adjourned sine die in the hope of getting more evidence, and more of the guilty parties. In February the city changed hands and the magistrate who had tried the case was driven out. Before he left he issued his judgment which was communicated to H. M. Consulate on March 1.

Innocent Third Accused

Now it would have been thought that this third man, Yang, having been acquitted would then be set free; but what are the facts? On June 20 more than five months after the acquital, the Chinese authorities informed the Vice-Consul, who had sat as assessor in the case, that the prisoners were seriously ill. He therefore with the Consulate Medical officer went to see them in gaol. To his surprise he found not only the two convicted prisoners, but also Yang Hsuan-hsiao still in prison. As the result of his representations Yang was released; but so far from giving him any compensation for this wrongful imprisonment, he was told that if he wanted money to take him home he had better go and see the British Consul who had got him out! He was found to be so ill that he had to be sent to hospital. Such are the extraordinary features and ramifications of Chinese justice.

I cannot do better than quote verbatim the last paragraph of the "memorandum" whence my information is taken.

Knew Something About the Case.

"The murder was committed in August; Chang was arrested a few days later, and on his evidence it was seen that Yang knew something about the case. He was invited to go to Mowchow in October and as he was in irons—chains on his ankles and handcuffs attached by an iron bar to an iron collar—at the time of the trial it may be assumed that he had worn them since he arrived at Mowchow. The handcuffs, etc., were removed in court (at the instance of the Assessor) but he was still wearing leg irons on June 20.

Ignorant of His Acquittal

It is clear that not only had he no share in the murder, but did all he could to prevent it and started proceedings for the punishment of the guilty: and yet he has had about nine months in irons and would have stayed there indefinitely, but for this chance visit of a foreign consular officer. He did not even know that he had been acquitted; and now that he has been released he has no redress or compensation for this wrongful imprisonment and is simply thrown out on the streets."

When one reflects on this incident: how difficult it has been for the Consulate to persuade the authorities to get a move on to find the guilty ones; and how severely they have dealt with the man who is proved to have aided the course of justice one finds it difficult to think clearly as to what really is the official Chinese attitude in the matter. This is Chinese law in its application.

PEITAIHO BATHING FATALITY

Shanghai Resident's Brave Attempt to Rescue a Drowning Chinese

From a Correspondent.

Peitaiho, Aug. 13.

Temple Bay was the scene of a bathing tragedy and a brave attempt at rescue this afternoon at about 4 o'clock. It was noticed that a Chinese was in difficulties some way from the beach. A crowd gathered but it was hard to know what to do. There was a fairly high sea running and a strong current going out from the shore. The drowning man was making a fight for it, but was being carried further out all the time. Mr. John Stewart, from Shanghai, who is staying at the Strand Hotel here, at once made for that part of the beach. Disregarding the advice of those on the beach who realized the difficulties, Mr. Stewart plunged into the water just as he was—in tennis flannels, not even removing his shoes. When he was part of the way out those watching with glasses saw the drowning man sink and he did not come to the surface again.

Mr. Stewart swam out for several hundreds of yards from the shore and then realizing that the man must have gone, he turned to swim back. After a hard fight with the waves and strong current, he at last got back. He said later that at one time he thought he would not be able do it.

In the meanwhile a fishing boat was hastily summoned and Mr. E. S. Little went out in it with a life-buoy. The waves were so strong that the small boat was tossed hither and thither and finally realizing it was hopeless, they gave up the search.

Mr. Stewart seems none the worse for his very plucky deed though he said he felt as if he had run 15 miles. All who watched were full of admiration for his great courage in attemting such a very difficult rescue, especially clad as he was.

The Chinese drowned was a servant in a foreign house in Temple Bay.

MR. SPARKS' ONE-MAN BOAT CRUISE

Manila, Aug. 16.

The sailing boat Dauntless, from Honolulu, has been picked up off the Mindanao Coast. There is no trace of Mr. Ira Sparks, who sailed in the Dauntless from Hawaii to the Philippines and departed from there for Singapore on his way to Palestine. It is believed that he was drowned. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

FLOOD CASUALTIES IN SHANSI

Breaks Speedily Repaired in Model Province: Growth of Motor Transport

From Our Own Correspondent.

Taiku, Sha., Aug. 12.

As usual at the time of summer rains, local floods are doing considerable damage. The most serious thus far reported was in Shohksien in the north of the province. There an irrigation canal was swollen from rains in the hills, burst its banks and overflowed one village, more than 50 people losing their lives. In some other districts there have been destructive hail storms, the one that visited the vineyard district to the southwest of Taiyuanfu perhaps doing the greatest injury.

The control of irrigation ditches is easily the most prolific source of village quarrels and consequent lawsuits in this part of China. A few days ago in Kihsiensha two villages, Fankung and Tsotun, had a pitched battle at midnight. The Fankung village had begun to draw off the water from the irrigation ditch into their fields. They seem to have had a pretty clear claim to it. However, the Tsotun people disputed the claim and came out with a force of about 200 hundred men, each man carrying a lantern and a shovel or bludgeon. Though the Fankung villagers were outnumbered they resisted the attack valiantly and after about an hour's fighting beat off the invaders. Some 16 men from Tsotun were wounded, four of them so seriously that they are now in the mission hospital here. Two or three Fankung men also were wounded. An iron shovel in the hands of a strong man is a weapon not to be despised and the wonder is that the casualties were not heavier.

Motor Roads Kept Open.

The motor roads in central Shansi have suffered some damage from summer rains, but the breaks have been repaired promptly and on the whole the roads have been kept open surprisingly well. The latest improvement on these roads has been to put on motor lorries for carrying freight. A "fleet" of six of these passed through here the other day on the way to the southwest of the province.

One of the largest pieces of machinery ever brought to Shansi was a huge boiler for the provincial mint. (The term "mint" is a euphemism which students of the activities of Tuchuns will readily understand). This boiler required a month for transfer to the mint from the railway station, a distance of not over three miles, and had to be transported on tracks especially laid on the streets. The cost of transportation over these three miles is said to have been $700.

The Y. M. C. A.

There has recently been organized in Taiyuanfu a Young Men's Buddhist Association. The last three words of the name in Chinese are just the same as the Y.M.C.A. Buddhism is flourishing in the provincial capital at present.

The Cheng-Tai Railway has maintained its train services well through the summer. There have been slight delays in the arrival of trains due to flooding of the tracks, and a few temporary interruptions of the traffic. The most serious mishap of the summer was the caving in of a tunnel southeast of Chinghsing-hsien on the western border of Chihli province. Rains loosened the rocks in the roof of the tunnel at one entrance, and the cave-in was the result. This has now been cleared up and the traffic is moving as usual. The Cheng-Tai Railway has put on a new train between Taiyuanfu and Yützuhsien. It leaves Yützu in the morning for Taiyuan and returns in the afternoon. This is a great convenience for the people of the two cities.

The season is drawing to a close at Yütaoho, the beautiful summer resort near Fenchow, and many visitors have already left for their homes in Peking, Tientsin and other places in Shantung. In all about 100 guests have been in Yütaoho this summer, the greater number, of course, being residents of Shansi, but including a good number from outside provinces.

CHAOS ON TIBETAN BORDER

New Commissioner's Slender Hope of Restoring Order

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tachienlu, Sze., July 24.

A telegram arrived last night from Yang Sen appointing Sen Chao-luan as Commissioner of the Tibetan Marches. Sen has accepted the post very reluctantly.

At the present time the position of Chinese Border Commissioner is no sinecure. Money, and nothing but money will up hold China's noble prestige on the Tibetan frontier A certain amount of the Szechuan salt revenue is supposed to come to the border to feed, clothe and pay the Chinese army of occupation. At the present juncture the different military generals throughout the province are carefully and wisely helping themselves first, and what gets through to the needy Tibetan frontier is very little indeed. Chen Hong-fan sits tight at Wutongchiao; Yang Tsi-huei sits tight at Tungchuan; the lius en famille sit tight at Tsiliuching. The other unfortunate generals on the outside patiently and calmly wait till the cards are reshuffled. If fortune smiles on them they may find themselves a bit nearer the salt revenue than they were before.

Sen Chao-luan is prepared to take up the border commissionership only on condition that some of the salt revenue is released to carry on the border affairs, and also, that while acting as Border Commissioner he is allowed to reside at Yachow, eight days from the frontier, but in a better position to negotiate money. It remains to be seen what success will follow Sen Chao-luan. I have met him several times and he seems to be a man of some ability. That he is prepared to take over the seal of office; that those in authority are satisfied in handing it to him; that he is ready to leave the border and do all in his power to bring the frontier situation before those in authority in the Capital shows a man, at least willing to shoulder authority, and to take up a position which at the present moment is financially hopeless.

Sen Chao-luan is leaving Tachienlu to-day or to-morrow and is proceeding straight to Chêngtu. On his way there he will pass through the lines of General Lan and the Chinese forces opposing the border troops. He intends to use his good offices, to cause if possible, a cessation of hostilities. Marshal Wu Pei-fu is now asking several generals in Szechuan to use their influence with Liu I-chu, advising him to confine his sphere of operations to this side of the Ta-hsiang-ling. I hear that Gen. Lan has withdrawn his army to Chinchi and Yuinchin.

Southern Roads Commanded by N. Army.

Meantime the Third Szechuan army holds everything east of the Ta-hsiang-ling and the border troops everything west of the Feiyueh ling. Between those two high mountains lies a stretch of country, and what is more important, one of the great roads from Szechuan to Yunnan. For some reason or other, both Liu I-chu and Hsiang Keh-wu are very anxious to have possession of the roads leading from this province to Yunnan.

The Chienchang Valley, lying between the two passes is rich in mineral wealth, one of the greatest opium districts in west China, and able to export immense quantities of rice and oil to the Tibetan frontier. Should Marshals Wu Pei-fu and Yang Sen determine that this valley shall henceforth belong to the Tibetan Border Administration then automatically that administration becomes entirely independent of the Szechuan salt revenue. Should any power east of the Ta-hsiang-ling determine to crush the Border Administration then all she has to do is to annex the Chienchang valley. To administer the border affairs Sen Chao-luan must have the entire revenue of this province; to maintain the Third army Liu I-chu says he must have the Chienchang valley. Wu Pei-fu is now asking Tien Sung-yao and others to mediate between the border troops and the Third army.

Sen Chao-luan has now been here about one month. He has made himself thoroughly acquainted with the border conditions. He has interviewed every important military official in the two opposing forces. He realizes how hopeless it is to try to carry on the border administration without either the Chienchang valley or a regular donation from the Szechuan salt revenue. He understands Liu I-chu's difficulty in regard to the main road to Yunnan. He knows how difficult it will be to fill the position of a general like Chen Hsia-lin. He has seen the present chaotic condition of the Tibetan marches and if order is to come out of chaos, if what is lost in eastern Tibet is to be regained, if Chinese prestige is to be established again on the frontier, then it demands a wise, careful, brave, tactful ruler. Wisdom without money goes a very short distance in the land of Sinim.

SOOCHOW'S CRAZE FOR MODERN UGLINESS

Feverish Building Activity in Ancient Soo: Much Needed New Bridges

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Soochow, Ku., Aug. 18.

There is a greater air of prosperity about Soochow than at any time since the Revolution in 1911, and certainly more building in progress than during any summer in the past dozen years. Buildings are going up in every part of the city, and there is also a great deal of rebuilding. Accordingly land values are going up rapidly, and there are many lawsuits over land: people coming forward with the most shadowy claims to land. I learned last spring that there was more litigation over real estate than perhaps at any time since the days of the Taipings.

A new wooden ricsha bridge outside the Chin men is nearing completion. This will give a direct road from the eastern portion of the city to the railway station. Work has already started on the new bridge to connect the new Ping men with the station. This will be the most direct road to the railway for the main part of town. There is already heavy ricsha traffic through the new Chin men, in the western wall of the city.

The new reinforced concrete bridge in front of the Asiatic Petroleum Co's godowns is nearing completion. This is a link with the ricsha road running south from the Customs to the large camp, and then on to the "Precious Girdle Bridge" (the 53-arch bridge).

The new Japanese consulate in the Japanese concession is going up rapidly. The walls of the first floor are about complete.

PERILS OF A SZECHUAN SUMMER RESORT

Magistrate Concerned for Foreigners' Safety at Douglas Heights

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Douglas Heights, Sze., Aug. 6.

The Junghsien Magistrate informs us that at a nearby town two companies revolted, plundered the Registry and a large pawn shop, took rifles from a third company which beat a hasty retreat to one of the many fortified hill tops. The magistrate is much concerned over the safety of the foreigners at Douglas Heights and has sent upwards of 50 men to guard the main roads leading there.

A few days ago over 1,000 soldiers with heavy artillery passed south toward Sui Fu.

The foreign community of Tzeliutsing with the exception of Mr. Diedrichson, the Salt Commissioner, have gone to Douglas Heights, a summer resort some 50 miles to the northwest. Here are collected families from Junghsien, Jenshow, Luchow, Tsichow, Tzeliutsing and Chêngtu, about 15 families with perhaps 35 children. A third tennis court is under construction at this resort, the swimming pool is visited twice a day by young members of the community, and there is the usual number of picnics, committee meetings, discussions and sports.

CHINA CONSORTIUM CONTINUED

Internal Differences on Railway Finance: Separate Action Suggested

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, July 23.

There are developments in connexion with what is known as the China Consortium, and I take the following question and answer from Hansard, adding that the inquiry was by the desire of the Foreign Office postponed for one week, so that accurate information could be collected.

Mr. D. G. Somerville asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a meeting of the representatives of the Consortium on China has been recently held in London; what proposals were put forward; what results were reached and what is the attitude of the British Government with respect to them.

Mr. Ponsonby; The meeting in question was a private one of the Advisory Council of the Consortium. I understand that the only business of importance before it was the question of the renewal of the Consortium Agreement of 1920 and that the Advisory Council decided to recommend renewal in perpetuity subject to the right of any group to withdraw at 12 months' notice. This recommendation which I have reason to believe will be approved by the Groups has the approval of His Majesty's Government.

Of course, an official answer of this kind does not really give much information, so I may point out that the reason why the representatives of the Consortium met in London was a specific suggestion of the British Group. It will be recollected that in May, 1922, the Committee of the Consortium came to the conclusion that the issue of loans for railway construction in China need not necessarily be dependent on loans of a purely financial character. Accordingly, the British Group seemed to have put forward a proposal to restore complete freedom of action to the different Groups in respect of lines already built and duly notified to the Consortium. In fact, the British Group proposed that Groups should no longer be under any compulsion to grant to the others any measure of participation in the financial operations and in the supply of material for which contracts would necessarily have to be placed for those lines. It would seem that under the British proposal each Group would be bound in respect of every railway transaction other than those reserved by Article 7 of the Convention of 1922 either to take up in its entirety its share of the enterprise or, if unable to do so, to abandon it entirely.

Alternatively, the British seem to have suggested that if agreement could not be reached on this matter the Chinese Government should be asked to state the conditions on which it would agree to negotiate with the Consortium regarding purely railway affairs.

The public announcements only say that the Consortium has been renewed as above stated. They do not indicate what has happened to the proposal of the British Group, although I should imagine it has been lost, because the French were undoubtedly bitterly hostile to it.

French Lending Powers.

The time has, indeed, arrived to ask whether France is any use whatever to the Consortium. France cannot in any case lend money, except to small Powers like Rumania and Czecho-Slovakia in return for trade advantages. I do not think it could lend any to China, and if its bankers shouldered a portion of any Chinese loan France would herself have to borrow the money from some other country and then re-lend it. As it is, France, as is well known, cannot pay her war debt interest and for some years to come must inevitably cease to be an international lender. Under these circumstances her utility to the Consortium is very small indeed, and it probably would be better for her to withdraw though, of course, this might entail the break-up of the Consortium itself. France's only chance of securing her position is to try to persuade America that the proposal of the British Group would mean the re-establishment of "spheres of influence," and this is, of course, a potent bogey.

At all events, matters are not very happy inside the Consortium, and I do not think its life will be a very long one.

MYSTERIOUS CATTLE DISEASE IN ANHUI

Goods Destroyed by Farmers to Drain Fields

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Pochow, An., Aug. 12.

The robber situation seems to be far less serious than a year ago. There has been no rush of people in from the country.

The rains stopped all motor trafic for about a month and our mails have been very irregular. The motors are starting again, but roads are considerably damaged. I hear that the malo from Kueitehfu city to the railway station has been destroyed in two in several places to allow the dammed water on the west side to pass east. This is the way China will maintain good roads-seven after they are built for her!

Last year a number of fine cows died at the clairies here and at Kaifengfu. Within the past two weeks four more of the herd have died here. There were no premonitory symtoms, and all died suddenly. The Chinese-attribute the disease to "rotten kidneys."

DEVELOPMENT OF ROADS IN THE PROVINCES

Several Officials Appointed but Funds Not Yet in View

Peking, Aug. 14.

The Official Gazette to-day announces that the office of Tupan of Highways in Chihli, Shantung and Honan has been established at Loyang in accordance with the mandate issued on January 15, 1924, which appointed Marshal Wu Pei-fu as Tupan of this national enterprise. The new yamên was opened on August 5.

Gen. Chang Ching-hua, Director of National Highways, has sent a complaint to the Cabinet regarding the Government's failure to provide funds regularly for the maintenance of the Highways Department, and urging that funds be allotted as soon as possible.

Gen. Liu Chen-hua, Civil Governor of Shensi, has sent a memorial to the President in which he reports having established a highways bureau at Sianfu to attend to roads in that province. He asks for official recognition of his provincial office, but adds that the expenses will be met by the provincial authorities. His idea is to work under the general scheme arranged by Gen. Chang Ching-hua, while giving special consideration to the requirements of the province.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ANTI-BRITISH CAMPAIGN IN CHENGTU

Chêngtu, July 21.

The situation in Chêngtu and district continues entirely peaceful and uneventful.

Gen. Yang Sen is quietly working at minor reforms and Gen. Teng Tsi-hao, who was appointed Civil Governor when Gen. Yang became Military Governor, remains in Chungking, takes little part in local affairs, and continues to refuse to come to Chêngtu for his official inauguration although the date of this event has been announced officially on two different occasions by the Chêngtu authorities.

There has recently been an anti-British campaign conducted in the local press. Most of the statements are wild assertions regarding the occupation of Lhassa by the British army, etc., and most of the articles are copied from Peking newspapers. —Reuter.

HUPEH'S "BRIGAND HUNTER"

Title Bestowed on General After Successful Campaign in Robber Country

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Aug. 13.

It is reported that the Fourth Mixed Brigade under Gen. Cheng Yao-hsien, has had some success in dealing with the robbers on the Hupeh-Anhui border. From his headquarters in Lotien, using two companies and a machine gun company, he has succeeded in clearing one county of the robbers. The robbers which were troubling Yinshan county, a little further from the border, are reported not to be "Big Sword" but local robbers. Yinshan is a sparsely populated county, and mountainous, and local brigands from the neighbouring county of Macheng have made night raids, doing much mischief and causing panic.

Further north, a strong General in Suichow has been actively putting down the robbers in the two counties of Sui and Tsanyang. Five-hundred rifles recently captured have been sent down to Wuchang, and the General has been rewarded with a special title of "brigand hunter."

Governor Hsiao Yao-nan is at present spending a holiday at Chikungshan, which is the missionary summer resort north of Hankow, and on the Hupeh-Honan border. It is said that presently he will go from there to Loyang on a visit to Marshal Wu Pei-fu.

Anti-Japan Hysteria.

The native press is still endeavouring to stir up rancour against Japan. A Wuchang paper publishes a long telegram from the Shanghai Merchants' Guild to the Hankow Merchants' Guild, stating that last year during the distress caused by the earthquake in Japan, the Chinese willingly subscribed funds to assist their neighbours. Nevertheless, the ungrateful Japanese are still doing their best to work mischief in China, killing Chinese citizens (it is not said where) and spoiling Chinese trade. Another article in a Hankow paper complains that the foreigners are robbing China of her stores of mineral wealth. In particular, the evil-disposed Japanese are taking away large quantities of iron-ore from the Tayeh mines. Twelve ships have been specially commissioned to make trips to and from Japan to the Yangtze Valley for this purpose.

It is not suggested that the Japanese pay for all the ore they get, and consequently have as much right to carry it away as any one else. Nor is it mentioned that the Han Yeh Ping Co., which owns the Tayeh mines, was in danger of becoming bankrupt, when it was taken up by Japanese capitalists, the mines put under Japanese managers and made into a going concern.

MOTOR-CAR ACCIDENTS IN HONGKONG

Four in One Evening But No Fatalities

Hongkong, Aug. 20.

A series of motor accidents occurred yesterday evening in the New Territories.

The first motor-car, belonging to Mr. S. A. Lopes, went over the embankment on the Castle Peak Road. Mrs. Lopes was badly shaken, while Mr. Jorge Silva and Mrs. Vilva were seriously injured.

The second accident involved Mr. J. C. Botelho's car, which skidded and slid down the embankment on the Laichiko Road. The party were uninjured.

The third, a party of Europeans out on a joy-ride, came to grief on the New Territory Road but escaped unscathed.

The fourth, a Kowloon motor-bus, collided with a verandah pillar on Nathan Road. A Chinese woman had her leg fractured.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

It has been agreed between the Presidency and the Cabinet to appoint Tang Tsai-li to proceed to Urga as a Special Envoy to confer with the Urga Government on the latter's future status.

MORE PROGRESS IN SHENSI

Lunghai Railway to Be Extended to Sianfu: Belgian and Five Chinese Banks Concerned

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug. 12.

Although the agreement between the Banque Belge pour l'Etranger and a group of Chinese banks to extend the Lunghai Railway to Sianfu is stated to be still awaiting final signature and official sanction, there is no reason to suppose that there will be any hitch in the completion of the negotiations. The loan, it is understood, is to be in two instalments, the first issue totalling $5,000,000, with another $7,500,000 when needed. The participating Chinese banks are the Bank of China, the Bank of Communications, the Kincheng Banking Corporation, the Salt Industrial Bank, and the China and South Seas Bank. The inclusion of the last-named bank is interesting. To the observer of economic developments in this country, nothing has been more hopeful in the last few years than the activities of Chinese overseas merchants in industrial and banking enterprises in China. The China and South Seas Bank is one of the youngest and at the same time the strongest of these enterprises. Already it has a paid-up capital of five million dollars, and is now calling up another two and a half millions.

It is to be hoped that the Lunghai Railway will be pushed through into Shensi province without delay. The extension to Shenchow, the present western terminal in Honan province, was reached some months ago, and it brought the railway within about 60 miles of the border. With its entry into Shensi territory, the line will introduce the iron road to one of the richest provinces in the country, and will break up the isolation which has hitherto blocked economic intercourse with its eight or nine million people.

Shensi's Isolation.

Despite its vast agricultural wealth and a purchasing power unimpaired by floods and only occasionally disturbed by drought, Shensi has been more or less cut off from the outer world by the difficulty of communication. The usual trade route into the province is viâ Tungkuan from Loyang. To reach Loyang, goods are consigned form Hankow to Chengchow by the Peking-Hankow Railway, thence to Shenchow along the Lunghai Railway, the remaining distance to the capital of the province being accomplished overland either by country cart or pack mule. The Han river and its tributaries are also used, but this method involves a long trail over the hills south of Sianfu.

Such means of transport are necessarily long and costly, and it is said that it is cheaper for the Hankow flour mills to import wheat from the Pacific coast of America than to bring wheat down from the Weipeh region of Shensi province, which is one of the granaries of northern China. Notwithstanding the long journey across the Pacific and up the Yangtze, Hankow finds that American or Canadian wheat costs less in transportation than the wheat of Shensi—a lesson in itself of the urgent need for communications in China.

Big Profits in Sight.

The laying of the strip of line from Shenchow to Sianfu, spanning a distance of about 200 miles, will mean a big increase in the export of materials and the import of manufactured articles. It is estimated that when Sianfu is reached, the earning capacity of the line will be doubled. This grand trunk line from east to west is vitally associated with the development of China. The Lunghai is destined to be a carrier of the utmost importance. Now that Shensi province is within measurable distance of being breached, one may look forward to the time when Kansu likewise will be invaded by the railway and its riches tapped for the benefit of China and the world at large. But that day is yet far off.

The eventual terminal of the Lunghai-Lanchow line reaches out into the far west, but this throwing out of extensions to right and left is evidence that some day the Kansu capital, too, will be overtaken. Then the territory right up to China's western frontier will send tribute to the ports on the eastern seaboard without recourse to any but railway means of transportation.

EMPEROR'S UNCLE AT THE PRESIDENCY

Peking, Aug. 15.

Prince Tsai Tao, the Manchu Emperor's uncle, has been appointed Chief of the Mongolian Guard of Honour attached to the Presidency.

The Mongolian Guard was originally the Emperor's bodyguard, but President Yuan Shih-kai took it over for service at the Presidential Mansion. Prince Tsai Tao has been the chief of the ex-Emperor's Manchu bodyguards since the downfall of the Manchus.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CANADIAN CHARTER FOR CHINA UNIVERSITY

First of Its Kind Ever Granted in a Foreign Land: Powers to Confer Degrees

From a Correspondent.

Tsinan, Aug. 11.

Telegraphic information has just been received from Canada that the Governor-General last week affixed his signature to a Bill which has passed through the Dominion Parliament, conferring a Charter upon the Shantung Christian University, Tsinan. Although many Universities and colleges in China have been incorporated under American laws, and have received American charters, this is probably the first instance of a British charter being granted to an institution not on British soil, and affords interesting proof of the new relations which are developing between Canada and China.

The University which has been marked out for this signal honour has a somewhat unusual history. Commencing 20 years ago with the amalgamation of the higher educational work of two missions in Shantung—the English Baptist and American Presbyterian North—it has now grown to be the largest example of co-operative effort that has so far been attempted in China in the sphere of education. No less than 12 mission boards—five English, one Canadian and six American—are uniting their forces in maintaining the University; the buildings and equipment, contributed by interested friends in the United States, Great Britain, Canada and China, represent a total value of over a million dollars. The annual income, similarly contributed, is to-day approximately $325,000, whilst the present administrative staff and faculty of the University consist of 23 Englishman and Scotsmen, 24 Americans, 4 Canadians and 24 Chinese, and includes graduates of no less than 31 different Universities.

It will be noticed from the above figures that whereas most of the Universities established by Westerners in China depend for their maintenance, wholly or almost wholly, upon American supporters, the Shantung Christian University is in the interesting position of being staffed almost equally from Great Britain, the United States and China, Canada holding the balance between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. This fact lends a peculiar significance to the action which has been taken in incorporating the University in Canada, and securing a charter from the Dominion Government, especially in view of the growing reciprocity, in the recognition of University degrees, between Great Britain and Canada on the one hand, and between Canada and the United States on the other. By the terms of the chater a Board of Governors will now be appointed, upon which the various interests co-operating in the support of the University will be represented, and with headquarters at Toronto. A set of by-laws are being drawn up, describing the constitution of the University, and powers have now been conferred upon the institution giving it authority to grant such degrees as are in accordance with the laws of China to all students who satisfactorily pass its examinations and reach a scholastic standard comparable to that required by similar Universities in Canada.

FROM THE WILDS OF YUNNAN

Washington, July 13.

Thrilling stories of adventure and interesting scientific discoveries have been reported to the National Geographical Society by Mr. Joseph F. Rock, discover of the chaulmoogra tree that yields a leprosy-combating oil, and leader of the society's expedition into Yunnan, a vast and little explored province in southwestern China.

Mr. Rock, who is also a well-known plant authority, has just returned to Washington. In narrating his experiences, he tells of finding in Yunnan aboriginal tribes who still practice religious ceremonies that pre-date the introduction of Buddhism, and of the discovery of a blight-resisting chestnut tree, which, it is hoped, will aid in restoring the diseased chestnut timber crop in the United States.

The explorer brought back some 1,700 specimens of birds, 500 mammal specimens and more than 60,000 plants. He also came into possession of books used by the Nashi, or Moso, priests, containing ancient writing in picture form. The books also ante-date Buddhism in China and Tibet and include the story of a great flood.

During his adventures Mr. Rock traversed a hitherto unexplored gorge of the Yangtze River, described as much deeper than the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. The crossing of streams presented one of the most difficult problems of the expedition, Mr. Rock and his 23 native assistants and pack animals having to be swung across them on single-strand rope bridges. The party also had narrow escapes from bandits along the China-Tibet frontier.

Later.

Experiments with the species of chestnut tree brought from Yunnan, China, by Mr. Joseph F. Rock, discoverer of the Chaulmoogra tree, are being conducted by the Department of Agriculture in the hope of restoring the Chestnut timber resources of the United States.

The Yunnan tree is said to be immune from the blight which is threatening to wipe out the American variety east of the Mississippi River within 25 years. The tanning industry in the United States already is feeling the loss of the thick bark produced by the Chestnut tree, which has an important function in the preparation of leather, and the Chinese variety is described as equally valuable for this purpose.—Reuter's American Service.

MUKDEN'S NEW HOTEL

Mukden, Aug. 12.

Several tenders have been submitted for the erection of the new Yamato Hotel, Mukden, among which is one by a well known firm of architectural engineers with branches in Peking and Mukden.

The site chosen for the edifice is the corner plot of ground facing the Japanese monument, between the main road and the road towards the Japanese park.

A new hotel in Mukden has been a long felt want, as the present one is admittedly inadequate.

Although not so convenient for travellers from the point of view of proximity to the station platform, the new hotel in its more rural detachment, should still be popular. There is to be a dining room to seat 300 persons, with other smaller dining rooms, a huge auditorium from the main to the second floor of mezzanine, a terraced first floor and balcony, a Japanese garden and above that again a crescent-shaped roof-garden, with two kiosks on either side.

CANTON MERCENARIES FALL OUT

Shameen, Aug. 14.

Fighting which lasted four hours occurred to-day between two factions of Yunnanese troops in Canton and the suburb of Tungshan. The casualties were light.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOCIAL HYGIENE IN THE FAR EAST

London, Aug. 16.

The Colonial Office has appointed an advisory committee on social hygiene, to be presided over by Lord Arnold and including Lady Astor, M. P., to inquire particularly into the measures connected with public morality at Hongkong, Singapore, Canton and other Far Eastern ports where there are British Settlements. The committee is empowered to add special Colonial representatives.—Reuter.

HANKOW FERRY FRACAS

Company's Servants Released but Local Indignation Unabated

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, Aug. 12.

The issue between Mr. Hsu Feng, the Hsiakeo Chief of Police, and the Ho Ch'uin Ferry Boat Co. is still arousing public interest. The three servants of the company who were so roughly arrested have been released after two or three days in the Hsiakeo gaol. But the case is by no means regarded as settled. The Ho Ch'uin Co. has already sent in a statement of their version of the affair to the civil yamên. It is said that the Hankow Merchant's Guild is prepared to take up the matter. The general feeling is, that Mr. Hsu Feng has much exceeded his authority, and that he ought to be punished as an example to other officials who disregard civil liberties.

In view of the increasing number of robberies in Hankow, the shopkeepers are planning to form a Self-Protection Association. Each guild is to send its representative to the meetings of the association, and they are seeking recognition from the officials as a legally constituted society. One of their schemes is, that each member of the society is to carry a police whistle on his person so that he can summon the police to his rescue in case of need. They are also to report immediately to the police authorities any characters who seem to be suspicious; and to demand at once the arrest of any whom they believe to be engaged in criminal operation.

GRAND CANAL DYKE BREAKS

60,000 Homeless in Enhsien, Shantung: Yangtze Falling at Hankow

The latest information received from Shantung by the China International Famine Relief Committee shows that the break in the Grand Canal dyke has already flooded over 150 villages in the Enhsien area. At least 60,000 people, whose crops are totally destroyed, have been affected.

Two reassuring reports have been received from different parts of the country C. I. E. R.

The first information is from Foochow and points out that although the damage in the district of Yuchi was estimated as amounting to over $12,000,000, this figure has not yet been verified and may prove to have been exaggerated. Other districts, however, have not yet reported so that the situation still remains uncertain until eye-witness's accounts become available.

A telegram has also been received from the Commission's representative in Hankow in which he states that the Yangtze river is steadily falling and has already receded three feet below its highest point this year. It will will be remembered that at one time it had flooded the river front of most of the Concessions and considerable anxiety was being felt as to its further progress.

Fifty Indians arrived in Hongkong last week to join the Hongkong Police Force as ships' guards. Most of the men have seen military service. A number of them are experienced Lewis gunners and these should prove an asset to the present force of guards. After a period of about six weeks' training as Lewis gunners the recruits will be used to replace a number of police at present doing duty on coastal vessels.

THE FAR EASTERN PRESS

Sir Roderick Jones' Tribute to Ourselves: Hongkong's Future

Sir Roderick Jones, chairman of Reuter's who has lately returned from a trip round the world, was the guest of the London District of the Institute of Journalists, at the monthly house luncheon on July 22, and in responding to his health said:—

Reuter's was not an individual but rather a combination of the spirit and effort of a fine body of men. Of the multitude of impressions which he brought back from the Far East, one of the most predominant was the influence of the English standard of journalism there. The newspapers everywhere, not only the English ones, but those of Japan and China. and equally so those of India, printed in the vernacular of the different countries, were taking more and more the English newspapers of the best type as their standard. In Japan and China there was a sincere desire, while making their papers extremely bright, to keep away from what was called "Yellow Journalism." The disposition was that while making their newspapers extremely bright, and this was very noticeable among the Chinese, at the same time more and more to attain to a higher standard of journalism than the one from which they had started. In Peking they had scores of newspapers, which was perfectly absurd. Every politician who had any money started a newspaper. (Laughter.) He had told a party of Chinese journalists in Peking that they wanted but a fraction of the newspapers they had, so that they would get much stronger newspapers, for the result of having so many was that none of them was really a strong newspaper, either financially or from the point of view of independence. He believed they were going to get away from that.

They had to go to Japan to find what he might call the best journalism as distinct from English newspapers. He confessed he had never realised before the importance of newspapers like the "Asahi" and the "Mainichi," of Osaka, which had circulations in the neighbourhood of 1,000,000 a day, and had splendid offices, plant, and general equipment. Their staffs were on the highest level. The Chinese journalists looked primarily to the English press of the Far East as a standing example to the rising journalists of China. He was sure that in the course of the next 20 years they would see enormous developments in the young journalism of China, which was not more than 20 or 30 years old. The "North-China Daily News" and the "Peking and Tientsin Times," and other English papers were standing examples of good papers, an important thing from the point of view of our national pride.

Another strong impression was made on his mind by Hongkong. Eighty years ago it was a barren rock off the mainland, when refugees from Canton made it their sanctuary. It was now the second largest port in the Empire, and from the point of ship tonnage the greatest port in the world. It was a most wonderful example of British trade development, and penetration, and the citadel of British trade in the Far East. One could not see what had been done there without a feeling of extraordinary pride, and the conviction that whatever its detractors might say the British Empire was responsible for a very great achievement. It was a monument to British enterprise and also to British idealism, for its establishment and peaceful progress were primarily the result of trade. In the course of the next 20 years, when China had become more settled, British manufacturers, traders, and financiers must keep an eye on Hongkong and the Far East. That was his advice to them, and if it was a free advertisement for Hongkong he gave it without the slightest hesitation. (Applause.)

The str. Tung On, recently built at Taikoo Docks for the Tung On Company, made her maiden trip to Canton on the 10th instant, returning to Hongkong on Monday. The steamer's takings for the first two journeys are being devoted to the Tung Wah Hospital Food Relief Fund.

THE DROUGHT IN KIANGSU

Fifty Per Cent. of the Crops Already Ruined

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wusih, Ku., Aug. 19.

There has been no rain in Wusih for two months, and the consequent damage to crops has been very great. The pitifully exhausting labour of pumping water from the rapidly diminishing canals, under the burning sun, will serve only to save 50 per cent. of the crop even if rain comes immediately and there is no sign whatever of its coming soon. No cattle is being killed in the city for three days, at the end of which, if no rain is forthcoming, another fast of five days' duration will be observed.

Canal Travel de Luxe.

The long expected launch service between Wusih and Huchow began on August 3. The gentry and officials from the two cities were invited to enjoy free trips for five days. Feasts, plain meals or tea were also served, free of cost, to the fortunate guests. I have not seen the boat but it is said to be excellent, comparing well with the river steamers. Foreign and Chinese meals may be had on board. The launches leave Huchow at 7 a.m. daily, reaching Wusih at noon. They leave for the return trip at 2 p.m., reaching Huchow about 7 p.m. The fares are private cabin, $2.50; First-class, $1.20; Second-class, 80 cents; Third-class, 40 cents;

The new electric light plant was put in operation about July 10. The power comes from Tsishuyen, about 20 miles north of Wusih and eight from Changchow. The lights are very fine, but the 24 hour plan had to be abandoned, owing to waste, and the current is now on from 2 p.m. to 5 a.m.

Exchange is very low; thirteen ten-cent pieces to a dollar. Much counterfeit silver coin is in circulation. Merchants have bought 20 thousand 20-cent pieces from other provinces to put into circulation here.

BOLSHEVISTS IN CANTON

Canton, Aug. 11.

The Kuomintang Government in Canton, while unable formally to receive the credential from the Soviet Consul-General coming to Canton, will accord him unofficial recognition, as has been done to the German Consul here. The Canton Government does not recognize any act of the Peking Government, with which the Russians signed a treaty recently. For a long time, however, the Russian Reds have maintained a representative in Canton in the person of Mr. M. Borodin, who is also an adviser to the Kuomintang Political Party. The decision to accord the Russians unofficial recognition was arrived at at a meeting of the General Headquarters of Dr. Sun Yat-sen on August 7.

Germans Regaining Foothold.

For a long time the Germans and the Russians have been befriended in Canton by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, who is having several of them as personal and political advisers. A German is being engaged by the Canton municipality as adviser and another by the police in Canton as instructor of the military police force. Both the Russians and the Germans formerly maintained consulates in Shameen, the Canton foreign concession, but these buildings since the war have gone into the hands of private owners.

In the case of the Germans in Canton, the Canton Government is forsaking the legal jurisdiction over them as was once assumed in the case of M.M. de Corbat during the régime of General Chen Chiung-ming in the latter part of 1922, when this German was accused of being connected with an explosion of a bomb in front of a Canton newspaper office which killed several persons. The accused was tried and freed by the Canton District Court. The German firm of Reuter, Broeckelmann & Co. is bringing a suit for $16,552.48 against a Chinese through the German Consulate instead of through the Canton District Court. It is also understood that the Canton Bureau of Foreign Affairs has accepted despatches from the German Consulate and filed them relative to this case similarly with those from other consulates which still exercise territorial jurisdiction in China.

Germans are regaining a foothold in Canton. While they are not welcomed in Shameen as residents, they have found the many modern office buildings along the Bund of the native city good enough and, in many cases, better than those of Shameen. At present, when the strike is still in progress in Shameen and the Chinese labour element supporting the Kuomintang Political Party is boycotting the foreign concession, the Germans are finding themselves quite safe.

For their homes, the Germans and the Russians are residing in Tungshan, a new suburb of new-style houses east of Canton. Formerly Americans resided there mostly, but now Germans and Russians dominate. At first the committee in charge of the Shameen strike proposed to include Tungshan as its boycotted area also, but, on learning that many advisers of their political chief were living there, the members of the committee called the threat off.—Reuter.

MOUNTAIN RESORT OF SZECHUAN

The Simple Life on Douglas Heights and Cheap to Boot

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Douglas' Heights, Sze., Aug. 1924.

This is one of the summer resorts, adjacent to the cities of Junghsien, Jenshow, Tzeliutsing and Tsichow, being a half day or less from Junghsien and about a day and a half or perhaps 50 miles from the others. The elevation is perhaps 2,500 or 3,000 ft. above sea level and over 1,500 ft. above the plain. The temperature is certainly 10 to 20 degrees cooler than the plain and this allows one to proceed with work, study, letter writing or reading without great discomfort.

This hill was bought in 1910 by one of our Mission and named after his son Douglas. The Chinese name is "High Stone Steps" and it is well chosen. There are perhaps 50 acres but very irregular, with a number of hillocks. It is bound by precipitious cliffs from one to two hundred ft. high, covered with a dense growth of small trees, pine being in excess. In some places this hill is not 100 ft. wide. There are no Chinese living on the hill as the ground is unfit for cultivation, even corn. Water is naturally scarce.

It was divided into 10 plots and cost about $88. silver each. Adjacent sites have been secured, a church, a school and 16 bungalows have been built. The bungalows are mostly a living room, two bedrooms a kitchen and much verandah, built of adobe or mud, board floored, lime ceiled, glassless windows and roofed with tile, costing from $500 to $1,000 silver.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS' MUTINY

203 Found Guilty and Sentenced to Five Years' Imprisonment

Manila, Aug. 21.

The court-martial of the 209 Philippine scouts at Fort McKinley, which opened on the 29th of last month, ended to-day. Two hundred and three scouts were found guilty on charges of mutiny, and were dishonourably discharged, with forfeit of pay and allowances, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment each. Six men were acquitted.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE STEAMER IN DISTRESS

Tokyo, Aug. 20.

It is reported from Moji that the Kokusai Kisen Kaisha's Ryufuku Maru is in danger of sinking off Goto Islands owing to a storm. The Kitano Maru is hurrying to the rescue. The Ryufuku Maru was bound for Yawata from Singapore with a cargo of ore.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

"DESTINATION TAX"

Hangchow Oil Companies' Burden: Exhibition Promoters in the City

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Aug. 19.

The President of the Exhibition Mr. Li S-oh, a Ningpo man, is in town, feasting officials and generally creating interest in the forthcoming Exhibition, plans of which are on a very large scale.

The people who live on the proposed site of the Exhibition happen to be poor and are up in arms against the project. Yesterday they sent deputies to see the Civil Governor and petitioned him to choose another site. If present plans are adhered to, some 200 small houses will have to be pulled down, and 400 people will have to find homes elsewhere—not a very easy job at present.

The people are now beginning to talk about the invasion of Chêkiang by surrounding provinces, but the feeling is entertained that the Chêkiang and Kiangsu gentry in Shanghai will bring about a peaceful agreement. In the past they have proved peace-makers and they are not likely to fail this time.

The tea trade here is very brisk this year, thmousands of chests being exported to Shanghai by rail. The drought unfortunately still continues and the rice crop is endangered except where the fields are near canals and the water can be pumped on to them.

The oil companies still refuse to pay the "destination tax." As a result trade is practically at a standstill. Those who use oil engines for power and light are very much inconvenienced.

SHANGHAI NEWS

AMERICAN MINISTER INTERVIEWED

Diplomatic Body's Lack of Unanimity: Powers no Longer Acting in Concert

Interviewed last Friday by the "North-China Daily News" shortly after his arrival from Peking, Dr. Jacob G. Schurman, the U.S. Minister to China, stated emphatically that he was not resigning from the diplomatic service, as some of our contemporaries had reported, nor was his purpose in going on furlough a political one. He did not propose to do any campaigning in the coming presidential elections, as some people had suggested.

"I shall," continued Dr. Schurman, "spend a month in the journey to the eastern cities, spending most of my two months in America in New York and Boston, and then occupy another month back to Peking. I am to be at my post again by December 15. I do not intend to make any political moves in America. It is a holiday that I am entitled to and which the Department of State demands that its servants partake of, usually every two years, though I have been here three.

Questioned as to the significance of the Hawley murder and the heroic measures of the Commander of H. M. S. Cockchafer, the Minister declined to commit himself, even though he was assured that informal remarks on this subject had already been delivered by high authorities intimately associated with the Legations.

Diplomatic Body's Changing Status.

With regard to the elevation of M. Karakhan to the post of Ambassador, Dr. Schurman believed that the Diplomatic Body, which in the past had played such an important part in the government of China, was as a body becoming more akin to those in other countries, the principal function of the Doyen of which was to present his colleagues at the annual reception given by the ruler. The Peking body now very rarely acted as a unit, but instead various groups looked after interests of their respective countries. For instance in the recent agitation of Peking for a 10 per cent. Customs Famine sur-tax only representatives of signatories to the Customs Conventions participated, and reported favourably to their governments on the proposed measure, while only the Protocol Powers to the Boxer Indemnity were concerned in the question of the Russian Legation. At the time when Dr. Koo made representations concerning the rendition of the Mixed Court, he invited only those powers enjoying extra-territoriality to confer with him. The various groups did not report to the Diplomatic Body before exchanging notes with the Chinese Government. There might not be a meeting of the Corps for an entire year, so the appointment of M. Karakhan to an Ambassadorship, might be of social influence only.

Boxer Indemnity Funds.

Whether the Boxer Indemnity funds to be returned to China were to be used, as Marshal Wu Pei-fu had suggested, in the construction of railways, the income of which was to be devoted to educational purposes, was not a political question, but rather an economic one, which would be adjusted by a commission who have employed experts to make recommendations. From the standpoint of western civilization, such an investment for schools must be in the nature of a trust fund and the enterprises in which funds are placed must be "gilt-edged." In many states the legislature itself specifically stipulated those railways which might be used as repositories for funds. But are railways in China "gilt edge?"

Although when the first half of the indemnity was remitted in 1908, there was nothing officially stated in either Washington or Peking, but China intimated it would use the moneys in the building of schools, etc. The preamble of the present edict leaves the remittance at the discretion of the President of the United States, and it was the scheme of the Chinese Government according to advices sent to Mr. Hughes by Dr. Sze, to provide a commission, composed of Americans and Chinese to administer the remittances, according to the report of the experts, probably for the foundation of scientific schools.

The Minister was very emphatic when questioned about the possible recurrence of a Lincheng affair or the murder of missionaries and travellers and declared that not until China had a government as strong and central as that which existed during the monarchy, would the likelihood of further outrages diminish.

WEDDINGS

Blanford-Nathan

The marriage took place at H. M. Consulate-General, Tientsin, on Saturday, between Mr. John Stephen Blanford, D.F.C., (late R.A.F. and the Buffs), eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Blanford, of St. Hubert's Lodge, Watford, England, and Maude d'Avigdor, elder daughter of Mr. G. Nathan, O.B.E., and Mrs. Nathan, of Tientsin and London. Mr. J. W. O. Davidson, acting for Mr. W. P. Ker, C.M.G., officiated.

Following the civil ceremony, a reception was held at the Tientsin Lyceum Club, where the health of the bride and bridgeroom, proposed by her cousin, Mr. E. J. Nathan, was enthusiastically drunk. A very large gathering of relatives and friends were present to offer their congratulations to the happy young couple. Mrs. Blanford looked radiant in white crêpe de chine with deep fringe, and wearing a white georgette hat. Her mother was in fawn-coloured crêpe de chine, with a black hat, contrasting prettily with her daughter's gay bridal dress.

The newly-married couple are spending their honeymoon at Chinwangtao and in Peking. Mrs. Blanford's going-away dress was of grey crêpe de chine with turban hat to match. After the honeymoon they will return to Ningpo, where Mr. Blanford is stationed with the A. P. C.

Hsu-Wong

The marriage between Miss Li Sung-wong, second daughter of Mr. H. T. Wong, who is prominently identified with the activities of the Commercial Press, Ld., and Mr. Paquan S. Hsu, took place on Wednesday afternoon in the new Commercial Press Club House.

The Rev. Mr. Chung Koo-too officiated. Prof. Johnson Seng, a colleague of Mr. Hsu, was best man, while the sister of the bride acted as the maid of honour.

The bride is a graduate of McTyeire School and has been teaching music in her Alma Mater during the last few years. The bridegroom is a Professor of Economics at Nanyang University. After graduating from Nanyang as a civil engineer 11 years ago, he was sent to America by the Minister of Communications to investigate the running of railways in that country. He became successively connected with the Santa Fe Railway, the Illinois Central Railway Co., the Mississippi Valley Railroad Co., the Continental Commercial Bank and other commercial and banking institutions. While in the States, he also found time to make advanced studies in bridegroom is a Professor of finance, in such institutions as the University of Chicago, etc. He is a holder of the Master Degree in economics from the Ohio State University.

PEKING is hesitating to respond to a request by the Chinese authorities in Shanghai asking for $100,000 for the repatriation of Russian refugees, says the "Journal of Commerce," fearing that the money may fall into the hands of the Soviet."

MISS Irene Campbell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Campbell, of 109 Rue Massenet, left on Saturday by the President Taft for America, where she will enter Oberlin College. A large gathering from the Memorial Summer School for Chinese Girls, where Miss Campbell has taught for two summers, were among the friends who were on the jetty to say good-bye.

AMERICAN CHINA TRADE ACT

Mr. Frank Rhea Tells of Efforts to Place Americans on Equality with Others

Mr. Frank Rhea, Registrar of the China Trade Act, Department of Commerce, U. S. A., has just returned to Shanghai after a year spent in the United States, mostly in Washington, in the interests of American business in China. The object of his trip, Mr. Rhea told a representative of the "North-China Daily News," was to have the China Trade Act amended so as to put American business interests resident in China on an equal footing, from the standpoint of taxation, with other nationals in China, especially as regards accounting as agents for American manufacturers. None of the other nationals residing and doing business in China under extraterritorial rights is subject to home taxation, while American interests pay federal taxation in full, which arrangement is sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, of May 5, 1924.

The effect of the above decision, according to Mr. Rhea, is that American merchants resident in China not only are confronted with commutation of the products of other nationals, but are subject to the competition of other nationals acting as agents for American manufacturers of competing lines. The other nationals, not being subject to Chinese taxes, their own home taxes, or the American federal tax, can undersell the American agent, who, while not being subject to Chinese taxes, is subject in full to his own home tax.

A Favourable Report.

The proposed amendment to the China Trade Act to overcome the above handicaps in a measure has been reported upon favourably by the House Committee of the Judiciary and approved by the House Committee on Ways and Means. It now stands well up at the head of the legislative calendar of the House, and it is hoped will receive favourable action early in the coming session of Congress, opening on December 1. An identical Bill has been introduced in the Senate. On account of its being a revenue measure, it must first be passed by the House, after which it is hoped that the Senate also will take prompt action.

Mr. Rhea states that the question of taxation, both Federal and State, is causing a great amount of discussion in the United States at the present time. It is true that the new Revenue Act of 1924 gives the individual subject to the federal income tax a very considerable measure of relief, although no relief has been given from State taxation, which in most States is increasing rather than decreasing.

Small Corporations Menaced.

The new Revenue Act gives no relief whatever to corporations from federal taxation. In fact, instead of relief, in a number of instances, it involves considerable additional burden in the form of computations of income tax returns in the elaborate accounting necessarily imposed in this connexion. Some authorities go so far as to state that the tendency of corporation taxes will be to drive the small corporations out of existence. This probably is an overstatement and while many features of the accounting requirements are unduly burdensome, against this it may be said that the accounting requirements of the Bureau of Internal Revenue compel corporations to keep their accounts to show whether their business is being done in black or red figures, and as the Bureau is more interested in the results shown in black, their requirements are probably unduly minute on that side. Nevertheless, the corporations, by meeting these requirements, are able to tell the parts of their business which are done in red figures. This seems to justify the statement that the corporations only are being required to keep their accounts to the extent of being able to tell whether they are doing business at a profit or a loss.

One of the points which should be given careful consideration, continued Mr. Rhea, in connexion with the federal taxation requirements for American businesses resident in China is the possibility of keeping accounts to meet the requirements of the Bureau as applying to home corporations. The China Trade Act, even with the proposed amendment effected, would not give the measure of relief from the exactions of accounting requirements which, it is believed, could and should be done, and will have to be done, if American interests resident here are to be placed on the same footing ultimately with their competitors of other nations.

Mr. Rhea's stay in China is entirely dependent on the exigencies of the situation. He may return to the United States in three months and he may remain for some years.

STUDENTS BOUND FOR AMERICA

Farewell Reception: High Hopes Dimmed by China's Disarray for Them Now to Revive

A reception was held in honour of the Tsingtao College students, who are going to the U.S.A. to complete their education, on Monday afternoon at Nanyuan, the garden of the late Mr. Kan Chiu-nan, ex-Managing Director of the Nanyang Bros. Tobacco Co., by the Kiangsu Educational Association and the World's Chinese Students' Federation. About 70 guests were present. A group photograph was first taken on the lawn; while the British American Tobacco Co. took some cinematograph pictures of the gathering.

Mr. Yuan Kuan-lan of the Kiangsu Education Association presided and delivered an address, welcoming the presence of the students on behalf of the two institutions. He lightly referred to the new American law on immigration which had the effect of preventing not a few students from going there, but he was glad to learn that most of them were undaunted and bent upon going in spite of obstacles. He spoke of the ever increasing number of Chinese students completing their studies in foreign countries during the last three decades from year to year, a sign of progess in this world, and also in recognition of the necessity of bridging the gulf that separated the cultures of the West and the East.

The Faith that Failed.

Why, he asked had the public reposed implicit confidence in the foreign-educated students over 10 years ago; and why did they no longer trust them now? In a lengthy description of the disheartening conditions prevailing in China, not brought about by returned students alone but by all classes combined, coupled with the financial depression in Europe after the great war, Mr. Yuan ably sifted the causes and effects that had culminated in the present unsatisfactory situation in this country. He then gave the students some good advice as regards their duties at school and after their return to China; the difference in social, economical, and other organizations in the west should be studied; the transplanting and enforcing any of the western system and ways of control of industrial and commercial undertakings bodily in China against the Chinese usage and traditions should be avoided; and above all, they should refuse to accept any employment in which they could make no use of their special knowledge, as they or most of them had done in the past, which had been the principal cause of their failure as well as of the lack of progress and development in everything in this country.'

Responsibilities to Shoulder.

Mr. J. B. Sawyer, American Vice-Consul, shortly addressed the students, expressing his pleasure at meeting so many bright young men whom he might congratulate in advance on the brilliant career that awaited each of them. He was sure that the obstacles in their way presented by the new immigration law would soon be smoothed away.

Mr. Shih Kuang, on behalf of the Tsinghua students, made a suitable reply, thanking those present for the hearty reception accorded them, and especially for the valuable advice tendered which all of them would always keep at heart. They were quite alive to their responsibilities when abroad, and hoped to do what they could in bringing about a more intelligent understanding between West and East.

Tea was then served. After some informal chat, the meeting terminated.

Mr. Cunningham on the Sacredness of the Law

The Tsing Hua students who are shortly to sail for the United States to continue their education in various institutions, called upon Mr. Edwin S. Cunningham, U. S. Consul-General, on Wednesday morning, to pay their respects before leaving.

On being asked to address them, Mr. Cunningham expressed regret that on the passage of the new Immigration Law it became impossible to grant a visa immediately for those Chinese students who were not Boxer indemnity students. He said that the Immigration Law passed in May made the provision that all students going to the United States to study must have their applications accepted by the college and approved by the Secretary of Labour before the Consul in a foreign land could issue a non-quota visa. The law does not specify students of any nation and applies to students from any country in Europe as much as to the Chinese students.

It was to be regretted, continued Mr. Cunningham, that they could not arbitrarily defer the operation of the law for a period, but this was one of the weaknesses, although it was at the same time one of the advantages, of a republican form of government. No officer could defy or arbitrarily set aside a law which had been enacted by the people through their representatives in Congress. It would have been a pleasure to have deferred for 12 months the effectiveness of this law; but when a law was passed in a Republic, it was the voice of the people and unless repealed or held unconstitutional it must be complied with immediately.

An Object Lesson for China.

In going to the United States, Mr. Cunningham advised his young audience to keep this point in mind and said that in studying the influences which have formed the United States they would be impressed with the sacredness of the laws. Mr. Cunningham said he was sure that they would also appreciate the fact that the Secretary of Labour had done his utmost in as short a time as possible to make it possible for them to continue their studies in American Colleges.

Mr. Cunningham then urged upon the students the importance of studying the lives of those men who formed the first Congress of the United States, who constituted the first convention which passed the Declaration of Independence, and who laid the foundation for the future Republic of the United States. He advised the study of the lives of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and the Adamses with the view of adapting the doctrines advocated to China. He pointed to the self-sacrifice, the self-abnegation, the patriotism displayed and hoped that the students would bring back to their own country the lessons that these lives taught.

Position Further Simplified

Peking, Aug. 18.

A fresh telegram received by the American Legation from the State Department further simplifies the position in regard to the admission of Chinese students into the United States. The message states:—

"All Consular Officers in China, including Hongkong, may issue to bona-fide Chinese students proceeding to recognized institutions of learning a non-immigrant visa for a temporary visit. Consular Officers should inform the Department by telegraph the name of the student and the college to which he is proceeding. On their arrival in the United States their status as students will be established in accordance with the Immigration Act of 1924, Section 4E."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Canadian team at Bisley last month included Sgt. Ho Lem, a Chinese born in Canada, who is in the Canadian forces. He is a university graduate.

AROUND THE WORLD BY MOTOR CAR

Two Adventurous Travellers in Shanghai after 153,000-Mile Trip in Ford Cars

The Wanderwells, challengers in a competitive motor trip round the world, arrived in Shanghai on Monday morning from Hongkong. Conditions were such that they were unable to drive up from the south, but they are hoping to make the trip to Peking, after the first 200 miles, in their two Ford cars. When seen outside the U. S. Consulate, Capt. W. Wanderwell, and his charming sister, Miss Aloha Wanderwell, said they would be in Shanghai about a week and during that time would display their films at one of the local cinema houses.

These adventurous young people look as if they were having the time of their lives. There are only two in the party now. Miss Wanderwell, a tall, pretty girl, with short curls, whose hazel eyes are shaded with the most luxuriant of lashes, is only seventeen. She drives one car, dressing for the part in khaki knickers, outing shirt and helmet. Her brother, in shorts, O. D. shirt and overseas cap, looks equally prepared for any emergency. There are no mechanicians in the party now.

153,000-Mile Journey.

The Wanderwells have already crossed 39 countries and covered more than 153,000 geographical miles across every kind of country. Capt. Wanderwell left Detroit, Michigan, on November 27. 1921, and toured through England in the specially designed Ford car. His sister, Miss Aloha, whose name was prophetically given her from the title of the book "Aloha Round the World," joined him in France and took charge of another Ford car built in Paris. They covered every country in Europe except Austria and Scandinavia, then went through North Africa, Arabia, India, the Straits Settlements, to Hongkong and Shanghai, taking motion pictures as they went.

There are seven other units in this competition, none of them subsidized by any motor manufacturers or other concerns, for one of the requirements of the test is that every unit shall be self-supporting. The trip will end only with a world's exposition and the agreement is to drive in its gates when it is opened. The judges will decide the winner of the endurance test by the number of geographical miles and the number of countries traversed, regardless of speedometer registrations. Capt. Wanderwell's wife is conducting the first unit, driving a heavier car, as she will have nothing to do with the popular flivver. There is a family wager, legally witnessed, that the small car will outclass the more powerful car driven by Mrs. Wanderwell.

Accomplished Linguists.

The number carried as crew has varied considerably, mechanicians, interpreters and secretaries have come and gone, but only the brother and sister go on for ever. "My brother speaks ten languages, and I talk almost as much," confessed Miss Wanderwell, so we really get along pretty well in most countries. The secretaries all marry. Can't you find us one in Shanghai who will stick with the outfit? She has to be a good sport, who will enjoy the trip, know how to drive, or be willing to learn, and be able to run a typewriter as well.

She must have a face that will register well in the movies, and must be eligible to enter America."

Another member of the party who should not be overlooked is the "holy monkey," by name "Wandy," who joined the expedition in India. Wandy sits perched on the hood of the engine, fastened by a chain which allows him to run about. He is a friendly and inquiring little soul, evidently of a literary turn, for he stole the reporter's pencil. His passion is for raisins, which he munches with gusto.

Capt. Wanderwell has a keen relish for exploration and with his wife made a long trip previous to this, starting out from Atlanta, Georgia, in 1919, crossing 36 States, motoring through Mexico and much of South America. His experience at that time, however, decided him to make his next long trip in a light car.

THE MOON'S ECLIPSE

"Sirius" writes:—The eclipse of the moon, which took place on the morning of August 15, was well visible at Shanghai and throughout Eastern China. The commencement of the totality began at 3.32 a.m., local standard time, the northeastern corner being at first slightly shadowed. The dark veil then extended gradually south and at 4 a.m. nearly the whole disc was lost to view. At 4.30 nothing could be seen through the telescope. The phenomenon ended at 5.10 a.m., the moon setting some 20 minutes later, and still in the shade.

From the beginning the Chinese everywhere set up a terrible din of bombs and fire-crackers, intended to scare away some fanciful monster who endeavoured to devour the bright orb. One wonders why the University of Peking, or some other of the scientific institutions of the country, has not explained the phenomenon to the people and prevented such a vast waste of saltpetre, which would have better helped the warring factions of the country.

THE Bank of Communications has ordered from a British engraving company new bank-notes of a value of $20,000,000.

OBITUARY

Capt. H. Markham

We regret to announce the sudden death of Captain Harry Markham, who died on Monday morning at Woosung. Captain Markham was a member of the Woosung and Hankow Pilots Association. He accompanied Capt. Mennell, also a pilot in that company, on board the str. Antipullaria, which left Shanghai on Sunday at 2 p.m. While on board, Capt. Markham was taken ill, in consequence of which it was decided to return to Woosung, in order that he could receive medical assistance. On reaching Woosung, the Antipullaria was boarded by Dr. Bennett, who rendered the best assistance possible. Medical examination showed that Captain's Markham's heart was in a very bad state. It was proposed to charter a launch to take Capt. Markham to Shanghai but before this could be done he passed away.

Captain Markham had been for 20 years a pilot in Shanghai and he was formerly with Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. on their river boats. He was 47 years of age and a native of Australia. Captain Markham leaves a wife in Shanghai.

The funeral took place on Tuesday afternoon at Bubbling Well Cemetery. Among those who were present were, Mrs. Markham, Mr. and Mrs. Shepherd, (chief mourners); as representing the Woosung-Hangkow Pilots Association—Capt. E. Fuller, Capt. E. L. Gray, Capt. O. Kabelitz, Capt. R. P. Hunt, Capt. R. N. Wallace, Capt. J. Ross Young, Capt. H. E. West, Capt. G. Butland, Also present were Capt Levine, Capt. McIllwain, and Capt. A. W. Dixon. The service, which was held in the Bubbling Well Chapel and later at the grave side, was conducted by the Rev. A. C. M. Trivett. The pall-bearers were Capt. R. M. Wallace, Capt. H. J. West, Capt. J. Ross Young, Capt. G. Butland, Mr. Cabelitz and Mr. Swallow. Many beautiful wreaths of flowers were sent to the grave.

Mr. L. Ozorio

The death occurred in the General Hospital on Thursday of Leo Ozorio, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ozorio, of Cumine Road. The deceased, who was only 21 years of age, had been in hospital for a few days and succumbed to heart trouble. The news of his death will be very greatly regretted by a large circle of friends among whom he was most popular. He was a keen athlete, and latterly devoted himself to racing, being among the more successful of the young jockeys riding at Kiangwan. He achieved several successes in the colours of Mr. Edward Sheng and, in the opinion of so good a judge as Mr. Billy Hill, had a very promising future as a rider. The deceased was a member of the staff of Messrs. Bradley & Co.

FUNERAL OF MRS. McBAIN

The funeral of Mrs. R. S. F. McBain who died at Weihaiwei on Saturday took place in the Bubbling Well Cemetery on Thursday evening. A large number of Shanghai residents attended as was exemplified by the many who had to remain standing outside the Chapel during the first part of the service. The Very Rev. Dean Symons officiated. The chief mourners were Mr. R. S. F. McBain and daughters and Mr. J. Prentice. The pall bearers who bore the coffin from the Chapel to the grave side were Mr. W. R. McBain, Mr. C. McBain, Mr. E. B. McBain, Mr. R. A. Curry, Mr. J. Maxwell, Mr. E. Elmore, Mr. J. K. Brand, and Mr. J. Chollot. A very large number of beautiful wreathes were sent from sympathising friends.

MR. AND MRS. A. C. CLEAR have returned from Star Beach.

HAND-TO-HAND WITH ARMED ROBBERS

Caught in the Act: Three Taken by French Police After Desperate Encounter

The vigilance of the French Police resulted in the arrest of three men caught in the very act of committing an armed robbery in the Rue du Consulate on Monday night, though only after a brisk exchange of revolver shots and the wounding of two people.

At about half-past eleven four men, believed by the French Police to be Koreans, entered a lodging house at No. 2, Passage 22, Rue de Consulate. Three produced revolvers and intimidated the inmates of the shop into giving them the keys of the safe, at the same time ordering them to hand over any other money there might be about. One man, braver than his fellows, however, blew a police whistle, which attracted the attention of a foreign constable and a Chinese constable who were patrolling near by. They gave the alarm to the North police station and rushed to the scene. Reinforced by constables, both foreign and Chinese, from the station, they tackled the men, who opened fire upon them. The police returned the fire, hitting one of the robbers in the neck. One of the inmates of the house was struck by a bullet in the thigh. After a struggle lasting for some minutes three of the men were apprehended, the fourth making good his escape. The police, however, are at the time of writing hot on his trail, and hope to make a speedy arrest.

The wounded robber is lying in the Shantung Road hospital in a critical condition, whilst the other wounded man is also in hospital.

A thrilling hand-to-hand fight occurred during the general struggle between Chinese Constable No. 8, and one of the robbers with whom he grappled, and succeeded in disarming.

Several rounds of ammunition were found on the arrested men, though the revolers are all of a different calibre.

It is interesting to note that recently, by reason of the increased number of burglaries and armed robberies which have been occurring in the French Concession as well as the Settlement, the French police have instituted a system of patrols of foreign and Chinese detectives, who parade the Concession from six o'clock at night till six the next morning, and it was through the medium of one of these patrols that the arrests were effected in this case,—ten minutes after the the alarm was given.

SILK MERCHANTS AND THE LUXURY TAX

Proposal to Organize a Boycott of Japanese Goods

It was reported in the "Mingkuo-pao" on Wednesday that members of the Wucho Silk Merchants' Guild in Shanghai have just held a special meeting, at which nearly 200 were present, in connexion with the Japanese luxury tax. The chairman of the meeting said it was unfortunate that the Japanese Government had passed this tax upon silk and other articles which were in daily use. The amount of the tax would exceed the value of the article, and its object seemed to be to stop the business of Chinese in Japan. He pointed out that postponement of the tax for three months had been granted to all nations except China, which was an unfair action likely to cause ill-feeling.

After a lengthy discussion, the meeting resolved to organize a boycott of Japanese goods, and to approach other guilds with a view to obtaining their support.

RICHARD Walters, the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Walters of Shanghai, died at the German hospital Tsingtao on Wednesday of last week after a brief illness. Mr. Walters had returned to Shanghai after a short vacation and on his hurried return to Tsingtao was informed on his arrival that his child's illness had proved fatal. The funeral took place on Saturday.

FOUR CHINESE BANKS BREAK

A Series of Speculations Brought to a Stop by Sudden Shutting off of Loans Due to Rumours of Possible Fighting: Ordinary Business Not Affected

One of the most peaceable collapses on record occurred on Thursday. Altogether, four Chinese banks are concerned—there even may be more involved—and the loss appears to be certainly a million taels, and probably even more than that, but there was no "run," no queue of saddened and broken men, and not even a single extra policeman was required to preserve order. Indeed, outside the principal bank involved one saw nothing in front of the barred doors except 20 or more very handsome and expensive motor-cars, whilst the watchman slept heavily on his stool in the side passage.

Apparently the managers of the banks have known for some days that they would be compelled to cease business and the houses have been practically closed since Monday, but operations do not seem definitely to have come to a close until yesterday. The principal bank amongst those that have failed is the Yue Fung, of 525 Tientsin Road, a big guild bank established two years ago, with a capital of Tls. 100,000. Associated in the crash, though they are said to be independent houses and are not even in the guild, are the Yung Tseung (capital Tls. 60,000), Yung Tsong (capital Tls. 80,000) and Zong Yue (capital Tls. 40,000). They are all of very recent origin, the first having been established in May this year, the second in February and the Zong Yue about a year ago. It proved somewhat difficult to establish the total loss, but individually the banks appear to be involved in sums from Tls. 100,000 up to Tls. 400,000 and it is believed the total loss is approximately Tls. 1,500,000.

Foreign Firms Unaffected.

Foreign financial people showed very little interest in the story, declaring that the operations of these banks had hardly any effect on the market, and it is generally anticipated that several others will go the same way. Practically all the numerous small mushroom Chinese banks really are little more than loan dealers. They start on a small capital, but their daily turnover is surprisingly large and it is said that not infrequently the three smaller ones involved in the present smash had a daily business of as much as three million taels, or even on occasions five millions. Competition has become very keen, as it was bound to be with so many operators, and the smaller houses have been glad to lend money on slender security. To meet ever-recurring demands they have had to borrow amongst each other, those with a surplus one day lending it to the others and probably themselves becoming clients of the same people the day after.

Of course, somewhere in the ring there had to be banks who could successfully make appeals to the larger and more substantial houses and with the help of these it was possible the business would have continued. However, with the revival of the Chêkiang-Kiangsu war scare and the repeated reports that fighting was imminent, the larger banks considered it prudent to go easy in the matter of loans. Thus the middle banks were unable further to help the smaller ones and the ring found itself without money, so that there was no alternative but to close down. This story will explain why the shutting-down proceeded so peacefully, for it is unlikely that there is any considerable number of individual depositors concerned. They all have been run on an unlimited partnership basis. Several meetings were held yesterday and a foreign legal practitioner has been called in as liquidator.

The Dollar Rises.

One effect of the failure has been substantially to increase the native rate of interest. Also it has to some extent influenced the dollar rate, though the rise in this is more due to the rumours of an impending war than to the failure of the banks. The over-issue of the Bank of China in the spring has created a demand for silver and speculators also are counting on the prospective call for silver with which to promise to pay the troops should there be fighting, the result being that the bank rate has risen from 70½ to 74.

In some quarters the banks are said to have become heavily involved through speculation in domestic bonds, the Exchange for which yesterday was closed to business. The following fluctuations have been noted in these bonds:—

Aug. 16, 9th yr. quoted	90
„ 20, 9th yr. quoted	78
„ 16, 7th yr. quoted	70
„ 20, 7th yr. quoted	60

6 per cent. Consolidateds have fallen from 80 to 64.

THE CHINESE VIEW

War Rumours But a Small Part

The present crisis in banking circles is a result of both economic and political instability. The rumours of war between Chêkiang and Kiangsu naturally have caused a certain stir in financial circles, but the bankruptcy of the native banks cannot be attributed entirely to this cause since otherwise the failures would have been more numerous and would have affected larger institutions. The war rumours are not likely to affect banking in Shanghai because business has not been particularly active during the past two or three months and the larger, modern banks have placed themselves in a position to meet the shock of bad times. It was suggested yesterday in Chinese banking circles that not one of the modern banks of this city would in any way suffer even should a war occur between the two provinces because there is no business anyhow.

$96,000,000 Loan Gambling.

No general cause can be laid down for the failure of the native banks at this time, except mismanagement and a misunderstanding of the banking business. Many of the native banks are little more than "cash shops," living largely upon dollar-taels-coppers exchange with an occasional speculation in government bonds. There is no use for them to speculate in the sound government bonds because they have "no odour," that is, no money can be made out of their normal fluctuations. Recently there has been a flurry in the $96,000,000 loan in Peking and Tientsin, approximately $5,000,000 having been lost by native banks in those cities. It is widely believed among Chinese bankers that some of the Shanghai native banks have participated in this speculation and have lost heavily thereby. It will be remembered that the $96,000,000 loan which was made in the early months of 1922, when Chang Hu was Minister of Finance, was then roundly criticised as an unsound proposition. These bonds have at present no security although it is assumed that some day should there be an available salt surplus, it may be used for the securing of this indebtedness. There can be no explanation of an increase in the value of these bonds at the present time or at any time except that a group of speculators are fixing the markets for their own benefit.

Without government supervision of banks, it is impossible to prevent these occasional bankruptcies from taking place. Banks are organized without hindrance whenever times are good. The native banks usually have no charters and operate as partnerships of unlimited liability. The modern and foreign banks consider it sound business to desposit funds with these native banks at a higher rate of interest during periods of business depression when money is loose, because the individual shareholders of the banks are bound to stand all the losses, which they usually do, if they desire to continue to do business in Shanghai. Nevertheless, were there effective government supervision of banks conditions would probably improve. As a banker put it, however, the government would have to improve first.

Cycles in Panic.

Another Chinese theory of the situation is that cycles of 10 years affect business in Shanghai. The last panic was the 1913-14 panic following the rubber losses of 1910. After this panic business steadily improved until the wonderful year of 1919. Thereafter there was a slump, due to overconfidence, exaggerated ideas, extravagance, mismanagement, inexperience, every year getting worse, until now the bottom is being reached.

SENSATIONAL AFFAIR IN CHAPEI

Motor Car Bandits' Attack on Manager of Commercial Press One Injured and Two Dead

A sensational affair occurred in Chapei about 8 a.m. on Thursday According to his usual custom, Mr. Y. C. Bau, managing director of the Commercial Press Ld., who resides in Paoshan Road at no great distance from the company's works, set off from his house to walk to the office. He had proceeded only a few yards from the house when he was approached by a Chinese, armed with a revolver, who stopped him abruptly and demanded a loan, several thousands of dollars being asked for. Mr. Bau replied that he had no money on him and asked the man to accompany him to his office, but this suggestion of course did not appeal to the bandit.

The latter had a confederate in waiting, in a motor car drawn up in an alleyway near by, and on a signal being given, the second man rushed on the scene and Mr. Bau was secured and forced into the car, then driven off along the Tien Tung An Road. Upon starting off, Mr. Bau made an attempt to grapple with the men and in the struggle a revolver was fired, wounding him in the upper part of the left arm. Fortunately, the wound was not a serious one. With the car proceeding at reduced speed along the narrow road, Mr. Bau was gripped by both men, with his hands forced behind him, but he managed to escape from this predicament. Asking that he might be allowed to remove his long gown, he was given a moment's freedom and used it to good purpose, vaulting clean over the side of the car and landing in a ditch.

At this juncture, servants from Mr. Bau's house, who had seen something of the incident, came along, reinforced by a crowd of Chinese, and the alarm being raised was such that the bandits deemed it advisable to abandon their scheme and look to escape. One of them immediately left the car and disappeared, his quick move being assisted by the prevailing excitement. The other man remained in the car and proceeded some little way along the road, but quickly found that he had taken the wrong turning, the road narrowing into an alleyway which effectually blocked further progress. Seeing the way thus barred, the bandit jumped from the car and ran, but first he turned on a number of policemen now in pursuit and fired a shot, with such accuracy that one of the officers received a fatal wound. The chase was continued without pause, and, seeing that he was outnumbered and that capture was inevitable, the bandit turned the revolver upon himself and fired a shot which caused instant death.

All that remained was to arrest the unfortunate chauffeur. His statement to the Chapei police, who now hold him in custody, was that that morning the two men called at a garage in the French Concession and hired the car, and neither he nor the management had any suspicion that they were bandits.

Mr. Bau is not seriously injured. He was able to return to his home after having received medical attention. The attack upon him is believed to have been inspired by no other motive than that of obtaining a substantial sum of money.

Gen. Ho Feng-lin and Mr. Hsu, Commissioner for Foreign Affairs, have asked for $100,000 to defray the expenses of returning the three Russian ships in the Huangpu to the Soviets, says a Peking news agency. The Government is reported as failing to see the justice of the claim as the ships can be handed over directly to the Russian representative in Shanghai. It is reported that the Russians want the ships taken to a Russian port.

The American Consul-General has received instructions from the Department of State that the following additional institutions have been approved by the Department of Labour for students going to America:—

The arrest of a private riesha coolie in Chaoufoong Road in the early hours on Wednesday led to a useful seizure of contrabrand arms. The coolie was found to be carrying one Mauser pistol and 100 rounds of ammunition. He stated that he was employed by a Japanese living at 115 Yangtszepoo Road and the police, accompanied by a representative from the Japanese Consulate, paid a visit to this house. Upon searching the place, they discovered 10 automatic pistols, 29 pistol magazines, two Mauser pistol barrels, and 100 rounds of ammunition. A Japanese woman who was in the house at the time of the raid was placed under arrest. The coolie was brought up at the Mixed Court later in the morning and was sentenced to a month in gaol.

WEEK-END CRICKET

Married Men Trounced by Bachelors

Married Men 108, Unmarried 174 (for 6)
S.R.C. 2nd 175 (for 7) S.C.C. 2nd 158
Portuguese S.A. 47 Police R.C. 45
Mr. Norman's XI 228 Mr. Langley's XI 121 (for 7)

On Saturday afternoon there were again four cricket matches played on the Recreation Ground. The Single Men beat the Married Men, on the S.R.C. ground, by four wickets and with a number of runs to spare; the match between Mr. Norman's XI and Mr. Langley's XI, after some fairly heavy scoring, ended in an uninteresting draw; the S.R.C. 2nd trounced the S.C.C. 2nd by three wickets and a number of unwanted runs; and in a very low-scoring game the Portuguese Sporting Association got the better of the Police by the very narrow margin of two runs.

Married v. Single.

In this match the Married Men fielded a very unrepresentative team and one not by any means the strongest which, all conditions being favourable, the husbands of Shanghai could put in the field. The eleven included only four men with any real pretensions to run-getting against good bowling—H. B. Ollerdessen, Divecha, Willis and Dr. O'Hara; while the only bowlers they had who have met with any great modicum of success this season were Dr. O'Hara and Smith. The Single Men, on the other hand, had not only a fine array of batsmen (in fact any man of the eleven with the exception of C. E. Ollerdessen, who is essentially a bowler, is capable of knocking up a useful score against good trundling) but were well served in the bowling line in addition, with such as Leach, C. E. Ollerdessen, Rawsthorne, Shroff, Clifford and Duckitt. If the result of the match was surprising, it was only in that the Married Men did not suffer a worse defeat.

CLAY PIGEON CLUBS

The Murray Cup Won by the Clay Pigeon Club: Police Second

The annual competition for the Murray Cup was decided on Sunday, all the three Shanghai trap-shooting clubs competing. The Clay Pigeon Club were the winners, totalling five points more than the Police Gun Club (last year's winners), whilst the newly-formed International Gun Club were a long way behind. The first two shot on the Clay Pigeon Club's ground and the International Gun Club at their own traps.

Weather conditions were excellent, so it is rather surprising that higher scores were not recorded. Mr. Squires was high gun of the three teams, shooting in excellent form, and only two of his breaks were with the second barrel. The following are the detailed scores:—

Fifth Test Match Abandoned Owing to Rain: Century by Hendren

London, Aug. 16.

The fifth Test Match between England and South Africa opened to-day at the Oval. The weather was fine but cloudy. There were 5,000 spectators.

Taylor won the toss and decided to go in. Hearne and Commaille opened the innings on a good wicket. Hearne was run out for 4. Commaille was bowled by Tate for 3. Susskind had made 35 when Nourse was caught off Woolley for 37. With 7 extras, the score at the lunch interval stood at 86 for 3.

The South Africans batted for 340 minutes and made a magnificent recovery. After being 2 wickets down for 7, they had made 86 for 3 at the lunch interval, and the score read 205 for 5 at the tea interval. This was largely due to Susskind's stolid and yet very correct display. He batted for nearly four hours, and made 65, including 6 fours. Catterall followed on with a brilliant all-round innings, lasting two hours. His score of 95 included 11 fours.

The English bowling maintained a good length and the fielding was very keen.

South Africa were all out for 342.

London, Aug. 18.

The fifth Test Match between the South Africans and England was resumed at the Oval to-day. Seven thousand people were present. The weather was fine but cloudy, and the wicket damp.

Sutcliffe and Hobbs opened for England. The former had made 5 runs when he was caught out. His place was taken by Hearne, whose partnership with Hobbs, lasting 63 minutes, carried the total to 72 for 2 wickets.

Woolley, who was fourth man in, gave an exhilarating displays of driving and cutting. The score at the lunch interval, with 6 extras, read 137 for 4, Sandham being 10 and Hendren 0, not out.

The bowlers, assisted at the wicket by Pegler, were very difficult to play, and the fielding was excellent.

After lunch, the English batsmen were cautious. Sandham's partnership with Hendren had yielded a further 101 runs when he was caught out. He played a careful innings and his score of 46 included 5 fours.

On Tate's advent the scoring quickened. Tate hit three boundaries in the first over and sent up the 300 with a six. The innings lasted four hours and a quarter, at the end of which the score stood at 328 for 6.

During tea, a heavy thunderstorm partly submerged the pitch and play was abandoned for the day.

Hendren has so far been lucky. He gave three chances. His score of 92 includes 11 fours.

With another 13 extras, the English score when stumps were drawn for the day read 332 for 6.

London, Aug. 19.

The fifth Test Match between the South Africans and England was resumed at the Oval to-day, but was abandoned at 2.15 owing to heavy rain.

A wet wicket delayed the start till noon. The spectators numbered 2,000. The wicket was kicking badly.

Hendren who scored 92 yesterday reached his century when his innings had lasted 140 minutes. After this the batsmen hit out. The 400 was hoisted when the English innings had lasted 5 hours and 40 minutes. Hendren gave an excellent, all-round display, with very clean cutting and driving. He was in for just over three hours, and his score of 142 included 2 sixes and 14 fours.

At the lunch interval the score stood at 421 for 8 wickets. A downpour at 12.55 inundated the pitch while lunch was taken and further heavy rain caused the match to be abandoned at 2.15.

Harlequins Beaten by South Africa by Six Wickets

Eastbourne, Aug. 14.

The weather was fine to-day and the wicket good when the match between the South African cricketers and the Harlequins was resumed. There was a moderate attendance.

The Harlequins brought their second innings total to 213 from 13 for 1. Jardine contributed 40 and Evans 42. Carter took 6 wickets for 40.

The South Africans needed 125 to win, which they made with the loss of 4 wickets. Commaille scored 68. The South Africans thus won by 6 wickets.

Scores:—Harlequins 73 and 213; South Africans 162 and 125 for 4.—Reuter.

Later.

It is understood that Mr. C. H. Gibson (Sussex) has declined the invitation to participate in the Australian tour in the Autumn, for business reasons.—Reuter.

LAWN TENNIS

Davis Cup Competition: Japan Defeated by Australia

Providence, R. I., Aug. 14.

The American zone final of the Davis Cup Competition opened today between Australia and Japan.

G. L. Patterson (Australia) beat Shimidzu (Japan), 7-5, 11-9, 6-4.

P. O'Hara Wood (Australia) beat Okamoto (Japan), 6-4, 2-6, 6-4, 2-6, 6-1.—Reuter.

The match between Patterson and Shimidzu was a ding-dong struggle throughout, especially in the second set, in which Patterson was extended to the utmost. The Australian dropped his tantalizing chop-stroke when the score stood at 9-9 and with a series of vicious base-line drives and his untakeable service took the next two games.

In the second singles game, O'Hara Wood's brilliant service and steady driving gave him an easy victory in the first set. The Japanese exhausted himself by frantic endeavours to return the Australian's cannon-ball drives. Okamoto developed a sudden streak of brilliancy in the second set, constantly outmanœuvring Wood and winning 6-2. Wood's smashing drives in the third set puzzled the Japanese, who contended himself with a back-court game. Okamoto won the fourth set chiefly on account of Wood's erratic play. The Australian played a steady game in the fifth set. He took no chances and easily defeated his opponent.—Reuter's American Service.

Providence, R. I., Aug. 15.

Australia has defeated Japan is the American zone final of the Davis Cup Competition.

O'Hara Wood and Patterson beat Okamoto and Harada, 7/5, 6/2, 6/4, in the doubles match to-day.

In the final of the American one of the Davis Cup Competition between Australia and Japan, P. O'Hara Wood (Australia) defeated Shimidzu (Japan), 6-1, 6-4, 6-2, and G. L. Patterson (Australia) defeated Oramoto (Japan), 7-5, 6-1, 6-4.

Australia is thus the winner, having won the first two single matches on August 14.—Reuter's American Service.

U. S. Women's Championships

Forest Hills, Aug. 17.

Miss Helen Wills to-day won the National Women's Lawn Tennis Championship by defeating Mrs. Mallory in the final, 6-1, 6-3.

In the final of the women's doubles, Miss Wills and Mrs Wightman defeated Miss Eleanor Goss and Mrs. Marion Jessup, 6-4, 6-3.—Reuter's American Service.

COMPANY MEETINGS

THE YANGTZE CORPORATION, LD.

Improvement in Conditions Affecting Future Progress: Negotiations and Developments: New Relationship Established

The twentieth annual general meeting of the Yangtze Corporation, was held in London on July 17. Mr. Herbert Edwards (the chairman) presided.

The Chairman said:—At the annual general meeting held last year I expressed on behalf of my colleagues on the board, as well as on my own behalf, the gratification we felt at the prospects of our new policy leading to that practical result we all so ardently desire. Although I am not permitted, for reasons that you will readily appreciate, to describe even the nature of the negotiations we have in hand, I can say that our confidence in the success of our efforts is certainly as well justified to-day as it was a year ago. In fact, some important events have taken place in the interim, some only within the past month or two, which should have a directly favourable influence upon our affairs.

I warned you that although there would probably be times when you would hear nothing of our doings for considerable periods, you should not assume that nothing was being done, for at that very moment something might be on the tapis the effect of which would entirely change our financial status and outlook. I do not wish to be understood to say that such an exciting stage of our journey has actually been reached to-day, but I think I may say that conditions affecting our progress in the immediate future have recently considerably improved. In this connexion I have pleasure in reporting the prolongation for a further term of years of the contract under which the administration of our affairs in China is undertaken by the Peking Syndicate. It may be news to you that Major W. S. Nathan, who for upwards of 20 years so ably administered in China the affairs of the Kailan Mining Administration, whose successful record as an Anglo-Chinese Corporation carrying on operations in China can hardly be equalled, has, on the transference of his activities to London, joined the directorate of that company's head office administration—the Chinese Engineering and Mining Company, Ld.—as well as taking the directorial leadership of the British and Chinese Corporation, the Peking Syndicate, and other prominent British-Chinese enterprises. I have Major Nathan's authority for saying that, realizing as he does the great benefit that would result for both British and Chinese commerce from a generous and comprehensive adoption of some at least of the trading rights granted by our concession, he has promised to give our interests his most cordial and active support. I am satisfied that with his assistance, and with the influential help he is able to secure for us in China, the journey to our desired goal will be considerably shortened.

Situation in China.

In other directions relationships have been, and are being, established that should in the future tend to ensure the active cooperation of the best financial groups in the launching of such industrial or mining enterprises as we may later be called upon to establish in Szechuan. From all one can learn from actual observers, affairs do not seem to be quite so desperately bad in China as one might be led to suppose.

We have been invited to interest ourselves in public utility undertakings already established to a small extent in certain thickly populated areas in Szechuan, but although they are receiving our very serious consideration, we feel that, having regard to the difficulty of establishing adequate safeguards, such as property assessments, for the revenues from such services, it is in the development of the great natural resources in raw materials in that richly endowed province that we shall find our more immediate and certain reward. If you can visualize for yourselves the magnitude of those reserves, the importance of the influential cooperation I have indicated will become apparent.

I shall presently have the pleasure of proposing the appointment as a director of the company of Major-General Sir Courtney Manifold, whose record of unusually active and distinguished service includes special experience in China, and particularly in Szechuan, that should be of the very greatest value to us. Sir Courtney, who is honorary physician to his Majesty the King, commanded a British Mission to Central and Western China, and also commanded a special British Mission to Szechuan, receiving the thanks of H. M. Minister of State for Foreign Affairs for his services; papers on these and other expeditions of which he was a member were published by the Royal Geographical Society. From personal knowledge of Szechuan and its people, its industries, and its commercial possibilities, General Manifold is convinced of its great future and is enthusiastic in his desire to assist in its inevitable development.

I cannot conclude my remarks without expressing our regret at the death of Mr. Pritchard Morgan and Mr. Rudolph Jaeger—both of whom, by a rather remarkable coincidence, passed away within 24 hours of each other—since the report and accounts were issued. I am sure you will all unite with the directors in expressing deepest sympathy with their relatives, for, although they were both 80 years of age, they retained to the last, and to a remarkable degree, the strong individuality and mental force which had characterized them during life. Mr. Jaeger had been associated with the Yangtze Corporation since its inception 26 years ago.

Even before that time, Mr. Pritchard Morgan, who was then taking an active part in politics, saw in the visit to this country of Li Hung-chang—perhaps the greatest of all Chinese statesmen—an opportunity of doing something to secure permanent British interests in China which would be beneficial to each of the great Empires concerned. From that idea arose the close personal relationship and years of work resulted in what became known as the Pritchard Morgan Concession. Whilst expressing the very greatest admiration for the enterprise, zeal, and foresight which resulted in the securing of such a remarkable charter, one cannot help feeling that, had the concessionaire possessed a little less masterful individuality, or had he been blessed with just a little of the leaven of compromise, we should never have found ourselves in the position of controlling the destiny of what we believe will one day be a very important Anglo-Chinese commercial undertaking, for it was his determination to carry through this gigantic enterprise unaided, so far as leadership was concerned, and his intolerance of anything like cooperation, no matter how great the financial assistance that cooperation would have ensured, that resulted in his having to relinquish such Herculean efforts and to leave to others the realization of a project which in its conception possessed potentialities as great as any of the initial efforts that laid the foundation of our vast Empire overseas.

In a telegram to the Government, Gen. Liu Tseng-hua, Tuchun of Shensi, reports that the Panchan Lama arrived in Sian on the 7th instant and departed on the 9th for Peking. The Panchan Lama will break his journey at Loyang where he expects to stay two days. The Ministry of Communications is requested to prepare a special car on the Lung-hai Railway.

A new daily newspaper to replace the "Tsingtao Leader," which has been sold to a new company, headed by Mr. D. Y. Lin, of the Forestry and Agricultural Department of the Kiaochou Government, will shortly make its appearance, writes our Tsingtao correspondent. The "Tsingtao Times" (the name of the new paper) will in no way by a semi-official organ. The proprietor of the old "Leader," Mr. R. T. Hoshino, will be a shareholder in the new company. He has spent much money on the latter journal ever since it was started.

SHANGHAI COTTON MANFG. CO.

Mr. Horatio Robertson Returns to the Attack: Criticism of Management

The annual meeting of shareholders in the Shanghai Cotton Manufacturing Co. Ld. was held on Thursday afternoon at the offices of the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha Ld., agents. The directors present were: Messrs. H. Nodaira (chairman), K. Otani, K. Kuroda, John Prentice and W. J. N. Dyer, and the attendance represented 68,366 shares, 213 shareholders being present personally and by proxy.

The notice convening the meeting having been read:

The Chairman said:—Gentlemen, the report and accounts for the year ended June 30, 1924, having been in your hands for some days, with your permission, I will take them as read.

Half a Million Deficit.

The result of the year under review has been disastrous, in fact, the worst on record since the establishment of the company. My remarks at the last year's meeting have unfortunately come true, and we are now facing a deficit of over half a million, which amount is equivalent to one-half of the amount recently called for on new issue of shares. Had it not been for the fairly good results achieved by our weaving department, the loss sustained would have been greater. There were no improvements in the conditions of trade to which I referred at the last year's meeting; the high cost of raw cotton and low price of manufactured goods, being the result of political and economical disturbances so hopelessly existing all over the country. The gloomy outlook is still hanging over us and there are no signs of improvement, in fact, the deplorable state of affairs in this country seems to be going from bad to worse. The speculative element is not at all diminishing and its menace is severely felt, particularly in our trade.

The immediate future of cotton business largely depends upon the result of the new crops. Should the present high cost of raw material remain unchanged, it is inevitable that many disastrous effects would ensue; such as the closing down of mill factories, and increased unemployment.

Compulsory curtailment of mills' working was discussed from time to time by various mill owners, but unfortunately no agreement was reached. However, I am informed that the majority of mills are now shortening their working capacity on their own accord.

In spite of this adverse state of affairs, both buildings and machinery, etc., were kept in first class order, we having spent over Tls. 120,000 on same (charged to the working account). Some alterations were made to improve atmospheric conditions inside the mills resulting in more hygienic working conditions and higher efficiency on the part of the workers.

No Children Under 12.

The question of child labour has recently attracted public comment, and I am glad to state that your mills have always been very careful in this respect, even to the displeasure of some of the workers, and the condition of your mills is quite above the standard. No children under 12 years of age are being enrolled. With regard to working hours, etc., they are well within the limit which appeared in the recommendations of the Municipal Commission.

As to the depreciation on your assets, although it has been our fixed policy to write off as much as possible, the unprecedented result of the year makes it unjustifiable to transfer the amount of depreciation either to Reserve Fund or to new account, knowing that the present book values are quite below the actual ones. I earnestly hope that a prosperous year will soon come round again and that we may be able to follow our past policy, in writing off generously.

Every effort was given to minimise our production cost and most diligent supervision was given over expenses. The staff and workers have also been reduced in numbers.

Now turning to the question of finance, to our great regret, constant insufficiency of funds has placed the management under great difficulty, and sacrifices have had to be made on several occasions in disposing of our stocks.

Although your Directors and Agents have done and will do the utmost in their power in obtaining financial accommodation elsewhere on reasonable terms, I am afraid, that we might find ourselves compelled to seek means other than loans..

Certain shareholders have suggested that in floating debentures for the purpose of redemption of the loans, it would save the Company from large outlay of interest, to which your Directors are also giving careful consideration.

Gentlemen, this is all I have to say, but before placing the resolution before you, if any one has any questions to ask, I shall be very pleased to answer them to the best of my ability.

Exorbitant Interest.

Mr. L. E. Canning said that as one who wrote in suggesting a debenture issue, he was bound to say that when he took up the report a week ago and realized that the company had paid over Tls. 220,000 interest on a loan which he took to be a fluctuation loan of roughly Tls. 2,700,000, he came to the conclusion that the company was paying rather an exorbitant rate of interest, Having come to that conclusion, he called to interview the manager and chairman and was informed that the company had been paying as much as 18 per cent. interest. In a place like Shanghai, he thought that was rather going too much, to say the least. In his letter he suggested that if the company had assets amounting to Tls. 10,000,000 the company could quite easily float a debenture issue of Tls. 3,000,000, possibly at 8½ per cent.; even nine would be better than the rates they had been paying. He hoped that the Board would seriously consider a debenture issue, to cover at any rate the loan now outstanding.

The Chairman replied that the directors were going into the matter.

Mr. Robertson's Criticisms.

Mr. H. Robertson asked why, when the directors found that the markets were against them and that they were not making profits, they started night work in No. 3 mill. Things being bad, it appeared to him they were thus making them worse.

The Chairman replied that No. 3 mill was for weaving purposes and on account of weaving they had been able to minimise their losses.

Mr. Robertson suggested that the reason was that they engaged labour in order to "buy off opposition" and having engaged this labour had to employ it in night work. The speaker next asked what the position of the company was to-day. What were they doing with Tls. 3,000,000 worth of stocks? Were they being sold at a profit or a loss, and what was going to be the limit of loss?

The Chairman replied that they were selling at the best prices obtainable, but that in some instances they had had to sell at a little loss. He was unable to give exact figures for working since June 30.

Mr. Robertson suggested that the manager of a concern ought to be able to say at any time within a close point whether it was making or losing money. He inferred from the chairman's remarks that they were trading absolutely at a loss. It was all very well for the chairman to say the directors hoped things would improve, but the statement meant nothing and was of no value whatever. He would tell them it was not the cotton crop that was going to wipe out their loss. They had got to come nearer home, put their own house in order and cut down expenses. Then probably they might come out with a balance on the right side. But as long as they went on as they had been doing during the last three years, their debit balance would increase every year.

The Chairman—Every effort has been made to economise in the mills.

Proposal to Refuse Report.

Mr. Robertson then said that if he had a seconder he would propose an amendment that the report and accounts be referred back to the directors until they could give shareholders one that was more acceptable.

Mr. D. Haas said he agreed with what Mr. Robertson had said.

The following resolutions were then carried:

Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Prentice: That the report, balance sheet and general inventory of assets and profit and loss account for the fourth financial year ended June 30, be adopted and passed.

Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Prentice: That the directors' suggestion in dealing with the balance at debit of profit and loss account be sanctioned and passed.

Proposed by the chairman, seconded by Mr. Prentice: That the number of directors be increased from six to seven, and that Mr. Kenzo Gonno be elected as a director of the company.

Proposed by Mr. H. Koy, seconded by Mr. T. Kondo: That Messrs. E. S. Wilkinson and T. Takahashi be elected as auditors of the company in place of those retiring.

Superlatively Autocratic.

Speaking on this resolution, Mr. Robertson agreed to the appointment of Mr. Takahashi but objected to Mr. Wilkinson, who he said was not eligible and was not wanted.

The Chairman—The resolution has been carried.

Mr. Robertson—Naturally. In this superlatively autocratically run company anything is possible.

The chairman next proposed that at the discretion of the directors a gratutity be paid to the staff for the past year.

Mr. Robertson said he had much pleasure in seconding this. The labourer was worthy of his hire—(though he did not always get it)—and the staff were not responsible for the present condition of the company's affairs. He suggested that the directors should waive their fees and pay the bonus with them so as not to increase the debit balance.

The resolution was carried and the meeting terminated.

Repeated demands from semi-public organizations for the repair of Peking city walls and gates, have resulted in the appointment by the Ministry of Interior of a committee to determine the damage already done by rains and floods. The Ministry of Finance has ominously not replied to an inquiry as to whether funds for such repairs are available.

ZAM-BUK which is unequalled in all manner of skin diseases and injuries is obtainable of dealers and dispensaries in Shanghai, Hongkong and The Straits and direct from agents: Messrs. Wakefield & Co., Szechuen Road, Shanghai.

Silver.

The price yesterday came at 34⅛d. ready and forward, against 33 15/16d. ready and forward a week ago, showing rises of 1/16d. on both deliveries. Both India and China buying on a small market had the effect of raising the price from 33 15/16d. on Monday to 34 1/16d. on Thursday.

Bars in stock, 2,622, including silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of sycee and dollars amount to Tls. 400½ lakhs and $434½ lakhs, against Tls. 397⅛ lakhs and $433 lakhs last week, and Tls. 241 lakhs and $309 lakhs on August 21, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation at T.T. 3/2½d., where it remained until Wednesday morning, when it was raised to T.T. 3/2⅝d. It was raised another ⅛d. on Thursday to T.T. 3/3d. under the influence of Chinese speculators, who sold Yen and Sterling rather heavily. Yesterday it opened at T.T. 3/3d. and on the speculators withdrawing from the market and a fairly heavy merchant demand and no bills offering whatever, the rate dropped at 11.40 to T.T. 3/2⅝d.

In the morning the market opened uncertain at T.T. 3/3⅛d. Aug., 3/3 1/16d. Sept., 3/3⅛d. Oct., but gradually slipped away and closed for the tiffin interval unsettled with sellers T.T. 3/3d. Aug., 3/3 1/16d. Sept., 3/3⅛d. Oct., 3/3⅛d. Nov./December. Gold Dollars have remained quite steady at T.T. 73⅛ Aug., 73⅝ Sept., 73⅞ Oct., 73⅝ November, which rates are about the same as on Thursday.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on July 9, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

There has been considerable lassitude displayed during the week. Neither buyers nor sellers have been eager to operate. A certain amount of bear covering has taken place and the Continent has again taken some silver for coinage purposes, but the Far East has been slow to do anything on this side. America has kept in touch with the market by moderate offerings, and the Continent has been a seller on a small scale.

The production of silver in Germany appears to have recovered from the restrictions imposed upon it by the War. The output for 1912 was 4,984,677 fine ounces; for the years 1914/19 no returns have been published. The total for 1920 was 3,305,000 ounces, and for 1921 3,387,400 ounces, but that for 1922 rose to 5,372,600 ounces—that is to say, about 8 per cent. above the pre-war total.

A recent bulletin of the American Mining Congress stated that Representative Richards (Democrat, Nevada), in urging the passage of the Bill to require the U. S. Treasury to purchase fourteen million ounces of silver at $1 per ounce, under the Pittman Act, said that the government had failed to carry out the law, to the detriment of the silver industry. He deplored antagonism toward silver as money and advocated giving silver a fixed money value.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are each 1/16d. above those fixed a week ago.

U. S. Quotations Higher.

July 16.—On the whole the market has been quiet throughout the week. Notwithstanding a depreciating dollar exchange, supplies from the United States have not been easy to obtain, for the American silver quotations rose so as to counteract the tendency of the dollar. This indicated the firmness of the undertone. The monsoon appears to be pursuing a favourable course, but Indian bazaar orders have been scarce. Few China sales have been in evidence. Most of the buying has been on behalf of the Continent or of bears covering commitments.

Under date of July 14, the rainfall was reported as nearly general in Lower Burma, Assam, Konkan and Malabar throughout the week, in Chota Nagpur on four days, in Bengal, East United Provinces, North Hyderabad and Mysore on three days, in West and South Central Provinces and Orissa on two days, and in other important areas of India on one day. A cable from Assam on July 7 announced that the outturn of tea, autumn rice and jute, and the prospects of sugarcane, are normal.

We are informed from Bombay by the mail which left on the 27th ultimo that, Continental purchases being then the principal feature in the market, on any news from London of these purchases the dealers operated freely and bought large amounts for the settlements.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are each 1/16d. above those fixed a week ago.

Quiet and Inactive.

Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid reported on July 10:—

We have again to report a very quiet and inactive silver market, but the undertone has remained good and the spot price has only varied between 34⅜ and 34⅝, the latter being to-day's quotation. America has been rather a reluctant seller during the last few days and such silver as has come on the market from China and elsewhere has been easily absorbed by the Continental purchases. There has been very little demand for India, with the exception of a little bear covering and the bazaars appear to be waiting for more definite prospects with regard to the monsoon.

In the meantime, with the expected continuation of Continental purchases, about the present level of prices seems likely to be maintained and we do not look for any important movement at present. The forward quotation has remained at a premium over spot on most days and under the present conditions of the market this premium would appear to be fully justified.

July 17.—There have been practically no fluctuations in the silver market during the past week, the spot price being quoted at 34⅝d. every day except the 11th and today, when the quotation was 34 1/16d. The Continental demand has been small, and there has been a little bear covering from China, these demands being met by moderate sales from New York. The latest reports of the monsoon are more favourable, and India has been a small buyer, although most of the orders have been for direct shipment from New York. Stocks in London still remain very comfortable, and the 1/16d. premium on the forward position has been maintained all the week and increased to-day to ⅛d.

THE GOLD MARKET

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 2nd inst. amounted to £126,442,760, as compared with £126,437,570 on the previous Wednesday. Of the fair amount of gold on offer this week only a small proportion has been taken for India.

It is reported that the production of gold in Ontario for the first quarter of 1924 was 277,369 ounces, a new record for the province. This compares with 213,263 ounces for the corresponding period last year.

The official discount rate of the Imperial Bank of India was reduced on the 3rd inst. from 6 to 5 per cent.

We are officially informed that the law fixing the unit of the gold standard currency was passed by the Esthonian Parliament on the 20th ultimo. This law lays down that the unit of the gold standard currency system of the Esthonian Republic is to be a Crown ("kroon") containing 0.403226 grammes of fine gold, which, calculated at the present price of gold (95s. 2d.) is equal to 1s. 2.8d. At the pre-war gold price (84s. 10d.) this unit would be worth about 1s. 1.2d.

July 16.—The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 9th inst. amounted to £126,443,805, as compared with £126,442,760 on the previous Wednesday. A fair amount of gold has been on offer this week, but only a small proportion was taken on Indian account. Gold valued at $4,000,000 has been received in New York from London.

The Transvaal gold output for June amounted to 773,053 fine ounces, as compared with 809,003 fine ounces for May, and 755,309 fine ounces for June, 1923.

The United Kingdom imports and exports of gold during the month of June were as follows:—

	Imports.	Exports.
Netherlands	£ 10,106	£ —
Belgium	—	4,770
France	—	33,163
Spain and Canaries	—	20,492

	£2,933,646	£3,764,277

According to the "Tageblatt," the proposals concerning the new German Bank of Issue (which were sent to the Reparations Commission on July 12) involve the disappearance of the Renten Bank as a bank of issue, and a new note issue of about five thousand million marks to be covered as to one-third by gold and foreign exchange. Coinage up to five marks forms part of the scheme.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

The Evil Influence of War Rumours and Bank Failures: A Lack of Business

Aug. 23.

The prospects of good business were not very bright when this week started, for at this time of the year money always is tight and remains so until after the Autumn settlement, but the state of stocks and other factors did offer a little cause for hope for some improvement. Then came the collapse of four Chinese banks and on top of that the Kiangsu-Chêkiang quarrel reached an acute stage, with the result that there was not a dealer anywhere who was not in a state of financial funk and all the markets were flat throughout the week. Nor is there much prospect of a change for the better until after the autumn holiday, despite the fact that yesterday's news was to the effect that a settlement had been arrived at regarding the affairs of the banks, and that the war scare again had died.

Piece Goods.

Financial and other troubles nipped in the bud what previously had the appearance of being quite a useful trade. Dealers recently have not been able to increase figures, but they have sold at steady prices and then during this last week they found themselves wondering whether the sales they have made will be cleared. There has been very little forward inquiry anywhere. Manchester has strengthened again coincident with more Indian inquiry.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—Again a week has passed with very little serious business reported, though a deal of wild speculation has been apparent and on occasions there have been wide fluctuations. The market is weak in consequence of the political and financial troubles. Tungchow yesterday was quoted:—August, 50.10; September, 44.15; October, 41.95; November, 40.85; December, 40.05; January, 39.65.

Yarn.—As with cotton, the yarn market also has been weak throughout. Prices have declined as much as Tls. 12 and Tls. 14. Yesterday's closing quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—August, 175.90; September, 173; October, 168.70; November, 164.80; December, 163; January, 162.90.

Produce.

The export markets all have been dull this week. There have been inquiries for new season sesamum seed, but in view of the unsettled state of affairs in the interior the Chinese are not willing to do any forward business. Groundnuts also have been inquired for, but for the same reason, coupled with the tightness of money, there is a holding-off. Outside of these two commodities there has been no demand and the Chinese are displaying great caution about moving anything at all.

THE TEA MARKET

Business during the past month was on a normal scale and buying has been fairly general. Particular attention has been paid to good quality teas in both Black and Green, for which a steady demand has existed. Recent arrivals, with more especial reference to second crops, show a decided falling-off in leaf and cup quality, so that the stock of good medium Hankow tea has been dealt with in preference. In Green teas, the demand still runs high for Sow Mees and Chun Mees, and choice liquoring parcels are realizing very full prices. Rather more activity in Pingsueys can be reported, due to inquiries and a demand for certain lines of Gunpowder and Imperials from America, and the market is slightly firmer.

With the exception of the common grades of Hankow teas, stocks are abnormally light, and further supplies, due to heavy rains and floods in the interior, will be on a reduced scale. The season promises to be a shorter one and lower prices than at present ruling are not anticipated.

NETHERLANDS TRADING SOCIETY

The general balance sheet and profit and loss account to December 31, 1923, show that the net profits amount to £448,271, out of which, after providing for the statutory reserve to the extent of £22,988, a dividend of 6 per cent. has been declared.

A BUYERS' GUIDE TO SHANGHAI

We have received the August number of "Henderson's Monthly Bulletin and Buyers' Guide," a new monthly publication devoted to the interests of residents in the outports and interior of China and to visitors to Shanghai. It will be found invaluable as a guide as the main object and aim of this bulletin is in supplying its readers with reliable information as to where they can obtain and what they should pay for goods of every description. Besides giving the above information the book also contains interesting articles on various subjects, cooking receipts, household hints, etc.

It circulates throughout China, from Mukden to Hongkong, and is also to be found in the reading saloons of all passenger steamers calling at Shanghai, thus enabling visitors to select their various purchases and stores before they reach port.

NEW FREIGHT RATES

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Vancouver, B.C., July 31.

Freight rates on wheat and flour from Pacific Coast ports will remain at $5.50 to China and $5 to Japan during September, October and November. Lumber rates to Shanghai will be unchanged at $9.50 and $10.50, but on lumber to Japan a reduction of $2 on the base rate will go into effect August 1 and continue until October 31. These rates are in accordance with decisions of the Pacific Westbound Conference of shipping interests held at Portland, Ore.

Action by the Conference on cereals was not a surprise to shippers in view of conditions, though, when the rates were lowered in the spring by $1 from $6 and $6.50, it was understood that they would be automatically restored on September 1. The Conference decided to make the rate on lumber "baby squares" $7, on large squares $8 and on logs $11. The rate of $5 on lead will continue until the end of December. On cigarettes the base rate was made $8.70 instead of $11.50, while salt was made $5 per ton instead of being classed with merchandise as before.

COAL OUTPUT

The total output of the Kailan Mining Administration's mines for the week ending August 9 amounted to 86,196 tons and the sales during the same period to 61,889 tons.

RUBBER OUTPUT

The estimated output of dry rubber from the Sungala Rubber Estate for the month of July was 9,185 lb.

CORRESPONDENCE

SALAD IN SEASON.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Once more again I appear like Bolt from Blue, to requisition me minimum space in your uplift organ, this time for metaphorical crushings of harshly screedings of correspondent labelled "Old Reader." Truly, this are hard world, sir Editor, specially during hot weathers. All joys become submerged, sorrows once again are rampant, and life are brimmed over with disappointment, for once more again my studious perusings of beloved "North-China" are jarred, diverged and scattered, this time by poorly imitator of old friend Mr. Bruce. Truly, 'tis sad world!

At first thinkings I intention to dismiss with ignominy the blatant vapourings of "Old Reader" but during past few days I perceive only few letters on silly season subjects, and think maybe that hot weather outburstings. As such outburstings are very humoresque and much diverting for jaded nervous systems, I must now hasten to give courage for renewings of such humoresque divertings.

If not too impolite to say so, sir Editor, I not believe that "Old Reader" are really old reader. I think perhaps he merely infantile griffin, new from homeside, and full with prunes; or, maybe perhaps he are liverish prohibitionist full with prickly heat, both of which are uncomfortable diseases in depressful summertime. If such hypothesis are correct, "Old Reader" must secure medical consultation, as I am sure esteemed Editor will not permit for him to continue to give vent to grouchy nonsense in letters to Editor.

Although very undignified so to do, justice to many earnest correspondents who saacrifice time and cudgel brains in soulful letters, demand for me to submit few brief words in favour of their defence.

1.—"Old Reader" are merely jealous Spoil Sport, so you must not permit that he "Get your Goat." (Kindly excuse slangful U. S. phrase, but it is very recherche).

2.—"Old Reader" cannot conceive jolly silly season effusion, and are therefore only jealous. I think his father was Quaker and mother Scotch Presbyterian, and that he was born on a Sunday, when it are forbidden for peoples to laugh in Scotland. He therefore have no wit and are jealous he cannot add to gaiety of nations.

3.—I think also he have not correct education to devise scientific screedings. He even fail to comprehend terrific value to posterity of recording close study of manners and customs of shrimps. He even not understand that if our antecedents had made record of folklore of dynosarus, it would have save hundreds of thousands of dollars which are now being scattered by scientists in searchings for such informations.

4.—"Old Reader" state he has "mentally questioned himself." I think he really mean that he has "questioned his mentality," which are very wise and praiseworthy undertaking, for which we must offer sympathy and encouragement.

5.—"Old Reader" make affirmation that readers overseas will conclude that Shanghai lunatic asylums are taxed to full capacity. Although this only churlish slanderings by "Old Reader" it are unfortunate that his screedings have now appear, and overseas reader will be justify in making such conclusion. In such case all poisonous libellings and screechful letters should be earnestly suppress for sake of fair name of our Model Settlement. I think, sir Editor, this are soulful subject for our M. W. L.

6.—For more than 60 years dear old "North-China" have publish jolly dog-day letters, which bring breezy smiles and cheers to wan and jaded readers, when Flop! like shot from cannon, along come old wet blanket and exclaim "Stop. such deilement must cease." I hope "Old Reader" will forgive me for say so, but truly, sir Editor, he make me smilings.

7.—"Old Reader" expound "he don't think Chinese reader will experience edification or amusement" at scientific treatise on great sociologic question "Do shrimps make good mothers?" Such expounding merely show that "Old Reader" are ignoramus, and aforesaid Chinese readers should ignore with scorn such grossly insults to their intelligences.

8.—Although advices of "Old Reader" to esteemed Editor, re editorial policies, are colossal impudences, we should only regard with scornful smilings, otherwise "Old Reader" attain swollen head, which are very common disease in Shanghai. Such disease are also painful, not to patient, but to those who are unfortunate to be in vicinity of patient. We must therefore adopt policy of contumely with any Tom, Dick or Harry that have aspirings for editorial chair.

9.—"Old Reader" propound query "What is a respectable person?" Answer to such query are very simple, sir Editor. Respectable person are a person who refrain from indulgings in vulgarity expressions in writings to esteemed Editor, i.e., to wit: "tosh and drivel," "scurrilous rot," "arrant nonsense," etc., which expressions are muchly indulged in by "Old Reader."

10.—I contemplate that "Shanghai-lander" indulge in big haw-haw when he read screedings of "Old Reader," as even numskull, greenhorn or uneducated Chinese reader can readily detect that "Shanghailander" merely engage in hot-weather leg-pullings of the great and jolly Mr. James Brown. Even child know that Mr. James Brown are really Scotland's greatest man, excepting of course the one-and-only Harry Lauder, who rumour states is the uncrowned King of the Scots. With reference to articles in "Glasgow Herald," I dare to suggest, sir Editor, that from educational viewpoint, it better for "Old Reader" to send copy of "N.-C. D. N." to Glasgow than to send copy of "Glasgow Herald" to Shanghai. Shanghai peoples generally are too muchly advanced to desire perusings of antiquated Scotch country newspaper, but mayhap "N.-C. D N." are too advanced for natives of Glasgow to understand. Such backwardness in 20th century are too sad to contemplate, but maybe I make misjudgment by taking "Old Reader" as sample of Glasgow export, and if I make such grossly error, I must beg pardon of all other Scotch peoples.

11.—"Old Reader's" exudation of laudatory exultation of dissertations upon "Primacy of Peter," are highly praiseworthy, and such laudations are the microscopic feature that rescue his screeding from complete condemnation. But at one and same time "Old Reader" must not forget that all peoples' appetites and palates are not identically the same. During hot summer weathers most peoples have great preferment for recherche chicken galantine, fluffy snow eggs, and angelic fruity salads, and only very few peoples like "Old Reader" have soulful yearning for heavy roast pork and dumplings, sauerkraut and sausages and ponderous plum duff. This only metaphorical comparisings, sir Editor, but should be earnestly impressed upon "Old Reader" as lesson that he are not the only pebble on the "N.-C. D. N." beach.

12.—The actions of "Old Reader" in "tearng up and burning" unfavoured letters to editor, are merely infantile paroxysm, for which similarity indulgings small childrens are usually spanked, and are thusly quickly cured. But maybe "Old Reader" are too old for spankings: in such unfortunate case we can only "pay joss" and trust to Father Time and cheery fate to institute reformation. "Old Reader" are victim of many disease, including "extreme nausea," which dictionary proclaim are "sickness of stomach," but why he mention such inflictions to esteemed editor, instead of investing in small quantity of castor oil or Epsoms, are profound mysteries. But, sir Editor, as ancient philosopher declare "it takes many funny peoples to make a world."

I very much fear that this letter are like unto Shakespeare "Much ado about nothing," but it are necessary to revive and bestow encouragements upon flagging energies of concocters of silly seasons effusions to maintain gaiety of nations and Shanghai in particulars. And now that I have successfully dispose and scatter to winds of heaven the insidious bombastings of "Old Reader" I am longingly existing in fervent hopes of quickly renewal of silly season outpourings, which are nectar and tonics in hot weathers.

With profusely apologies, sir Editor, for such lengthy monopolisings of your usually irreproachable columns with such unfruitful dissertations, which are only dragged from me by bumptious screedings of "Old Reader." This are not composed in anger, but are merely kindly admonishing to O.R. to keep your spotless columns spotless, and to practice ancient teaching "Live and let live." If he take heed in time he will live to be a happy, jolly, genuine Old Reader, but even if he live to be more ancient than Methuselah, the "N.-C. D. N." will still be on spot with its silly season effusions, and to give him kindly obituary.

I am, etc.,
Jos Mitel.

THE PRIMACY OF PETER

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It has been said that the Bible is "an old fiddle upon which any tune may be played." To a certain extent this appears to be true, but most, if not nearly all, of the divergencies of views regarding Scripture teaching arise from the habit of saying what "I think" a certain passage means, instead of asking "myself" what did those to whom it was written or spoken think it meant. The judgment of what they thought a certain text or passage meant must always be formed from their recorded reaction to the saying or the writing, either in conformity with it, or in opposition to it.

Now, to return to the question of the Primacy of the Apostle Peter, is there any record in the Scriptures that subsequent to the famous saying of Jesus about the "keys" the Apostle Peter claimed for himself, or his contempories claimed for him, or gave to him, the supremacy others now claim for him? The answer is no, emphatically no. So that is that.

I would like to say to the writer of the letter in your issue of the 12th instant that he is wrong. The words in Scripture, "Kingdom of God," may mean God's rule in the hearts of men, but the words "Kingdom of Heaven" do not. In Scripture, the words "Kingdom of Heaven" refer to the kingdom over the nations of the earth to be set up (future) by Jesus, the Christ, the Son of Man. The fact that the "Kingdom of God" and the "Kingdom of Heaven" are co-relative has led to the assumption in many minds that the terms are synonomous, but it is not so.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
A. Truth Seeker.

Shanghai, August 14, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Do you not consider it is time you allowed Peter et al to have rest? Times have changed so much and often since they were supposed to have been members of the earthly community, that very few people care whether Peter has the Keys to Heaven or elsewhere. Besides, I think I have a note signed by your good self in which you informed me that you deprecated religious discussion in the columns of your paper, and all the letters on the subject are undoubtedly from people who are paid to argue on the point, or discuss, it from a religious point of view. Tell some of us how we can and where we can obtain keys for some of the houses necessary to live in (so as we can prepare for the house elsewhere) at a fair and reasonable rate then the reading of the news will be far more up-to-date, and commensurate with the times we live in.

I am, sir.,
J. R. Broadley.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—One would think that the safest way of interpreting a text would be to take it at its plain meaning, especially a text which is as clear and unambiguous as the one in which Christ appoints Peter the Rock upon which He will build His Church, etc. But your correspondents say: No, Christ did not mean His promise to Peter to be taken seriously, and they twist and turn the text in their desperate, but vain, endeavours to make it fit into their systems of theology. They protest against Christ's saying being taken at their literal meaning and they finally accuse the clear and logical Catholic point of view (in more or less direct terms) of obscurantism. "John," for example, says it smells of musty cathedrals, and he finishes up his letter with "Come out into the sunshine, Paul." In the sunshine is just where "Paul" has been the whole time during this discussion; so much so that he has refused to enter into any sort of quibbling or hairsplitting competition. He has consistently refused to let himself be lured out of the sunshine of the Gospel truths into the obscurity where these truths are being transformed into something else. No wonder that they deny the primacy of Peter, for of much importance is, to them, the question that the moment they admit Peter's primacy that very instant their Protestantism is left without foundation and their laboriously built up structure crumbles into dust. The explanations already given in your correspondence columns on 24/7, 30/7, 4/8 and 13/8 ought to be clear enough, but the point under discussion being of such great importance another and even more popular explanation will be attempted.

The Rock.—Christ says, "On this Rock (Peter) I will build My Church." It is His Church He will build on that rock.—"other foundation can no man lay than is laid which is Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. III-11) and other foundation man did not lay; but Christ Himself laid it, on Peter.

The Keys.—Christ says to Peter, "I will give to thee the keys to the Kingdom of Heaven." According to Rev. 1-18 and III-7 Christ said "I—have the keys of hell and of death" and "——the key——that openeth and no man shutteth and shutteth and no man openeth." Peter does not hold the power of the keys as mere man, he holds this power as Christ's representative. A judge who condemns a man to death does not do so as the mere man, Smith, or Jones, or whatever his name may be, but as the representative of the law.

The universal pastorate.—Christ says to Peter, "Feed My lambs" and "Feed My sheep." What other meaning can, in this case "lambs" and "sheep" have than laity and clergy? Peter is appointed pastor (shepherd) of Christ's entire flock ("My lambs and sheep"), the flock about which Christ says (John X-16) "——there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

Confirming his brethren.—Christ says to Peter (Luke XXII-23)," But I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not: and thou———, confirm thy brethren." Christ's prayers are creative, that is to say, what Christ prays for invariably happens and, consequently, Peter's faith will never fail and Peter will never cease to confirm his brethren in the true faith.

These arguments are only elaborations of those given in the above mentioned four letters and if "John" and the other four gentlemen still find this point of view obscure, then they must be suffering from purblindness. To give one example of the Primacy of Peter, the books of the New Testament, wherein the whole of the Protestant religion is contained, were collected, selected and declared inspired 1,000 years before the reformation, by the Church which is presided over by Peter's successors, to the exclusion of various Gospels and Epistles then in circulation.

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I have read most of the letters on the above subject which have appeared in your paper, but having been away from town for a few weeks may have missed one or more of them. If, therefore, I am going over ground already covered, I shall be glad to have the reference to the point I now raise.

"Paul" feels that he has a strong point in being able, as he states, to take the principal text about this subject at its face value. Unfortunately, the English translation does not do justice to the passage, because the changes rung on the gender of the word in question cannot be shown. The text in the Revised Version reads: "And I also say unto thee that thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my church." Now Peter and Rock have different endings, the former being Petros and the latter Petra and the agreement turns on what is meant by Petra. "Paul" so far as I have read, does not refer to this.

It will be seen that it is not quite so plain as the English version seems to make it. The Revised Version has foot notes showing this difference.

Protestant holds that Petra refers to Peter's confession—the revelation made to him by the Father, that Jesus is the Messiah. I would like to know how "Paul" gets over the difficulty of the change in gender in the word about which he appears to be so certain.

ECCLESIA ANGLICANA

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Now that the Revised Prayer (Permissive Use) Measure has been passed by the House of Clergy of the National Assembly and the somewhat ambiguous situation that has existed since the Lincoln Judgment has been definitely cleared up, is it too much to ask that on one Sunday in every month the principal service of the day in our local cathedral should be rendered in such a manner as is desired by a very large and growing section of British churchgoers, namely, those who are usually known as Anglo-Catholics?

It will be argued that the monthly Choral Eucharist meets the above request. Frankly it does not. As at present rendered, it is High Churchism in its spikiest form.

I hope I shall not be mis-interpreted. I am not suggesting for one minute that the cathedral should be filled with Roman habits, neither do I ask that the Dean and his colleagues should appear in public wearing feriolas and birettas. Such things and articles of apparel are equally abhorrent to the Anglo-Catholic as to the Evangelical.

What we want, in plain language, is a Choral Eucharist rendered in accordance with the English "Use." Let the Dean say the word, and all that is necessary as regards the "ornaments of the Church and the ministers thereof" will be on his doorstep within 24 hours.

The foregoing would in no way interfere with the Evangelical section of the churchgoing public. They can still have their glorified Matins with its unorthdox sermon on three Sundays every month.

In conclusion, a word in advance to any possible critics. Missa Cantata according to the English "Use" is sung daily in seven of the cathedrals at Home whilst the 10 o'clock Choral Eucharist at Westminster Abbey is rendered by Priest, Deacon and Sub-deacon in copes of the liturgical colour of the day, assisted by servers in albs and amices whilst the procession of the Sacred Ministers is led by a crucifer in alb, apparelled amice and dalmatic. I said "Abbey" not "Cathedral" Mr. Evangelical!

HIGH SPEED EXPOSURES

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Can any of your innumerable readers kindly tell me what is a reliable developer for developing photographic plates which were exposed at about 1/250th of a second, how to proceed with the development without fogging the negative and what is the approximate total time of development. Thanking you in advance.

KEEPING YOUNG

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I know it is the "silly season," but is it necessary to fill up two columns of the front page with such futile nonsense as you do in this morning's paper?

The operation of vasoligation was described many years ago, was investigated thoroughly, and was discarded. It is quite certain that if a small operation, which is simple and easy, such as this is, did produce good results, it would have become exceedingly popular many years ago.

Might I suggest that you employ an up-to-date medical man to "shroff" such medical news as this, and so exclude matter which is 20 years or so behind the times.

*Reference to this letter appears in Notes and Comments.—Ed.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to your very interesting article "Keeping Young" and with the hope of bringing a few thereabouts a little more up-to-date, I am offering a few excerpts taken from "Organotherapy in Sexual Impotence" to your readers. "Organotherapy in Sexual Impotence" is the work of Victor G. Vecki, M.D., San Francisco. The article was read before the San Francisco County Medical Society, on October 31, 1922, and reprinted from the "Journal of Sexology and Psychoanalysis," March, 1923. Dr. Vecki states, "There is no doubt that Lydston was the first to perform sexual gland transplantation on any human being, but in 1849 Berthold reported in the "Archiv für Anatömie and Physiologie" on experimental transplantation in roosters. No one paid any attention to Berthold in 1849, and the American medical profession took notice of Lydston's work and that of his followers only when the newspapers of the whole world began to give sensational reports, and then they joined in the more or less witty jokes about monkey glands. And while the jokes go on, a number of scientifically inclined surgeons are keeping up the fascinating work of homo and hetero-transplantation. Notwithstanding dogmatic contradictions and ridiculing, no matter from what and from how high places it may come, the effects of a properly and successfully performed transplantation are unmistakable." And again he states. "The opinions in regard to the effects of the Steinach operation naturally are different; some operators are enthusiastic, some are doubtful, and many physicians tend to treat it with contempt. The simple truth, however, is that, properly performed, ligation and severing of one or both vasa deferentia invariably benefits the patient. Amongst the many persons operated upon, I have yet to find a single one who did not show various improvements of the bodily condition, or he would have any reason to regret the slight operation. At some future time I shall tabulate all my cases, but will at this time briefly report two typical experiences in both of which a suggestive influence was positively excluded."

The doctor then states the following, "A well known San Franciscan, a retired merchant, five weeks less than 80 years old, was brought to me by his daughter. While in former times I used to meet the man frequently, I had not seen him for over a year, and could notice a great change; he was listless and tottering. I received the report that the old man swoons frequently, had lost his memory and was quite helpless. Examination confirmed the self-suggesting diagnosis of senility. When his two sons came to see me I advised a Steinach operation. My argument was that it was not a question of prolonging a useless life, less a question of restoring sexual power, but a simple question of making life, while it lasted, bearable. The patient was told nothing, promised nothing, and took no interest whatever in the proceeding. Under local anesthesia the vasosection was performed on both sides. Two months after the operation the patient presided at a very jolly party in honour of his eighteeth birthday, made a witty speech, noticed and complimented the ladies present. His children report that he takes again his walks, takes interest in life and in whatever happens, and did not swoom for over six weeks. The general improvement keeps up at this time, nine months after the operation."

The doctor further states another case, "A well known physician laughed in my face when I spoke about the Steinach operation to him. What could that accomplish? He simply would not believe it could do anything. As a dare, he brought to my office an old man from whom no information of any kind could be obtained, not even his age, but who must have been about 75 years old. This man was listless to such a degree that he would remain infinitely wherever he was placed, and had no more sense than a one year old child. Extremely docile in every respect, he meekly submitted to any examination, and manipulation; the Steinach operation was performed on both sides and then he was taken home. For weeks I heard only jokes about the patient, but five months later he was helping in a cigar store, then left for his native country. And a one sided Steinach operation was recently done on the scoffing physician himself."

The doctor continues, "Matter by itself is inert; it needs impulses to make it act. Shall we allow the inert matter to increase in the aging body without any attempt at resistance? Shall we follow Brisbane's advice when he says: "The best way to restore energy in the old is to live quietly while you are old, die quietly when the time comes and begin all over again in a brand new body from head to foot?" Unfortunately most people will have their doubts about that "brand new body," and, who knows what kind of glands of internal secretion it may have? However, I think we are justified in hanging on to our own body for a while longer. Can it be done? I think organotherapy in its various phases will help to a certain extent, and that therein also lies the future of artificial rejuvenation and prolongation of life. You may say that I am an optimist, and I am glad I am. Optimism, hedged in by cautious conservatism. has done well by many. If everybody were an optimist, there would be no more wars, no one would begrudge his fellow man a few cheerful moments, nor to any old man his Indian Summer."

PIRACY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In view of the leading article on this subject in your edition dated the 8th inst., may I be permitted to make a suggestion? During the war I served in "Q" ships in H. M. Navy and through the medium of these vessels the Admiralty were, in many instances, able successfully to deceive clever and experienced German submarine commanders. How much easier it would be, by the use of these vessels, fitted to meet local conditions, to deceive Chinese pirates.

It would give me great pleasure to be with some of my old shipmates again and fit out a junk or small steam craft (according to the area to be worked) and go out to suppress these pirates. I am sure the pirates would not thrive with a few "Q" boats wandering around and they would find "Q" boat men and methods very unpleasant to deal with, both at sea and on the various rivers. I am confident that great success would be obtained. However, I am merely an ex-R. N. R. man now, trying to make a living in the interior of China.

Might I suggest that those shipping companies suffering at the hands of these robbers and murderers ask the Admiralty, through official channels, to give a few of the young naval officers now applying to be transferred to China waters an opportunity to put down piracy viâ the "Q" boat system. The British Admiralty would not only be rendering a great service to all foreign business concerns trading in China, but they would be delivering the poor Chinese merchant, who is trying to carry on under such hopeless conditions, from this terrible menace.

I have no knowledge of what has been done concerning the matter. Perhaps shipping companies have already taken the matter up with the Admiralty or the local naval authorities; if so, why not suggest the "Q" boat being introduced.

Yours, etc.,
LATE R. N. R. OFFICER.

THE WANHSIEN OUTRAGE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It is an interesting study to follow the articles and arguments of editors and correspondents in the various newspapers regarding the outrages upon foreign life, persons and property in China at the present time—outrages which unfortunately are growing both in frequency and intensity—and to notice the way these incidents are handled in the Press.

There is a tendency to get these incidents recorded in the papers with as little delay as possible, and in such circumstances statements are often rashly made and conclusions hastily drawn which, in the light of more subsequent and mature knowledge of facts, prove themselves to be in many points effusions lacking sufficient foundation. This is all very regrettable, as also the discovery of statements made by correspondents which have the tendency to break our united front as foreigners against the disastrous pass to which things have been carried in this part of the world. One of the most recent incidents is that outrage which terminated in the death of Mr. Hawley in Wanhsien. The action of the Commander of H.M.S. Cockchafer relative to this outrage has come under considerable discussion and varied and widespread opinion has been expressed in both Chinese and foreign papers.

The present disregard for foreign life and interests in China is creating a very disastrous situation, and the misunderstanding arising in the mind of the average Chinese official from the supposed lethargy or impotence of the foreign Governments only tends to make this situation worse, and the position of the resident foreigner more untenable as the time goes on. The Editor of the "North-China Daily News" has rightly sensed the oncoming crisis, which sooner or later will have to be faced most seriously with the Chinese by the Powers, and the action of Commander Whitehorn will have the backing of all reasonably-minded people whose lot is cast in these troubled regions. It is high time that these "incidents" ceased to be treated as such and that some united pressure be brought to bear upon the Central Government (if there should be any at this moment) or in any case upon the protesting Government, to recognize these incidents as the periodical outbursts of a great underlying principle of anti-foreignism which is being secretly nourished in official and institutional circles. So long as China can keep the Powers at bay by incessantly referring to these as isolated misfortunes, she will succeed, but when a demand is made for the uprooting of this noisome growth in official circles we may have some hope for the future.

It is common knowledge that the highly placed officials of China have ever been adepts in the art of "wool-throwing" into the eyes of the "barbarian" Governments, and, more often than not in the past, matters which utterly failed of a settlement in Peking with the central body were possible of adjustment locally, as occasion arose, with the resident and minor officials who were less proficient in the art. Now things have changed and the policy of prevarication is adopted by all grades, and any dealings which one might have with them leaves one with the consciousness that the foreigner is not only termed a knave but is also treated as a fool.

To return to the action of Commander Whitehorn. We are led to understand that the Peking Government has made an official protest to the Parliament of Great Britain against the action of the said Commander. We scorn, as all Britons must, to make more than passing reference to a man who enjoys a seat in that venerable House taking up the cudgels to destroy this loyal and fearless servant of His Majesty's Government. Those of us who dwell in the land unitedly thank the Commander, and are happy to stand by him in a crisis such as this. One is led to ask: "Upon what information was this protest based?" They have probably relied upon and accepted at face value the reports of the local officials. The things reported have evidently injured their dignity very severely. To avoid any responsibility themselves, and throw the onus upon a British Commander is certainly in keeping with Chinese traditions. The populace is not so far out of hand as to give the officials even measured claim to immunity from direct responsibility in matters which concern resident foreigners.

Were Mr. Hawley's case a unique and isolated one there might have been much to say on the other side, but it must be emphasized that the Commander of the Cockchafer had not the precedent which afforded him a glimmer of assurance that the Chinese Govrenment would deal fairly and thoroughly with the perpetrators of this organized outrage, and the apathy which appears to have been evinced subsequent to the murder might be taken as indicative of the studiously adopted attitude of the local officials. As far as an outsider can discover from the newspapers, the Central Government has thus far done nothing which even at this belated date goes to prove that the action of Commander Whitehorn was either unwarranted or unnecessary.

One would have imagined that the Peking Government would have considered the murder of a peaceable American citizen, who had to rely solely upon its courteous protection, an ample reason for the appointment of a commission of inquiry—a commission delegated with sufficient authority and carrying credentials such as would enable it to investigate thoroughly and report impartially on the case, stating just how far the officials resident in Wanhsien at the time were directly or indirectly responsible for the crime. Moreover, the sincerity of such a commission could be assured by inviting a representative of a foreign Power concerned in the case to sit upon the commission board in order to watch proceedings in the interests of its national. Such a commission could proceed to Wanhsien without fear of arms or of military rank with which these prevaricators surround themselves. They might proceed with the inquiry upon lines something like the following:—

Was the said Mr. Hawley justified in loading his oil into steamers? Had he previously interviewed the authorities, notifying them of his intention to load the oil? Had this notice been of sufficiently long period to allow the officials in charge to make the necessary preparations for the protection of himself and his interests? Had he made a payment of any money to the local officials for such protection? Were the military authorities prevented from fulfilling any promise they may have made by other and more pressing duties? If so, then what were those duties? How did the local authorities behave after the tragedy? What was the attitude of the pople of the place when they heard of the murder of the foreigner? Did the officials act under pressure from the Commander in the pursuit of justice, or was such undertaken from the sense of disgust against such intolerable and base murder? If the former, then how far does it go to justify the action of the Commander? And if the latter, then why the loud cry of protest? And so on.

These are questions which naturally suggest themselves to anyone who is interested in the case, and if the Chinese Government consistently refuses to put into operation such machinery as will give them the right to be credited with sincerity and good-will, they must not be alarmed if matters have to be carried to an issue by other and, from their point of view, more unconstitutional means.

It would be interesting reading to see a full and impartial report of such proceedings as one suggests in, say, the Peking "Shen Pao." It is more than likely that the very men who had to follow that coffin to the grave in Wanhsien, and whose injured feelings possibly led them to urge their Government to protest, would be the last to desire an investigation of this nature, and more so if on that board of inquiry there sat a foreign representative possessing the full approval of Peking. Judging from hearsay and personal observation, the Chinese press is all of a piece with the overlords in these "unfortunate incidents." Business men, travellers, tourists, and missionaries have been represented as victims of unprincipled molestation and unprovoked assault, and already too many have suffered death by violence.

The Government of Great Britain cannot consider the wail against the man with the supposed mote, when this whole nation carries the beam in both eyes, being utterly blind to any sense of self-respect for the most initial and basic law of human society.

SINGAPORE TRAMWAYS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Heavy buying from Shanghai has sent these shares (par value 5s. 0d.) from 2s. 6d. to over 7s. 0d. in the past two or three weeks. Therefore, the enclosed letter by Mr. James Davenport, who is a member of the Singapore Tramways Debenture Committee, and General Manager of the Investors and Trustees Co. (one of the largest investment houses in London), may be of interest to your readers. I send it to you because London financial circles believe that buying at anything like such prices is due to the reorganization plan terms not being known in Shanghai, and also because Mr. Davenport's letter is obviously a warning against the shares at their present prices.

In support of their belief in the above premises, London financial circles point out that, (1) under the new reorganization plan, one-half of the profits must go to the new management before anything accrues to the new ordinary and preference shares; (2) to the fact that, based on their profit participation, the shares are therefore really selling at 200 per cent. premium, this notwithstanding that they now have £200,000 Preference shares ahead of them, and that the Ordinary captain has also been written up 67 per cent.; (3) that they believe that the Singapore Municipal authorities would never permit charges necessary to justify anything like such prices for the shares; (4) and in support of their whole contention, they also point to the anomaly in the share and debenture prices.

From the above it would seem that a number of people in Shanghai may lose money if the present position remain unknown and therefore I send the above information, also the enclosed cutting to you, so that your readers may be aware of the situation.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
"OLD READER."

London. July 8, 1924.

The following, which appeared in the "Financial Times" of July 7, is the letter referred to above:—

Sir,—There is either a singular misunderstanding regarding the position of the Singapore Electric Tramways Company or a very striking anomaly in the respective quotations of the five per cent. Debenture stock and the shares, and, as a member of the Debenture Holders' Committee, which committee had a great deal to do in connexion with the scheme, I think it is quite time it was pointed out.

The scheme of arrangement under which the management of the property of the company comes under the efficient control of the Shanghai Electric Construction Company, Ld. was approved some time ago by all the necessary parties, and has been approved by the Court. It is therefore effective.

It is unnecessary for the purpose of this letter to set out the details of the scheme, and it will suffice to give the respective positions of the present five per cent. Debentures and of the Ordinary shares.

The Debentures are to receive in the new company for each £100 Debenture:—

70 per cent. in new seven per cent. cumulative Preference shares of £1 each and 40 per cent. in new £1 Ordinary shares.

The present 5s Ordinary shares are to receive one new Ordinary share of £1 for every eight existing Ordinary shares. That statement should clear away any possibility of misunderstanding the position.

Here is the anomaly:—The present 5s Ordinary shares are being actively dealt in at between 6s and 7s per share. That means (taking the price at 6s) that the market value of the new £1 Ordinary shares is £2 8s per share—that is. eight times the quotation of the existing share. Now, if the new Ordinary share is worth this handsome premium obviously the new seven per cent. Cumulative Preference share must be worth at least par. So we get to this:

Each £100 Debenture receives
(a) 70 new seven per cent. Preference at par £70
(b) 40 new Ordinary at £2 8s.... 96
Therefore equivalent price of existing Debentures on basis of present price of Ordinary shares is at least £166

I have only to add that they are quoted below 80 per cent.

As I have said, it is either a misunderstanding or an anomaly; but. in any case, it seems desirable the investing public should realise the position.

I am, etc.,
JAMES DAVENPORT.

DYNAMITE DEPOT IN SHANGHAI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Under the above heading a letter from the pen of Mr. Gundry and a leading article appeared in your paper in March last. Mr. Gundry drew attention to the danger to Shanghai from the dynamite magazines situated on the Pootung side of the river. Your article stated that no special danger was being run by the magazines being where they are. Your views are open to correction. You also stated that immunity from accidents in the past were mainly due to the careful supervision of the Superintedent, who had been in charge of the magazines from the time they were opened over 17 years ago, and that although you had no wish to raise a scare, you were of the opinion that Mr. Gundry had done well to call attention to this matter.

It is again time to call attention to the matter, as in your issue of the 12th inst. a small paragraph appeared in which it was stated that a dynamite store in Manila had been struck by lightning, and that two men were killed and several children injured. It did not state the quantity of explosives contained in the store, so it is to be presumed that it was only a small quantity, otherwise the message would have stated that it was a magazine, and not a store.

Now, what would happen if the dynamite magazine in Shanghai was struck by lightning? From what I can see when passing up and down the river, the dwelling house of the Superintendent is not more than, at the most, 150 feet from the magazine, and, if the magazine was struck by lightning, there would be no earthly chance for the Superintendent and his family, and very little chance for the Port of Shanghai, especially if there should happen to be so large a quantity (125 tons) of explosives stored as there was when the subject was first brought to the public notice by Mr. Gundry.

I can safely say, without fear of contradiction, that Shanghai is the only place in the world where a dwelling house is so close to a magazine and I find that, according to the British Home Office Regulations, the allowable distance of the nearest dwelling house to a magazine of 50 tons capacity is 452 yards, so that the magazine here with a capacity of 125 tons and over should be at least 600 yards, instead of 150 feet (50 yards). From the point of view of safety, Shanghai is, in my opinion, in a poor way, and it is high time that the powers-that-be woke up to this silent menace, and took active measures to safeguard the port and give the Superintendent of the magazines at least a sporting chance. If the matter were taken up by the several Chambers of Commerce here, I am sure something could, and would be done, as Shanghai, ranking about fourth as a commercial port in the world's shipping, is by far the lowest on the list when it comes to safety where explosive magazines are concerned.

I am, etc.,
INTERESTED.

THE SPOILED CHILD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Scrutator" says China is a spoiled child. I wish it could be true, but I am afraid, with her officials, militarists, soldiers, bandits, floods and famines, there is very little chance, indeed, of China getting spoiled, however outside circumstances may favour it. Besides, China is blessed always with an abundant crop of foreign critics, willing enough to act the unpleasant role of monitors. Even if she were capable of being over-petted, these friends of hers would see to it that she is not.

It is true that, during the last two years, many instances have occurred where foreigners were deprived of the privileges enjoyed by them under the Treaties and where Chinese officials could neither give immediate satisfaction for these deprivations nor guarantee the non-recurrence of the same in future. But the question is:—Are these incidents the natural consequences of the general conditions prevailing in the country, or are they isolated instances of lawlessness directed specially against foreigners? For one foreigner killed by the bandits, there must be 1,000 Chinese who have suffered the same fate. The officials may have been trickly with the foreigners, but they have been simply heartless in their internal administration. If forigners imagine, because they have had things too long and too much their own way in this country, that even bandits would respect Treaties and dishonest officials turn honest for their sake, and get impatient and angry when bandits and officials do not take the trouble to make the distinction, does not their behaviour sometimes strike one very like the characteristic gesture of a spoiled child, wishing for the impossible, crying for the moon?

What makes the situation worse than it should be is that the politicians in the north are exploiting these impetuous outbursts for their own advantage. These politicians know that, so far as internal affairs are concerned, they may as well not have existed. The whole nation has no use for them, except that diplomatically they still function. Naturally, they seize every opportunity to score over the foreigners, for that is now the sole reason for their existence. Every intemperate and ill-considered demand only serves to further their unscrupulous ends and lower the foreigners prestige in China.

The foreign powers must remember that, not quite two years ago, they could have adopted the right, though difficult, course of action, but instead of doing that, they took the line of least resistance and helped to put these very men in power. If now they and their protégés have fallen out and the whole thing has turned out a bad bargain, let them call it by the right name and not use it as a text for making ingratitude a peculiar national trait of China and proclaiming that she is a spoiled child. It is not fair, to say the least.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Permit me to congratulate you upon a brilliant leader, "New Views for Old." It is seldom that a foreigner (a non-Russian, I mean) talks soundly on the Russian Revolution. Those who talk about the present state of affairs in Russia, can be devided into two classes:—(1) The solvers of the Russian problem; (2) The advocates or condemners of Bolshevism and communism. To which class belong Mr. Rye and Mr. Hall? If they belong to the first class, they are attempting to talk about things they know nothing about. Have they been to Russia? No. Do they know Russia? Of course they do—out of books, don't you see? Ask any Russian what he thinks of books on Russia written by foreigners, or by those who were expelled from the once happy country. Ninety-nine per cent. of them are utter rot. They deserve a smile, not even criticism.

If Messrs. Rye and Hall belong to those who condemn communism, they should not try to criticise your points of view, sir. It appears that they have the opinion that communism is a good and sound sort of thing. If so, why don't they, both of them, advocate it for their own countries? To begin with, install it in their own families, but first study communism, as apparently they do not know much about it either. Now, will they have the nerve to do it?

I am, etc.,
N. LEASHIN.

Shanghai, August 14, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. N. Leashin seems to have "let fly" in something which appears to be a combined attack on Mr. Rye and myself. Seeing that my letter was considerably at variance with Mr. Rye's argument I fail to see why he couples our names of classification.

Dictatorially Mr. Leashin announces that "Those who talk about the present state of affairs in Russia can be divided into two classes (1) The solvers of the Russian problem; (2) The advocates or condemners of Bolshevism and Communism.

"To which class belong Mr. Rye and Mr. Hall?"

My personal answer is—neither: Mr. Rye can answer for himself if he cares to take the trouble.

I have no interest whatsoever in Russia and I do not care what happens to that country or any of its inhabitants. Therefore I have no interest in the solving of the Russian problem.

(2) That I am an advocate or condemner of Bolshevism and communism. (The actual quotation is:—"The advocates or condemners of Bolshevism and communism") is not this rather a contradiction? If one is an advocate of communism can one be at the same time a condemner thereof.

I admit that one may be an advocate of Communism but a condemner of Bolshevism because, I take it, as far as I have been able to learn, that the terms are not synonyms, i.e., Communism is not Bolshevism.

But of this sufficient. It savours of political argument which as any sane man knows—is futile.

Mr. Leashin asks with reference to Mr. Rye and myself, Have they been to Russia? And has the stupidity to answer No!

Well, Mr. Leashin you are wrong! I was in St. Petersburg which you now call Leningrad in 1885, probably before you were born (this is a guess only made on account of the puerility of your writing). I was in Siberia for quite a spell (over a year travelling in 1903-4) I was with the Russian troops in 1904-5 (mostly Cossacks) and also knew Generals Kondraschenko, Stoessel (of Port Arthur), Konsmein Konraveiff of the Navy, as well as Consul Laptchieff and Colonel Ogorodinkoff of Tientsin.

Russian politics I have never interfered with in any way whatsoever, but not being an absolute fool I have not been able to avoid taking notice of such politics as are thrust upon my notice.

But knowing the extreme difficulty of the English language to British as well as members of other nationalities, the misunderstanding of the intention of my letter by Mr. N. Leashin is quite understandable and I trust that he will now realize that I had no intention when writing of "solving the Russian problem" or of "advocating or condemning Bolshevism and Communism."

My letter was a question which I repeat:—

"But who and what is going to put a huge country like Russia on her feet again and how?"

Answer me that Mr. Leashin, if you can, and as a friend of Russia and having many Russian friends I will thank you.

I am, etc.,
A. L. HALL.

S. P. Q. R.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Since there has been so much correspondence lately on the subject of Senatus Populus Que Romanus, or at least the initial letters, it might interest some of your readers to see a few variations of this made by Bede. They are:—

Salva Populum Quem Redemisti
Sono Poltroni Questi Romani
Sancti Pater, Quid Rides? (Ans.—Rideo quia Papa sum.)
Salus Papae, Quies Regni
Salvasti Populum Quem Regis
Solidavit Pace Quietem Regni
Salvavit Pecavit Que Regum
Stultus Populus Quaerit Roman

I should be interested to see some further definitions of S.P.Q.R. from some of the readers who have been participating in the correspondence. It might also be interesting to know that Burton, in the "Anatomie of Melancholie," gives no fewer than 39 definitions of the above.

SIR,—With your permission revenons á nos moutons.

While thanking those correspondents who have explained the meanings of these letters, I submit that my original question remains unanswered.

I asked what connexion there was between a group of letters which refer solely to Ancient Rome, something like 26 centuries ago, and a memorial to those who fell in the war of 1914-18.

Is there no architect or member of the Memorial Committee which carried out the work, who can and will explain the connexion?

THE SOUTHERN CROSS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reply to "Orang Gila's" inquiry of the 11th inst. (N.-C.D.N. August 14.) I might say that the Southern Cross was pointed out to me by an old seafaring man some time ago and last night three stars of this constellation were plainly visible from my house.

If "Orang Gila" cares to communicate with me, for which purpose you might be kind enough to give him my address, I will try and make an appointment with him in order to show him the three stars in question.

Thanking you in anticipation,
I am, etc.,
D. K.

Shanghai, August 18, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to "D.K.'s" letter on this subject, I beg leave to suggest that the three stars mentioned as presently visible from Shanghai form part of the constellation popularly known amongst mariners as "the False Cross," the appearance of which bears a certain amount of resemblance to the Southern Cross itself.

In the course of many journeyings between Europe and the Far East viâ Suez Canal, the northernmost point at which I have first sighted the real Southern Cross has been rather more than half-way down the Red Sea while the last glimpse of it has occurred about one day's steaming time south of Hongkong.

Perhaps some nautical authority would be kind enough to furnish an authentic statement on this subject.

I am, etc.,
INQUIRER.

Shanghai, Aug. 19, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the N.-C. D. N. of the 14th instant, "Orang Gila" makes enquiry as to whether the constellation "Southern Cross" can be seen at Shanghai or not.

From observations I have made on the run from Hongkong to Shanghai, I have found the upper star of the Cross to be just visible above the horizon at a point a few miles North of Turnabout Isl., (say, in Lat 25.30' N.). This was after watching the constellation for two consecutive nights while steaming north, and when the Cross was at its highest altitude, (and position practically vertical), and with a beautifully clear southern horizon, and every condition favourable.

A few thousand years ago this Constellation, "Crux," was visible in England. The phenomenon known as Precession of the Equinoxes is accountable for its slowly being carried south. Astronomers reckon this Precession at about 50" annually, so that a few hundreds of years ago the "Southern Cross" probably was visible from the Lat. of Shanghai.

Other groups of stars in the southern sky somewhat resemble "Crux," but there can be no mistaking the real Cross, with its attendant "pointers" and Centaurus, when seen in a clear sky. The Centaurs disappear before the upper star of the Cross dips, and it was only by watching the constellation closely that I was able to get the result as stated above.

A statement by Siccawei Observatory would be interesting on this point Sir.

Thanking you for insertion,
I am, etc.
RED FUNNEL.

Shanghai, Aug 19, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—As a good Australian I much regret the erratic behaviour of our beloved Southern Cross.

"Red Funnel" writes that in Lat. 25° 30' he "found the upper star of the Cross to be just visible above the horizon," at the time when "the Cross was at its highest altitude."

I don't pretend to know how this came about, but I do know that in Lat. 25° 30' N. it is the clear duty of the uppermost star, Gamma Crucis, to be eight degrees above the horizon at maximum altitude, which is about 16 times the moon's diameter. The lowest star, Alpha Crucis, should at that time be about two degrees above the horizon which might possibly be termed "just" visible, a somewhat loose term, but a term which certainly would not have been applied by "Red Funnel" to the upper star had the latter been in its proper place.

The furthest north one can see the entire constellation, which is behaving itself properly, is Lat. 21° 21' disregarding refraction, precession and any form of aberration, astronomical or otherwise.

PURE MILK

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The following excerpt from the "Dairy" of July 24, just to hand, may be of interest to the Shanghai consuming public and to the authorities concerned:—

"Given a healthy cow—no others should be tolerated—elaborate buildings are not essential, nor is it necessary to have expensive and complicated dairy machinery. Briefly summarized, the essential requirements are:—

"1.—The milker must be clean in person and in clothes.

"2.—The utensils receiving the milk must be washed and sterilized between milkings.

"3.—The cow's udder and hindquarters must be free from adherent dirt.

"4.—The milk must be adequately cooled, and the cooler must be above suspicion of harbouring dirt in any of its many nooks and crannies.

"5.—The churns in which the milk is stored for travel must be clean and free from infection.

"6.—The cowhouse should be light and well cleaned, and the amount of dust suspended in the air at milking time should be as low as possible.

"7.—The route from the cowhouse to the cooling room should be as short as possible, and should not traverse yards full of manure or dark or dirty passages.

"8.—The personnel should be intelligent and painstaking, and the supervision should never be slack."

THE BOLSHEVIK CREED

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your Book Page of today's issue there is a note on Professor Sarolea's book, "Impressions of Soviet Russia." I read this last year when it appeared as a series of articles in "The Scotsman," of Edinburgh, where Professor Sarolea, a Belgian, has long been resident. The writer gave me the impression of being a man who had taken great pains to get at the truth of things, and who wished to give a fair statement of the Bolsheviks themselves. What you call "an attack on the theory of Communism and a condemnation of the actions of the Bolshevik oligarchy" seemed to me conclusions come to after an "impartial, not neutral" study, on the ground where it began, and still continues, of a new social and political organism rapidly erected and maintained forcibly in place of another that had grown slowly and had never really matured.

Sarolea's statement of the Soviet attitude of hatred of Christ and the bitterness of its hostility to the Christian religion made a deeper impression on me than any other part of his story. Any one interested in Soviet Russia would find this book well worth a reading.

THE MOTE AND THE BEAM

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I notice in to-day's "North-China Daily News" that more local firms have been summoned under the S. M. C. regulation requiring all motor trucks to show on the left side, by a plate or clearly painted, the weight carrying capacity of the vehicle. I wonder if any of the lynx-eyed satellites of the Assistant Commissioner of Police (Traffic) have happened to notice that some of the P. W. D. motor trucks and trailers, and also some of the vacuum tank trucks, do not conform to the regulation, in that they have some, or all, of the following faults:—

1. Notice on wrong side of vehicle.
2. Letters or figures wrong colour.
3. Letters or figures wrong size.
4. Wrong weights shown.

HINA AT THE COMING OPIUM CONFERENCE

o the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The first of the two International Conferences which take place at Geneva in November 1924 will deal with two main subjects. First the lessening of opium use in the monopolies of those countries with Far Eastern possessions, and second, as to the measures which should be taken by the Government of the Republic of China to bring about suppression of the illegal production and use of opium in China.

What will be the attitude of China and her delegates at this Conference? She will enter the Council Chamber with a mill-stone about her neck. She knows and the world knows, that during 1924 between 10 and 15 thousand tons of opium were produced in China or in other words many times the total production of the entire world. The resolution for discussion does not deal with the reasons for this state, but only with the remedy. China will not be called upon to make explanations, except in so far as breach of Treaties may call them forth, but she will be asked for some definite plans for immediate and persistent suppression. Public opinion in Great Britain is just now pre-eminently clamant, that the British monopolies in the East must make definite reductions in their opium consumption, for it is simply unthinkable that British Colonies can be permitted any longer to raise from 12 to 45 per cent. of their revenues from a traffic "morally indefensible." But how can the monopoly countries protect themselves against the smuggling in of Chinese cheap opium if their present traffic be reduced or ended? Loss of revenue is one thing, but the financial demands of a great preventive service would involve a local taxation which few Colonies would tolerate. Reduction in the monopolies must go pari-passu with the eased production in China. There is only one remedy for the anti-smoker; cessation of production. If produced in any corner of the world he will get it.

Is it possible for China to present any programme for restrictive cultivation? Two thirds of the opium in China is produce in provinces over which the Central Government has little or no control, but she cannot birk the fact that at least eight provinces which she claims to control produced enormous quantities in 1924. China cannot, dare not, go back on her declarations against an opium monopoly or opium legalization, even had she the power to do so, for it is more than evident that no Treaty Power would consent to such action unless the monopoly were jointly controlled by a service in which foreigners, as well as Chinese were engaged. Only such foreign co-operation could assure that the monopoly would in a period of years end the traffic. Such a co-operative monopoly would be infinitely better than the present chaotic conditions, but is not this co-operation the last thing China would agree to? The suggestion made at the League of Nations two years ago, that the recalcitrant Tuchuns should be directly appealed to by the League, met with great opposition because it was considered an unwarranted interference in internal affairs, and so was dropped. Investigation of the opium provinces between now and the Conference would be useless; it would result in the time worn statement "not a spot to be found," for the harvest of 1924 has been reaped in every province, and the Conference knows every detail of the cultivation. Military officials responsible for cultivation try to minimize their culpability by denouncing the morphia traffic carried on by subjects of foreign powers. The morphia traffic is indeed enormous, and quantity for quantity far more destructive than opium, but there is much evidence that the second conference in November will so effectively curtail and control morphia production that the traffic from Europe and Japan will almost vanish. One opium cultivating general verbally defends himself on the ground that India was sending much opium to China, that he views it in self-defence. As not a pound of opium has been exported from India to China since 1913, this general's knowledge is somewhat recent.

Armies have been cursed for the present opium state of China and not without reason, since four-fifths of the opium taxes go directly or indirectly to maintain them, but surely there is a deeper reason than this, and it lies in the present economic state of the country. Armies are maintained because funds cannot be found for their disbandment. Soldiers disbanded without back pay and reasonable discharge allowances, become brigands, and so the whole business moves in an economic vicious circle. If disbandment cannot take place, then the easiest way of maintenance is opium cultivation and taxation; and this is what is taking place.

Economic improvement will take years, and will depend upon the development of national unity and obedience to central authority. What will China do at the Conference? Proclain her inability to control the traffic and appeal to the world for sympathy in her present disorganized state? Will she be willing to accept the suggestions and help of the Friendly Power at the Conference? Something must be done, for China is at the bar of world opinion, and as the improvement demanded in monopoly countries is largely dependant on restricted growth in China, she must be prepared to accept and honestly put into force at least some of the Conference demands.

Straightforward open monopoly experiments have been tried in three or four centres during 1923-4. The organization has been efficient to the last detail for controlling cultivation, transport and sales, but the object has been exclusively to raise military funds, and to encourage to the utmost opium use. Little wonder that the people have made strong protests against these monopolies and their taxes. A Monoploy, however, to lessen use and ultimately entirely prohibit is quite another matter, and its consideration should not be lightly set aside, especially if a service of foreign co-operation be included.

The world pressure at the Conference will demand some programme from China, and the reiteration of the fact that her laws embody total prohibition will be no defence or excuse for her present condition. Must the millions of China continue for decades to be corrupted by compulsory cultivation and unrestricted use, whilst the Government tries to develop a sense of moral obligation in her militarists? This method will take too long. Something definite must be formulated now, for opium cultivation is increasing year by year, and with the increasing millions of smokers amelioration becomes more and more remote.

WHAT IS JAZZ?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In view of the general depression, whether due to the heat, or to the widespread affliction caused by the subject, would you care for a few words showing the actual etymology of the word "Jazz?"

Weekley gives it as of "negro origin," but no explanation. A special question was asked in the usually omniscient "Questions worth answering" in the Pearson's journals. The reply was far less dogmatic and infallible than usual, and actually recorded "What the actual word means we do not know."

It is commonly associated with the minced expletive "gee-whizz" but really is in no way connected with such phrases.

By an accident I was in a position to learn its interesting origin which was told me by an old musician, who, in his earlier days, had much experience with the negroes in U.S. He informed me that every band of "niggers" had their fixed names for each performer. Thus "Bones," etc. The occupation superseded the patronymic appellation. The chief performer was always the banjoist. He was invariably entitled "Jasper."

If invited to perform the phrase was, invariably, "Come along Jazz." Any fortunate owner of a banjo in private circles shared the honorific title. Syncopated rhythm always held special charm for negro audiences. From this banjoist appelation of Jasper dates the now world-famous term.

EDUCATION VERSUS BUSINESS

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—If anybody forgets the doom of the flim-flam exchange business in Shanghai a few years ago, his memory is now to be refreshed by the boom of schools, yes colleges and universities established and being established in the leading cities, especially in Shanghai. It does not follow that education is making rapid progress, for those schools are mostly of a deceptive nature. The Kiangsu Educational Bureau is considering measures to purge China of such schools and, coincidently, the same question has been discussed before the Parliament at Peking. However, the voice is not yet heard throughout the whole country, and so it will be through the medium of the press that the public will be given to know about the situation in order to give its opinion. Before public opinion is available, there must be no concealment of necessary information. With a view to revealing the process of development of the commercialized education in its entirety, the writer tells things as they are. It is no betrayal of secrets, nor an exaggeration.

On their dream of becoming millionaires, a number of self-styled educators adopt the get-rich-quick-Wallingford policy in education and make so much profit that schools of similar type spring up in increasing numbers. Hence keen competition that causes the "school-runners" to employ business methods in their struggle for existence, among which may be mentioned for example, Propaganda and Solicitation.

In the first place, owing to the utter lack of underlying principles, upright motives or previous preparations, the organization of such a school usually begins with nothing at hand except a catalogue giving an elaborate description of courses, faculty, school buildings and all general information, which—if true! —would make a best university in China. Then, in order to induce students to ask for free copies of the catalogue, the school-runners prepare elaborate announcements in the Chinese newspapers in much the same way as business advertising. They must be written in high-sounding terms, couched in persuasive language, arranged in an attractive form, and printed on conspicuous space; if there is a person of some reputation in the school, then his name is given in large type, like the names of movie stars; again, it is another good material to be announced, if the school has the honour, of borrowing the names of a few militarists, tuchuns, or tulis on the board of trustees; in short, no detail is overlooked to make the announcements likely to arrest the attention of even the least attentive. That kind of announcement is neccessary, because the school cannot be made known by any other means, in any other way, except this. So, in the newspapers, there are as many forms of announcements as there are kinds of schools. A glance over them might cause a busy reader to think that his narrow space of time before breakfast is wasted. Indeed, the school-runners outdo the conservative merchants in the use of printer's ink!

In the second place, there must be students. Once a prospective student is enrolled he is to be induced to remain by all means. He is given the attention that a salesman is taught to accord a client. Finally he can choose his desired class without anything like entrance examination. Students thus admitted generally divide in two opposite views afterwards. One would agree with the school in cheating money from his parents for the purpose of idle pleasure under the mantle of a scholar, using the school as a boarding house. The other finds, too late, that the school is far from being as good as advertised. It is housed in a dwelling building in a congested street, with class rooms closely connected, with dormitories far away in another street, to say nothing of a laboratory or a library. Dr. This and Prof. That are never in real existence, but manufactured figures living on paper only in that catalogue. The net result is that both classes of students are victimized and that at the expense of their education the school-runners make considerable profit in their educational-commercial enterprise. If they are merciful, they use the money thus got in engaging teachers and buying equipment, thus continuing the school in operation. Accidentally, the money-makers are mistaken for educators! As to those who meet with reverses they still lose nothing, but close down their school without means to pay bills, except by selling off furniture, or, if even that is impossible, by the cheapest expedient of quickest flight. The unfortunate creditors are neither the landlords nor the book-dealers but students who—foolish customers!—are willing to pay for no return. They are mercilessly tricked into making the mistake! Who is to blame?

How blind the public is to the commercialized education based upon the dangerous theory that students are for schools, not schools for students. That is to say students must first come before schools can be opened in earnest, just as patrons must be first solicited before goods can be sold. Yet, a business-like school is unlike a pure business firm in that the former can start without capital and without merchandise! After all, much bad will be done in the name of good, unless the tribunal of public opinion be quickly accumulated together as an irresistible force to cry down any effort in making money behind the screen of a school. It is hoped that the real educators will come out to take the lead in meting out due punishment upon the false educators who have done enough to eclipse the sun of education.

As a student, the writer himself ventures to suggest two immediate ways out. Either the questionable schools, large and small, should be reorganized as mere patterns into which real substances of education are to be poured in the future. Or the titular colleges and universities should be easily transformed into middle and primary schools to facilitate the movement of popular education now under way. In either case, it is a relief to all, especially to not a few foreign educators who accuse China of top-heavy education.

MORE GRAMMAR TRAPS

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I would like to know who is right in the following dispute:—

In the sentence,
"There are a number of men."

in analyzing A says the subject of the sentence is "number" and it is governed by both "a" and "of men." B says the subject is "men" and is governed by "a number of."

Who is right?

Thanks for any solution that may come, from either yourself or any of your readers.

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Under the above caption in your issue of to-day a correspondent signing "?" quotes the following and wishes to learn which is correct:—

"There are a number of men"
"There is a number of men"

Notwithstanding the mention of the component parts of the nouns of multitude, the latter is correct.

The following examples are also correct:—

A company of Soldiers was engaged....
A band of musicians was entertaining the company

Other common errors are:—

"different to" instead of "different from"
"averse to" instead of "averse from"
"two-storied" instead of "two-storeyed"
"monies" instead of "moneys"

WASTED MONEY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—After a disturbed night's rest. it was hardly refreshing to read in the morning paper of the distressful conditions in certain parts of China owing to flood, and the resulting famine that must follow, reducing millions to starvation, but it caused me to reflect, "What does an eclipse of the moon cost China in fireworks?"

Enough money was wasted early this morning by my Chinese neighbours this way to keep many families from starvation for many days, as evidenced by the refuse in my garden, where my friends kindly direct their targets, to the consternation of my domestic pets and the wild feathered tribe encouraged to inhabit this particular spot. But my neighbours only aggregate five small families of comparatively small means, so what must the cost of explosive be all over China, and how much money would show on the credit side after providing for a famine costing a mere $25,000,000?

The Hong List records two moon eclipses for the year 1924, which, I am thankful to say have passed.

ECLIPSES AND THEIR CAUSES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to "Sirius's" suggestion that the Chinese populace should be enlightened as to the cause of eclipses, I beg to point out that—

(a) The Government observatory in Peking issues an annual calendar which gives full information on the matter.

(b) The computation of eclipse times has been known to educated Chinese for several centuries.

(c) On this occasion the people were evidently ready for the eclipse to occur.

It seems that the case is simply one of "olo custom" and I suggest to harsh critics, who, like myself, were wakened by the noise, that there are many among us who still believe in the weather changing with the moon in spite of the fact that science disproved any serious connexion between the two many years ago.

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It is very probable, as Dr. Chatley states in the "North-China Daily News" of the 19th, that the Chinese Government has indicated in its calendar the time of the recent lunar eclipse. But has it explained its cause to the "untutored millions," stating that the phenomenon is due to the passing of the moon into the shadow of the earth? This is the enlightenment which I have suggested, and which science has thoroughly approved. Such enlightenment would kill, or at least discredit "olo custom," founded on fancy and superstition, and imagining that a monster is endeavouring to devour the bright orb.. Have the Government, the Peking University, and other establishments of Higher Education informed the people that the existence of such a monster is but silly nonsense, a pure figment of the primitive mind, and hence firing bombs to scare him away, is but utter waste of valuable materials, which in an impoverished and famine-stricken country might be better employed in relieving thousands of homeless and destitute people in Chihli, Shantung, Hupeh, Hunan, Kuangtung and other affected regions?

The Director of the Observatory is familiar with French and English and there is no superstitious matter at all in his book. I suggest that "Sirius" should communicate with the Chinese newspapers on this subject.

LAW REPORTS

SHANGHAI APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Important Question of Supreme Court's Jurisdiction

Three applications for leave to appeal against judgments recently given by him were made to his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner in the Supreme Court on Thursday.

The first concerned the action brought by Messrs. Moorhead & Halse against the Shanghai Ice & Cold Storage Co. and the Union Cold Storage Co., in which the latter firm had entered a motion for their name to be struck out of the case on the ground that they are a London Company not registered in China and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. They had been joined as defendants as being owners of a piece of land (the subject of the pending action) of which the Shanghai Ice Co. are tenants, and his Lordship ruled that the court had jurisdiction over them. Leave to appeal against this ruling was now sought.

Mr. G. H. Wright, for appellants, said that he was awaiting cabled instructions, but had to file his motion for leave to appeal within the specified 15 days, the Court having now power to extend the period.

Mr. Reader Harris, for respondents, said he had no objection to the matter going to the Privy Council, it being one of special importance.

His Lordship—I quite agree. The whole jurisdiction of this court has been challenged on a very important matter, and a large amount of property not only in Shanghai but in China may be affected. The jurisdiction of this court to have any control over it at all has been challenged and I think certainly it is a matter which should go to the Privy Council.

Leave to appeal was accordingly granted, appellants to furnish £300 security and $150 for the cost of preparing the record. The "return day" was adjourned sine die.

A Question of Cotton Futures

The second motion for leave to appeal was made by Mr. Reader Harris on behalf of Mr. Maurice David, defendant in the action brought by Messrs. A. & B. Rosenfeld for Tls. 21,146 damages arising out of an alleged breach of partnership. His Lordship's judgment was in favour of plaintiffs for the amount claimed (less a sum due to Messrs. Spunt & Co. in respect of a special arrangement made with them by Mr. Rosenfeld, senior).

Counsel said the appeal was against a portion of the judgment only, that relating to "Cotton futures."

On February 12, or 18, certain contracts for cotton futures were in existence, and these (as stated in his Lordship's judgment) showed some slight loss at the time of Mr. David's withdrawal from the partnerhip. Plaintiffs, who were left to carry on the business, did not close these contracts till a later date and they then showed very considerable loss. Plaintiffs urged that defendant should take his share of these losses, but defendant contended that the contracts, being an asset should, for the purposes of a dissolution account, be valued as at the date of dissolution. His Lordship held that under the partnerhip, defendant must be held liable for his share of the later losses, and this ruling is the subject of the present appeal.

Leave to appeal was granted, appellant being ordered to furnish £300 security and $250 for the cost of the record.

A Siberian Company's Affairs

Mr. Reader Harris next made application for leave to appeal to the Full Court in the case of A. Fermus, a Tientsin lawyer, v. the Siberian Agricultural Corporation. Plaintiff claimed $28,000 on promissory notes drawn up by the Corporation in favour of S. N. Shendrikoff, and Sir Skinner Turner gave judgment in his favour for the amount claimed. There were two other claimants to the money, Mr. Malyquin and Col. Ushakoff, and it is by the former that appeal is now made.

Mr. Reader Harris mentioned that the Siberian Agricultural Corporation had dropped out of the case, and that Col. Ushakoff was not appealing and was not concerned in the appeal.

His Lordship allowed the application, granting a stay of execution and making an order for the case to come before the Full Court on October 7.

INSPECTOR CHARGED WITH MANSLAUGHTER

Coolie Dies After Slap on the Face at Louza Station: Story of Deceased's Impudence

Sub-Inspector Thomas Dunne, a Municipal Police officer who has been 16 years in the service, appeared before Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court last Friday upon a charge of having feloniously and unlawfully killed one Yoh Ching-tsang, a coolie employed at Louza police station, the allegation being that, because of his impudence, accused gave the coolie a blow which led to his death.

Mr. E. T. Maitland appeared to prosecute and Mr. M. Reader Harris defended.

Mr. Maitland, in a brief opening, informed the court that the deceased was No. 4 coolie at Louza and was at work in the station on Wednesday. The Inspector did not appear to have been satisfied with the way in which he was doing his work. The coolie appeared to have been impudent, and the Inspector slapped his face. On the following day the coolie died in Shantung Road Hospital and according to medical evidence had suffered an injury to the base of the skull. After evidence of arrest had been given, the prosecution would ask for a remand in order that a post-mortem examination might be made.

Inspector Maguire gave evidence of arresting the accused that morning at Louza station, and said that he made no statement in answer to the charge.

In asking for a remand on moderate bail, Mr. Reader Harris pointed out that although the charge was a serious one there was no suggestion that accused had used any unlawful or dangerous weapon.

Mr. Maitland said he had no objection and would be satisfied if accused were granted bail on his own recognizances.

Inspector Dunne was accordingly remanded and granted bail on his own recognizance of $500.

Inquest Opened

Later in the morning, Mr. Whitamore (British Assessor) and Magistrate Li held an inqest on the body of the deceased at the Public Mortuary.

Chinese P.C. 370 stated that on Wednesday afternoon he saw deceased lying on his bed in the coolies' room and called to him, but he made no reply. About 2.30 Inspector Dunne told him to get up and that he was not wanted any more, but the coolie refused to move and the Inspector pushed him down, by placing his two hands on deceased's shoulders. The Inspector wanted him to get out of the station and deceased would not go, but later a ricsha was called and he went away.

Mr. Whitamore—Did you see any blows struck by anybody?

Witness—No.

"A Pretty Heavy Blow."

Another coolie employed at Louza said Inspector Dunne told deceased to go and get a mop, but he refused to do so. The Inspector then ordered him to get out, but he refused, and the Inspector then slapped his face, giving him a pretty heavy blow. Deceased resigned his job there and then, and went to lie down. Accused was standing behind the coolie when he slapped him.

A station chauffeur who was passing at the time the incident occurred spoke to seeing the accused strike the coolie twice on the face.

Dr. C. J. Davenport, of Shantung Road hospital, said he saw deceased between 9.30 and 10 o'clock on Thursday morning and he was then lying unconscious, breathing irregularly and unable to speak. His condition was difficult to diagnose. The right ear was slightly bruised and swollen, but there was no bleeding about the nose, ears or mouth, and witness formed the opinion there had been some injury to the brain. At 11 o'clock the symptoms became worse, and witness thought that possibly he might be suffering from the effects of opium poisoning.

Mr. Whitamore—The symptoms you have described are very similar to those of opium poisoning?

Injury to Brain?

Witness—Very similar. We tried him for that, but two things against the theory were that his temperature was high, about 102, and his pulse somewhat quick. Witness went on to say that he saw the deceased twice in the afternoon, and further investigation showed that there was hæmorrhage in the spinal cord, possibly due to a blow. There was a mark on the scalp which might have been caused by a blow, but it would have had to be a heavy blow with a clenched fist, not a slap, or with some blunt instrument, but it might also have been due to the deceased falling against something. An autopsy would be necessary before it could definitely be said if there was any injury to the brain.

At this point, the inquiry was adjourned.

Withdrawal of the Manslaughter Charge: Coolie's Death Caused by Kidney Disease

The accused appeared before the Court, on remand, on Monday.

Mr. E. T. Maitland appeared for the prosecution and Mr. M. Reader Harris for the accused, while M. d'Auxion de Ruffe watched the proceedings on behalf of the family of the deceased, Yeh Ching-tsang.

At the outset, Mr. Maitland intimated that, after he had called medical and other evidence, he would ask leave of the court to withdraw the charge. The proceedings had been adjourned for a week, but the prosecution considered it only fair to the accused that the case should be brought on as soon as possible.

Dr. E. G. Gauntlett then was called and stated that he was present at the autopsy on the body of the deceased which Dr. McKinstry performed at the Public Mortuary. He found that the cause of death was advanced disease of the kidneys, possibly aided by opium poisoning.

Mr. Maitland—What exactly did you find?

Witness—The kidneys were small and showed marked degeneration, and were identical with the condition known as chronic Bright's disease. There were signs of pleurisy in the lungs, but not recent.

Asked if he examined the deceased's head, and whether there was anything wrong with it, witness said there was a bruise at the back of the skull, but there was no injury to the bone or the brain. The brain was congested, as would be expected from kidney disease.

No Medical Evidence of Assault.

Mr. Maitland—Would that blow on the head affect his death in any way?

Witness—Not at all.

Could that bruise on the back of the head have been caused by a blow with the open hand?—No.

Could it have been caused by a blow with the fist?—I think it is not likely, unless it were a very heavy blow.

Would the injury to the back of the head have affected this man's death in any way?—None whatever.

The Magistrate — Were there bruises on any other part of the body?

Witness—On the lower part of the back. Taken with the bruise on the back of the skull, the most obvious thing would be a fall backwards on a hard floor.

The Magistrate—Had that anything to do with this man's death?

Witness—Nothing whatever.

Dr. McKinstry, of the Public Health Department, also gave evidence that the cause of death was advanced kidney disease. He found a bruise on the back of deceased's head, on the left side, about an inch in diameter, but there was no injury to the bone or to the brain. It was not a serious bruise, and could not in any way have affected the man's death.

Mr. Maitland—Could it have been caused by a blow with an open hand?—No.

Do you think it could have been caused by a blow with the clenched fist?—A very, very severe blow might have produced it, but it would have been very difficult.—Witness added that the bruise on the lower part of the back was not a severe bruise and had no effect on the death of the coolie.

The Magistrate—How do you suggest this bruise was caused?

Witness—It might have been caused by a fall, but a patient's lying in bed might produce it. The bruise on the head was probably due to a fall.

Signs of Morphia.

In answer to Mr. Reader Harris, witness said that an analysis of the contents of the stomach, taken in the Shantung Road Hospital before death, disclosed 5 millegrams of morphia, but this would not be an indication as to how much morphia was in the stomach at the time this was taken out.

Chinese Police Sgt. 370 gave evidence that on the afternoon of the 13th he saw deceased lying on his bed. Inspector Dunne went up to him and said that as the coolie had resigned he could not be allowed to stay there any longer. The Inspector told him to get out, but the coolie made no answer and did not rise, whereupon the Inspector took hold of him and lifted him up, again telling him to get out. The coolie still refused to move and the Inspector took hold of him by the shoulders and pushed him out. He was pushed as far as downstairs and, refusing to go farther, the Inspector said, "I will drive him away." The officer then left. A ricsha was called and the cook helped the coolie into it, witness seeing him no more. He was told that the coolie had been taken to his brother's house.

Mr. Reader Harris—The witness said that the Inspector pushed the coolie downstairs. Does he mean that he walked behind him, holding him by the shoulders all the time, or that he pushed him and the man fell down?

Witness—The Inspector had both hands on the coolie's shoulders and pushed him from behind, and the coolie walked downstairs. He walked down with the Inspector's hands on his shoulders.

Refused to Work.

Zung Sih-kung, who said he had once been a tailor and was now a coolie, gave evidence that Inspector Dunne told the deceased to clean the walls with a mop, but the coolie refused to get the mop, whereupon the Inspector struck him. He did so with both hands, open, striking him on both sides of the head. Witness went away for a moment, and on returning saw deceased standing up. There did not appear to be anything wrong with him. He did not fall down. Witness said nothing to him but went on with his own work.

At this point the Magistrate asked, assuming the case went on, what evidence the prosecution had to call to substantiate the charge?

Mr. Maitland—I have no other evidence.

The Magistrate—These two Chinese are the only people you could call?

Mr. Maitland—Yes. I will call the chauffeur, but he will only be able to corroborate what they have said. I do not wish to keep anything back, however. All the available evidence ought to be given.

The chauffeur employed at Louza station was then called and said that he saw the Inspector strike deceased, with his open hands, and on the side of the head. Witness saw three blows given, and then he went away. Deceased was bending down at the time, but he did not fall.

The Charge Withdrawn.

Mr. Maitland then informed the court that this was the whole of the evidence he could produce for the prosecution, and having regard to the fact that the doctors had definitely stated that death was due to kidney disease and that the injury to the head could not have been caused by a slap of the hand and was unlikely to have been caused by a blow with the fist, further that the injury in no way affected the man's death, he felt it his duty to apply to the court for leave to withdraw the charge.

The Magistrate—Have you anything to say, Mr. Harris?

Mr. Reader Harris—No sir.

The Magistrate—In this case the charge made against Inspector Dunne was one of manslaughter. He was prosecuted by the Municipal Police Department and appeared before the Court on Friday last, when a remand was ordered for one week. Application is now made that, in view of certain evidence, the prosecution do not wish to continue. I think it was quite the proper course to adopt, to hear the evidence to-day, because the remand was for one week and that would mean the charge hanging over this man's head for a week. On the evidence before me, certainly I say the charge is dismissed. The doctors have stated positively that by no means what happened at Louza station on the morning of the 13th could have caused the death of this unfortunate man. It is obvious the charge should be withdrawn. It is dismissed, and the recognizance entered into by Dunne is also discharged.

ALLEGED SAVAGE ATTACK ON GIRL

Ear Slashed by Razor: Indian Watchman Charged

Makin Singh, a watchman employed at the Ewo mills, appeared in H.M. Police Court on Thursday before Mr. G. W. King charged with doing grievous bodily harm to a Chinese girl named Tsang Wang-sze.

A Chinese police constable gave evidence that on Wednesday afternoon, whilst on duty at the old Peking Road bridge, he saw the complainant coming along in a ricsha and the accused following. The girl's face was bleeding. Seeing that the Indian carried a knife, witness asked him to hand it over, but he replied that they had better go to the police station first. They went to the station, and accused was placed under arrest and the girl despatched to hospital.

Dr. Agnes Towers, of Shantung Road hospital, stated that when admitted to hospital the complainant was suffering from a wound on the right ear, the larger part of which had been out away, leaving a small part of the lobe hanging. The wound would heal, but the girl would be permanently disfigured. There was an abrasion on the right forearm, caused by a bite, and also one on the left forefinger which might have been caused by a bite or scratch. The injury to the ear had been caused by a sharp instrument, such as the Chinese razor produced, and a fair amount of force must have been used, possibly by pulling the ear down and slashing at it.

Accused reserved his questions and asked for an adjournment in order that he might obtain legal assistance. Accordingly, the case was adjojurned until next morning.

THE SCHOONER W. H. TALBOT

Chinese Prays for Libel and Sale of Vessel

Mr. S. A. Moss filed a petition in the United States Court for China on Saturday praying for a libel of the American schooner W. H. Talbot. The petition was made on behalf of Leong Kow, a Shanghai man, who sets forth a claim from the vessel of $8,515.90, including money due for food and supplies, repair work, and funds advanced to pay the crew's wages. He appealed for the Court to decree payment of the amount claimed, and asked that the vessel be condemned and sold to pay this amount.

The libel consists of four allegations. The first is with respect to supplies for the vessel, and for the subsistence of the crew furnished by A. Sing, Ld., amounting to Mex. $641.76, The second covers material and labour on repairs necessary to make the vessel seaworthy, these being done by Kum Chong, the sum amounting to Mex. $1,200.00.

The third claim is with relation to money advanced for the sailors. When the voyage of the schooner ended here the crew were stranded, there being no money either to pay them their wages or arrange for their transportation home, and for these and similar items it was necessary to have money. Mr. Eugene Beausang advanced the required funds for this, amounting to $5,674.24.

All three of these parties have disposed of their claims to the libellant, Leong Kow, who is now the owner and holder of these claims.

S. M. C. MOTOR TRUCK REGULATIONS

First Victims of New Order in U. S. Court

Messrs. Andersen, Meyer & Co., were summoned under the new S. M. C. regulation requiring all motor trucks to show on the left side, by a plate or clearly painted, the weight carrying capacity of the vehicle, and they pleaded not guilty of the offence in the United States Court on Saturday.

Mr. E. H. Sherman, manager of the company, gave evidence to the effect that all the company's trucks had had a plate placed on the right side giving the information required, and he personally had seen it done in the case of truck 5292.

The case was dismissed, the Commissioner, Mr. N. E. Lurton, believing the police had made a mistake, and suggesting the plates be placed in a more conspicuous position.

The Hudford Motors and the Asia Engineering and Construction Co. were each fined G.$2 for the same offence.

THREE CHARGES OF VAGRANCY

Three more charges of vagrancy were heard in the U. S. Court on Monday morning before Judge Milton D. Purdy.

George L. Hess, an American seaman, was alleged to have begged from foreigners on July 3 in Seward Road. P. C. Bourosky, who made the arrest, stated that the defendant resisted and struck him on the cheek.

The defendant stated that he lost his boat in Hongkong, was unable to secure work on another, and finally stowed away and came to Shanghai, where he slept on launches anchored at the Customs jetty. He was given food on ships where he applied for work, but had been refused assistance at the Shipping Office of the U. S. Consulates in Hongkong and Shanghai because he had no papers.

The Judge said that, as there was no other way of getting him back home, since the consular offices had, no doubt justly, refused him assistance, he must find accused guilty, and sentenced him to three months and 10 days imprisonment in Bilibid Prison, the last 30 days to be served on a homeward bound vessel.

Emil Peterson, who had previously served a sentence for drunk and disorderly conduct, was similarly charged.

Mr. Charles I. Graham, U. S. Consul in charge of the Shipping Office, said that he twice found ships for the defendant to return to America, and that he "jumped" both of them. He was found guilty and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in Bilibid, the last 30 days to be served on a homeward bound ship.

George Newton was the last defendant. Mr. Graham stated that in this case also he found ships for the defendant to return home upon, but he had not availed himself of the opportunity. The Judge sentenced him to 4 months in Bilibid, with the usual provision as to the last 30 days.

THE Japanese woman arms dealer, whose ricsha coolie was arrested in possession of a Mauser pistol and 100 rounds of ammunition on Tuesday, appeared at the Japanese Consular Court on Thursday. She was sentenced to 29 days' imprisonment. A large quantity of contraband arms was found at her residence, 115 Yangtszepoo Road.

SET A THIEF TO CATCH A POLICEMAN

Sergeant's House Robbed: Burglar's Dive into Creek

A curious case of a police sergeant who was robbed while on duty came to light in the Mixed Court on Wednesday, when four Chinese appeared before the Court in connexion with two robberies at the house of Sgt. Mason at 49 Temple Road. The house has lately been vacated for a part of the summer during which time the accused persons sought an opportunity to carry off four pieces of brass work, some cutlery, one electric iron, and a mincing machine. Evidence showed that on the afternoon of the 19th Sergeant Mason was on duty at the Bubbling Well Police Station when a Chinese policeman brought in the first accused. It appears that the man was seen by the Chinese Constable carrying several brass ornaments. The constable stopped and questioned the man and not satisfied that the property was his own, told him he had better come along with him. This the man did, but nearing Bubbling Well he asked the constable if it was the police station which they had come to. The constable answered in the affirmative, at which the man thought it best to beat a retreat and, dropping his burden at the very entrance of the station, made a dash for freedom. The constable gave chase while the fugitive dived into a creek. He was, however, caught and taken to the station.

Sergeant Mason in the meantime had discovered his own property residing peacefully on the doorstep. Later two other men were arrested and the remaining property was traced to a small curio dealer's shop in Jessfield Road. The shopkeeper was also arrested though he claimed to know nothing of the theft. It seems that there were two robberies at the house in Temple Road, one on the 17th and the other on the 19th. The curio dealer was fined $30 while the other three accused were remanded.

BREACH OF CONTRACT BY "ECHO DE CHINE"

Former Editor Awarded $1,000 Damages and Salary for the Full Term of Agreement

Damages of $1,000 were granted to Dr. Vallet in the French Consular Court on Wednesday by M. Baurens when judgment was given in an action brought by Dr. Vallet against the "Echo de Chine" for breach of contract. M. Bonnafous appeared for the plaintiff and M. Du Pac de Marsoulies for the defence.

It was stated that Dr. Vallet, who engaged as editor of the "Echo de Chine" two and a half years ago, on three years' contract, on July 23 received a cheque from Père Sallou, a director of the firm, for his salary up to that date, with an intimation that his services no longer would be required. It was claimed by the defence that, as there was no written contract, the employers were at liberty to dispense with M. Vallet's services and were under no obligation to continue to employ M. Vallet.

The plaintiff held that, although no written agreement was signed, documents could be produced on both sides showing that an agreement had been made, which, according to French law, was equivalent to a written contract.

The latter view was accepted by the Court and in addition to $1,000 damages it was ordered that M. Vallet should receive a sum completing his salary to the end of the three years' contract.

IN H. M. Supreme Court, on Monday, application was made by Mr. A. G. Mossop that Mr. Lo, of Messrs. Lo and Lo, of Hongkong, should be admitted to the register of legal practitioners in Shanghai. The application was granted.

THE Ningpo and Soochow associations in Shanghai are continuing their agitation in connexion with certain allegations made some months ago against a Dutch subject here. They demand that the alleged offender shall be brought back to Shanghai for trial, and that the Dutch Consul be dismissed for having afforded him protection.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Police Report for July.

A shooting affray, the outcome of a quarrel amongst members of an armed gang, occurred in a house at 1117 Manila Road on July 9 and resulted in the death of one man and the wounding of another. The deceased was identified as having one previous conviction whilst his wounded associate was handed over to the French Police on a charge of armed robbery. One man is under remand for being concerned in a fatal assault on a coolie in the Gordon Road District. A further arrest has been made in connexion with the shooting and wounding of a Chinese Constable and three pedestrians in the Harbin Road District. A foreigner was sentenced to five years' imprisonment on July 29 on a charge of wounding another foreigner in the Hongkew District on June 13. A man and woman concerned in the murder of a pawnbroker on Shanhaikwan Road on May 15 were ordered to be handed over to the Military Governor. The male prisoner committed suicide in the Police cells a few hours after being sentenced. A man was handed over to the Chinese Authorities for execution for the murder of another on Point Road on May 18. A Chinese concerned in the murder of a contractor on Boundary Road on June 15 was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment and expulsion. Three others are under remand for the murder of a Chinese Constable in the Louza District.

Seven reports of armed robbery and one of attempted armed robbery from premises were made to the Police during the month, in addition to which one case of attempted armed highway robbery was recorded. In connexion with these cases and armed robberies committed prior to July 1, nine persons were arrested, four of whom were handed over to the Chinese Authorities. Thirteen persons arrested in the Settlement for armed robbery committed in the French Concession and nine for robbery in territory under Chinese jurisdiction were handed over to the authorities concerned.

357 reports of property stolen made to the Police during the month include 13 cases of burglary, 2 of house-breaking, 4 of godown-breaking and 15 of shop and office-breaking. Investigation was made with sucessful results in 134 cases.

Of four foreigners charged during the month with trafficking in firearms, one was sentenced to 25 days and two to 29 days' imprisonment whilst the fourth is being tried at Marseilles. A Chinese arrested for being in possession of ammunition and wooden pistol cases was sentenced to a year's imprisonment. Two others were handed over to the French Police on a charge of trafficking in arms in the French Concession. Four Chinese were charged with writing and sending threatening letters. Two were each sentenced to four and a half years' imprisonment and expulsion and the others were expelled the Settlement.

Ten cases of robbery and piracy were reported as having occurred during the month in territory under Chinese jurisdiction in the neighbourhood of Shanghai. One man wanted by the Pootung Authorities for escaping from their custody in September 1918 whilst serving a sentence for murder and rape, was arrested in the Settlement and handed over.

During the month 64 opium and gambling raids were carried out by the Police, from which a sum of over $5,800 accrued to the Council from fines and confiscations.

Fourteen strikes, involving 42,000 working people, occurred during July. The price of rice during the month averaged $11.60 per picul as compared with $11.80 in June and $12.60 in the corresponding month of last year.

Public Health Report for July.

VITAL STATISTICS.

The foreign death-rate is much below, the Chinese slightly above the mean average for July.

COMMUNICABLE DISEASES.

Smallpox, Influenza, Typhus Fever, Relapsing Fever.—No cases reported.

Enteric Fever.—Two cases of Typhoid fever and one of Paratyphoid fever were notified. None of these had been inoculated. One case of Typhoid fever—a non-resident Filipino child—was fatal. The other case was a Japanese resident. The case of Paratyphoid fever was non-resident.

Amoebic Dysentery.—Six resident and three non-resident cases were notified. Four of these were known to have had previous attacks. The infection of this disease is very widespread, but the majority of persons infected never suffer any inconvenience. The onset of acute symptoms is determined by climatic conditions and individual susceptibility, and bears no constant relation whatever to the date or place of infection, the source of which it is therefore impossible to trace.

Bacillary Dysentery.—Two resident and one non-resident cases were reported. None was fatal. This is an acute infective disease, developing shortly after infection, and is most often conveyed by flies. Insanitary conditions were found in the immediate surroundings in the two cases investigated.

Cholera.—Twenty-nine Chinese cases were reported during the month, but only one of these was confirmed in the Municipal Laboratory. This was a non-resident case. Specimens were not received from most of these cases, and the diagnosis therefore rests on clinical observations only. Seven of these were residents. Apart from the lack of laboratory confirmation, the death-rate from "Acute Diarrhoea" is so low that it is impossible that there should be much unrecognized Cholera in the Settlement and environs. Four deaths occurred among these twenty-nine cases, all of non-residents. None of these were examined in the Laboratory.

One resident Japanese case was reported; this was not confirmed in the Laboratory.

Tuberculosis. — Four resident cases of Pulmonary Tuberculosis, and two non-resident cases were reported among the foreign community. There was one foreign death from this disease.

Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis.—One fatal foreign case was notified. This was a Russian female subject, residing on a Municipal road outside Settlement limits.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury, S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture

GERMANY'S ACCEPTANCE OF FRENCH TERMS REGARDING THE RUHR

Unity of the Allied Front: French Premier's Firm Stand: Loan to Germany Still Dependent on Bankers' Views as to Security

London, Aug. 15.

The German reply has done nothing to relieve immediate doubts regarding the fate of the Conference. The reply, which was received in the afternoon from Berlin, is a long document which took three hours to decode. It is stated to be of an indefinite nature, necessitating a further interchange of views.

It is understood that an agreement was not reached as a result of to-night's discussions between the French and Belgian delegates and the German Ministers. The discussions are being resumed to-morrow.

It is stated that the conversations give hope of a favourable result.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 15.

The papers state that a feature of the Conference in London yesterday was the unity of the Allied front. They emphasize M. Herriot's firmness and recommend the French Premier to maintain his attitude.

"L'Oeuvre" states that the Germans saw that the French position was unassailable and that all the Allies were grouped around France.

"L'Ere Nouvelle" congratulates M. Herriot on having re-grouped around France all the forces of peace, and adds: "Let Germany alone bear the responsibility for her decision."

"Le Matin" says that the American observer, Mr. Logan, paid a visit to the German Delegation yesterday, and made it clear that America would consider Germany responsible for failure of the Conference.—Reuter.

An Acceptance Under Protest.

London, Aug. 16.

It is believed that the Conference is at the point of conclusion. The German delegates, after vainly endeavouring to persuade M. Herriot to agree to evacuation of the Ruhr in April, have apparently decided to accept under protest the French evacuation plan and sign an agreement to carry out the Dawes report, though yesterday evening they were still endeavouring to obtain minor concessions, including immediate evacuation of Duesseldorf, Duisburg and Ruhrort and rendering the occupation of the Ruhr less visible by reduction of the numbers of troops and withdrawal from the chief towns. The endeavour of the Germans to obtain a preliminary guarantee with regard to the £40,000,000 loan has apparently failed. It is understood that they are also soliciting assurance that military control shall be transferred to the League of Nations after the final inspection by the Allies. It is expected that the jurists will to-day draft the necessary diplomatic notes and Protocol.

Later.

It is understood that agreement between the French and German delegates was reached during the night. The Germans took note of the French demands without recognizing the legality of the occupation of the Ruhr.

The French, Belgian and German delegates will resume their conversations this morning. It is not improbable that the Conference will end to-day.

The Reply from Berlin.

Later.

The Conference proceedings opened to-day in an atmosphere of mingled crisis and hopefulness. The French and German delegates argued for hours last night over the reply from Berlin and eventually reached a compromise that the experts will consider to-day which will be a day of bargaining. Extraordinary precautions were taken to keep the German reply secret. It was telegraphed in a new complex code and only sufficient copies were made to supply the negotiators.

Endless messages flowed all night long through the special wires between the Ritz Hotel and Berlin. Even when the German delegates retired to rest late in the morning they were frequently called out of bed to attend informal "Cabinets" in dressing gowns.

The compromise is regarded as tantamount to complete German acceptance of the French demands. There is some disappointment in German official circles, but they hope to satisfy German public opinion by pointing out that they yielded to force majeure. The only hope of the Germans for earlier evacuation is that when the time comes to raise the loan under the Dawes scheme the bankers will insist on the French leaving the Ruhr.

Later.

During the negotiations between the French and Belgians and the Germans to-day, it was agreed that the town and district of Dortmund should be evacuated on the day after the signature of the protocol at the end of August and also other districts occupied during the occupation of the Ruhr, but that the Ruhr itself should be evacuated in a year. The final meeting of the Conference will be held in the evening.

The German delegates will probably go to Berlin to-morrow. The Reichstag will meet on August 21.

Later.

The Conference agreement has been initialled.

The Conference Agreements

Aug. 17.

The agreements concluded by the Conference comprise a final protocol with four annexes, which make no reference to the evacuation of the Ruhr. The protocol sets forth, inter alia, that the agreements are mutually interdependent.

Annexe I consists of the agreement between the Reparations Commission and the German Government relative to the carrying out of the Dawes plan.

Annexe II specifies, inter alia, the form of arbitration in various eventualities, and also provides for a mixed committee of Allied and German representatives to determine the procedure for delivering in kind.

Annexe III provides that the Dawes plan be put into execution by September 20 at the latest, including Germany's promulgation of the necessary laws for the installation of executive bodies, the establishment of a bank and of a German railway company, and the fulfilment of contracts for a loan of 800,000,000 gold marks.

The restoration of the fiscal and economic unity of Germany is to be completed by October 5, including the restoration of the power which the German Administration enjoyed in the occupied territories prior to January 11, 1923, and the restoration of industrial and other undertakings in the Ruhr to their owners, etc. The German railway system is to be taken over by the railway company formed under the Dawes plan by September 20, and the lines worked by the Franco-Belgian Regie are to be completely transferred to that Company by November 20.

The Agreement further deals with an amnesty for political acts since January 11, 1923, and authorises the reference of disputes to the Hague International Court.

Annexe IV embodies the arrangements relative to an American sitting on the Reparations Commission when anything arising from the Dawes plan is considered, and to arbitration regarding German default.

Sanctions will not be applied unless flagrant default is established. The Allies, in the event of sanctions, will safeguard the specific securities pledged for the service of the loan, and give the service of the loan priority. All disputes in connexion with sanctions will be submitted to the World Court.

First Agreement Since the War.

Later.

The final sitting of the Conference, at which Senator Belcourt (Canada) was present as a member of the British Empire Delegation, adopted a resolution that the agreement relating to the execution of the Dawes scheme should be conditional on the issue of the 800,000,000 gold mark loan. The Allied Governments would invite their respective central banks to facilitate the placing of the loan.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, in a speech congratulating the delegates, termed the agreement the first treaty, the first real negotiated agreement since the war. Every party represented was morally bound to do its best to carry it out.

The British Prime Minister added that Notes had been exchanged agreeing to evacuation of the Ruhr within a year from to-day. Certain areas would be evacuated without delay as proof that the French and Belgian Governments meant that the whole matter should be ended with all the expediency circumstances would allow.

Mr. MacDonald said that the delegates must now strive to make their work fruitful for good. He declared that M. Herriot and M. Théunis had been admirable. "If they might have thought at times that I was rather unbending, it was for the sake of Europe and the best interests of all our peoples as I saw them."

The British Prime Minister said that he would like to impress on the German people that, as a result of the Conference, they had created a system of arbitration examination and revision which would enable both them and us to observe the working of the Dawes plan and to watch the projects that might be doubtful in their effects and come together in sincere desire to rectify mistakes so soon as the mistakes were discovered. In other words, the time of national isolation had ended and the time for exchange of views and reasonable dealing with experience had begun. Their work was only beginning, however, and they must continue to work for a peace-making restoration.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald proposed that the question of inter-Allied debts should be dealt with in accordance with the declaration made at Paris. He declared that economic problems were bound to arise when the Central European Powers had found their feet and there would be attempts on the part of soulless international combines by political pressure to subordinate common interest to their own interests. Defence of national interests and national well-being against such moves must receive the most careful consideration and firm action of the democratic Governments.

A New Era.

M. Herriot termed the result of the Conference the beginning of a new era. He paid a tribute to Mr. MacDonald who had led them with such patience, kindness and loyalty. The French Prime Minister said that all the problems of war had not been solved but they already perceived the dawn. France was happy in seeing written in front of the London document the idea of arbitration which all hoped would be generalized in order to substitute a regime of conventions based on right and legality for the atrocious rule of war.

Mr. Frank B. Kellogg complimented the delegates and highly praised the Dawes plan which from the beginning had the loyal support of the President and people of the United States. The American delegate believed that this settlement was the dawning of a new day of revival of industry and prosperity.

M. Théunis hoped that the success of the Dawes plan would create a new atmosphere.

Signor De Stefani laid stress of the necessity for a real and efficient brotherhood of the peoples for harmonious development of the work of reconstruction.

Herr Marx hoped that the provision with regard to arbitration would always be used, and that war had come to an end. He thanked Mr. MacDonald and said that Germany would be willing to collaborate in the common work for humanity.

Baron Hayashi congratulated Mr. MacDonald on the success he had achieved.

Later.

The agreements will be formally signed on August 30 after ratification by the French and German Parliaments.—Reuter.

Allies' Good Faith.

Later.

Correspondence between the French, Belgian and German Delegations dated yesterday shows that MM. Herriot, Théunis and Hymans promised evacuation of the Ruhr within a miximum of 12 months "if the London agreements are carried out in a spirit of good faith and pacification." They also agree the day after the final signature of the agreements to evacuate the Dortmund-Hoerde Zone and the territories outside of the Ruhr occupied since January 11, 1923, in order to give "immediate and spontaneous proof of their desire for peace and confidence in the undertakings freely entered."

Herr Marx, in his reply, while maintaining that the occupation of the Ruhr is unlawful, hopes that the latter decision will mark the beginning of a new era of mutual relations.

It is understood that the Allies have agreed to immediate negotiations with Germany for commercial treaties.

Widespread Satisfaction.

Later.

The 10,000-word "Agreement of London" after a Conference of 31 days has given widespread satisfaction. The speeches at the final sitting were cordially applauded. Mr. MacDonald led the applause of Herr Marx's speech after which a Foreign Office official carried the agreement round for signature or initialling. The President, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the Secretary-General, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Maurice Hankey, and the Delegation Secretaries, excluding the United States Secretary, signed the opening protocol, but the four annexes containing the main substance of the agreements were only initialled by the various Delegations, including representatives of the British Dominions, pending formal signature on August 30. It was expressly stated, however, that the agreements cannot be varied except that the dates regarding the stages of execution of the plan will be advanced a little as the original dates were presupposed, the first steps having been taken by August 15.

It is understood that Herr Marx made clear that he will regard the agreement as null and void if the Reichstag fails to ratify it.

There were animated scenes at Downing Street while the last touches were being put. A large and ever-changing crowd was parading the street and there was a great outburst of cheering when Mr. Ramsay MacDonald emerged looking very pleased. He said: "I am very glad that it is over. Everyone is very pleased." M. Herriot was beaming. He declared: "We are very contented and satisfied. I will return to France altogether pleased and happy."

Mr. MacDonald later left in a train for Lossiemouth to spend a week's holiday in the Highlands. It is expected that he and his daughter Ishbel will be the guests of Their Majesties at Balmoral during the next week-end.—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug. 17.

The Nationalists have published a declaration rejecting the London compromise.—Reuter.

Boom in German Bonds in Wall Street.

New York, Aug. 16.

An amazing speculative craze in Wall Street is making fortunes for holders of German securities, who are mostly small dealers and street vendors. For instance, a shopkeeper who recently bought 50,000,000 marks Imperial War Bonds for $375 has just realized $87,500. War bonds which a year ago stood at $5 have advanced to $1,750. Prussian 3½ per cent. Consols have advanced from $400 to $4,000 and Berlin 4 per cent. Bonds have risen from $500 to $12,000. The rise may be attributed to renewal of confidence in Germany in consequence of the Dawes plan.—Reuter.

Evacuation of Rhineland Begun: Review of Delegates' Difficulties

Paris, Aug. 17.

It is officially announced that the French will evacuate the towns of Offenburg and Appenweier to-morrow.

Commenting on the signing of the protocol of the London Conference, the newspapers in general take up the attitude that French opinion is prepared to wait and watch results.

It is remarked that M. Herriot has logically applied his ideas and marked the turning point of French policy. It remains to be seen whether the others will advance in the same direction.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 18.

A remark by Dr. Stresemann at Saturday's meeting of the Conference that he was hourly receiving shoals of protests against the signing of the proposed agreement and M. Herriot's reply that he was also buried in a similar avalanche, illustrate the circumspection with which the two principals bargained at the final stages. The German delegates pressed hard for concessions; for example, Government guarantee of the loan and early evacuation of Ruhrort. The first point was met by the Allies agreeing to facilitate the success of the loan by every means short of an actual guarantee, while the last obstacle was removed when the French and Belgian delegates, although reluctant to abandon the pivotal town, ultimately conceded the evacuation of Ruhrort and other minor sanctions and towns before September 1. M. Herriot discreetly hinted at a possibility of a favourable review of the whole evacuation issue in the light of German behaviour for two months.

There finally arose the question of dyestuffs on which the French, Belgian and German delegates were agreed, whereas Mr. Ramsay MacDonald withheld his assent until he had consulted experts, after which it was agreed that commercial treaties should be negotiated by all Powers simultaneously on a basis of equality.

British Press Criticism.

The tone of the London press is one of restrained satisfaction. While warmly recognizing that it is the greatest advance since Versailles, the papers re-echo Mr. MacDonald's words on Saturday that the work of pacification is now only beginning and call attention to the complexities which are bound to arise from enforcement of the Dawes report and also to the more general questions like readjustment of the individual Allies' proportions of reparations.

The Liberal papers accuse Mr. MacDonald of weakness in consenting to continued occupation of the Ruhr but note with pleasure the evidences of French good faith contained in the official announcement that a number of towns will be evacuated to-day.—Reuter.

British Government and the Ruhr Occupation

London, Aug. 18.

M. Herriot left for Paris this morning.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 18.

M. Herriot and the members of the French delegation were greeted by a wild, cheering crowd on their arrival at the station this evening.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 18.

Mr. MacDonald has addressed letters to M. Herriot and M Theunis in which he emphasizes that the British Government never recognized the legality of the occupation of the Ruhr. He says that the British Government, without prejudice to the position taken up by them and their predecessors in regard to the interpretation of the Versailles Treaty, but being anxious to see the Dawes report in operation, simply note in the agreement between the occupying Powers and the German Government that the occupation will not extend beyond 12 months, and very strongly urge the Governments concerned to take every possible step to hasten the evacuation as the British Government are of the opinion that a continued occupation may prejudice the working of the Dawes plan and jeopardize the arrangements agreed to at the London Conference.—Reuter.

Later.

There was no material increase of business on the Stock Exchange on the signing of the agreement with Germany, but the markets are firm. Allied and German stocks are slightly higher, but foreign exchange rates on the contrary moved adversely owing to selling from the Continent.—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug. 18.

The French Commander of the bridge-head at Kehl informed the Offenburg authorities that the district of Offenburg and Appenweier would be evacuated to-day, the troops having received their marching orders. The last soldier would quit the town before midnight.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 19.

The French troops have evacuated the German towns of Appenweier and Offenburg.—Reuter.

New York, Aug. 18.

All the morning papers greet the London Agreement as opening a new era in Europe. They particularly praise Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot.—Reuter's American Service.

The Beginning of Peace

Washington, Aug. 18.

President Coolidge, in a statement to the press, believes that the London Conference Agreement is the most important result accomplished since the Armistice, with the possible exception of the Washington Conference.

The President says that it demonstrates the wisdom of the American position and the effectiveness of the American method of co-operation and adds that with the Governments of Europe taking this wise course there should be little difficulty in securing the necessary financial support from private sources in America. It looks as though the end of war has come at last and the beginning of an honourable and lasting peace is at hand.—Reuter's American Service.

Action of French and German Delegates Approved in Both Countries

Paris, Aug. 19.

The Ministry of War announces that the occupying troops were withdrawn from Offenburg and Appenweier yesterday without incident.

The Cabinet to-day unanimously approved the work of the French delegates at the London Conference and thanked them for the important results obtained in the interests of France.

Mr. MacDonald's letter to M. Herriot is not commented upon by the Left press, but is denounced by the organs of the Right.

The "Echo de Paris" says that a series of British intrigues to compel France to reduce the period of evacuation may be expected.

The "Action Française" describes the letter as a gratuitous bludgeon blow on M. Herriot's head and says that the bankers re-appear behind Mr. MacDonald to blackmail France.

Later.

While the publication of Mr. MacDonald's letter has completely surprised political circles here, it is authoritatively learned that M. Herriot had previously consented to it.

French official quarters tend to minimize the importance of the letter on the ground that it merely reiterates the British Government's well-known standpoint.

The French official attitude is inspired by a desire to avoid compromising the present excellent Anglo-French relations.—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug. 19.

The Cabinet, presided over by President Ebert, to-day unanimously approved the attitude of the German delegation in London. It decided to dissolve the Reichstag if the latter failed to sanction the agreement.

The Government's policy was subsequently made clear to party leaders by Chancellor Marx, who emphasized to them his conviction that M. Herriot could be trusted.

According to the "Tageblatt," the representatives of the Government parties agreed that the delegation had achieved everything possible.—Reuter.

America's Endorsement

Evanston, Ill., Aug. 19.

Gen. Charles G. Dawes, in a speech here to-day said that with the experts' plan inaugurated all Europe would now turn towards a new and peaceful life. The United States would be saved from the depths of the inevitable great depression in industry and agriculture which continued chaos and misery in Europe would entail. The whole world had now entered upon a period of peace and prosperity.—Reuter's American Service.

Mr. Snowden Pessimistic

Later.

Mr. Philip Snowden, who was the protagonist of the Dawes Report at the late Conference, in an interview to-day with a representative of the "Manchester Guardian," expressed grave doubts as to whether the changes made in the Dawes scheme by the Conference might not lead to difficulties in the future.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer disagreed with two of the decisions of the Conference, firstly, the imposition on Germany of the compulsory delivery of specified goods after the Treaty obligation ceased in 1930. Failure to carry out these deliveries would be regarded as wilful default on the part of Germany, and expose her to sanctions. Such limitation of Germany's commercial freedom had never been contemplated after 1930 either in the Treaty or in the Dawes Report. Secondly, he disagreed with the exclusion from the Agreement, owing to French insistence, of the clause preventing the use of reparation funds to purchase shares in German industries.

Mr. Snowden was also very dissatisfied at the continuance of the occupation of the Ruhr, which, he declared, was wholly inconsistent with the Dawes plan. There was a very real danger that political means would be used to advance the aims of French industrialists upon the economic control of certain German industries.—Reuter.

Reichstag and London Agreement

Berlin, Aug. 20.

Preparatory to to-day's ratification debate, the Government introduced in the Reichstag a bill assenting to the London Protocol, authorizing the Minister of Finance to float a loan for 800,000,000 gold marks, and empowering the Government to surrender State Railway bonds totalling 11 milliard marks, and also bonds amounting to five milliard marks secured on industrial taxation.—Reuter.

M. Millerand's Demand for Security

Paris, Aug. 21.

In an interview with a representative of the "Revue Hebdomadaire," M. Millerand, the former President of France, said that he regretted that the London Conference did not touch the very important question of security. He remarked that the naval review at Spithead showed to Britain that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald put security above all other questions. France must not reduce the strength of her Army which, at present, was her only guarantee of security in Europe. Referring to the British Government's rejection of the guarantee pact, M. Millerand concluded that it was difficult to found any serious hopes in the League of Nations.

With regard to Russia, M. Millerand expressed the opinion that rapprochement would be futile and dangerous.—Reuter.

THE MUTINY IN THE SUDAN

Malcontents' Attempt to Create Sedition: a Threatened British Boycott

Alexandria, Aug. 15.

The Egyptian Government has instructed its Minister in London to lodge a protest with the British Government against the measures taken in the Sudan, and to urge the immediate establishment of an Egyptian-Sudanese commission to examine the situation, to fix responsibility and to take steps to calm public feeling and avoid further bloodshed.

The Egyptian Government has also requested the Governor-General of the Sudan to supply detailed information regarding the incidents, the reason which led to them and the measures taken.

Later.

The British High Commissioner has strongly protested to the Egyptian Acting Premier against the inaccurate and misleading nature of the statement issued to-day by the Egyptian Ministry, reflecting its views on events in the Sudan. This statement has caused indignation in British official circles, because it imputes that British troops are responsible for the firing at Atbara.—Reuter.

A Vile Accusation

Khartum, Aug. 15.

Anonymous notices were posted up to-night at Omdurman and Khartum inciting against British rule, and adding: "We Sudanese intelligentsia, on behalf of the inhabitants of the Sudan, declare our hatred of the British Government. Long live the cadets of the Military School. Down with British domination."

Some of the notices bear drawings of veiled Sudanese women, hinting at feminine influence on the troops. Another poster says "Unite all sons of the Nile! This spells victory! Boycott and hate the British as a religion ordained by God!"

Everywhere at present is quiet. H.M.S. Weymouth left Port Sudan to-day. H.M.S. Clematis is standing by. A detachment of the Leicestershire Regiment and the Egyptian Infantry have arrived here.

Aug. 17.

There was a hostile demonstration at Omdurman yesterday evening. Mounted and foot police were stoned. There were three arrests.—Reuter.

British Government's Strong and Praiseworthy Attitude: Garrisons Reinforced

London, Aug. 18.

A member of the Egyptian Legation called at the Foreign Office on Saturday and communicated the views of the Egyptian Government on the situation in the Sudan.

He was informed that the British Acting High Commissioner in Egypt has been authorized to inform the Egyptian Government that in view of the recent rioting at Atbara and Port Sudan His Majesty's Government warn the Egyptian Government very explicitly that His Majesty's Government regard themselves responsible for the maintenance of order in the Sudan and intend to support the Sudan Government in any steps they may deem necessary to preserve public security.

His Majesty's Government could only regard the recent action of the Railway Battalion as a direct result of the exaggerated Egyptian claims in respect of the Sudan and His Majesty's Government are, therefore, reinforcing the British garrison and have authorized the Government of the Sudan to remove from the Sudan the Railway Battalion and any other disaffected elements among the Egyptian troops. His Majesty's Government resent very strongly the inference conveyed by the Egyptian press that the British troops caused the disturbances in the Sudan or inflicted casualties at Atbara.—Reuter.

Alexandria, Aug. 18.

Replying to the British protest against the inaccurate and misleading nature of the statement issued by the Egyptian Ministry reflecting its views on the events in the Sudan, the Egyptian Government deny any intention to embarrass the aim of the British and Egyptian Governments by alleged inaccuracies. Their recent communiqué emphasizes their good intentions.—Reuter.

Khartum, Aug. 19.

Four fighting aeroplanes arrived here this morning. Four others are remaining at Atbara. Nine arrests were made at Port Sudan yesterday in connexion with a minor disturbance, which the police easily controlled.—Reuter.

ASSEMBLY OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS

British and French Premiers to Attend: Interest in Coming Discussions

Paris, Aug. 20.

As indicating the importance which the French Government attaches to the forthcoming discussions of the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva, it is reliably stated that M. Briand has consented to join the French delegation.

It is understood that M. Herriot does not propose to attend the opening of the Assembly, preferring to arrive after the preliminaries have been concluded.

Up to the present no arrangements have been made for Mr. MacDonald to break his journey at Paris in order to see M. Herriot, and it is therefore supposed that the Premiers will travel to Switzerland independently.—Reuter.

IRELAND'S RECOVERY OF HER SOUL

Mr. De Valera's Reiterance of Former Policy Against "Foreign" Allegiance

London, Aug. 15.

Mr. De Valera, in his first public speech since his release from gaol, at Ennis to-day declared that Ireland had recovered her soul. A new policy was not needed. The policy of 1917 to 1921 still held good. They could not have the land cut in two. The sovereignty of Ireland was impossible without union. They could not give allegiance to any foreign Power. They might temporarily be forced to submit to certain things forced upon them, but their assent to them could never be given.—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Mr. Stanley Baldwin's Visit to Ireland to Confer with Ulster Cabinet

London, Aug. 18.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin, accompanied by Mr. P. Wicks, formerly Private Secretary to Sir Edward Carson (now Lord Carson), spent the week-end at Ulster as guests of Sir James and Lady Craig. Mr. Baldwin discussed the present situation with the Ulster Cabinet.

Later.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin left Belfast this morning after conferring with the Prime Minister of North Ireland, Sir James Craig, and members of the Cabinet yesterday on the boundary question.

A large crowd including members of the Ulster House of Commons bade him farewell at the station, which was decorated with Union Jacks.

An address which was presented to Mr. Baldwin by railwaymen said that Ulster men relied on his wholehearted support in these trying times. Mr. Baldwin, replying, dwelt on his interest in railways, mentioned that he had never been in Ireland before and that he had enjoyed his visit. He responded to the cheers as the train left, shouting "Good luck to you all."—Reuter.

RUSSIA'S READINESS TO RESTRE EUROPE

Respect for Rights of all to Independent Existence: The Bessarabian Question

London, Aug. 16.

The text has been published of the long declaration by M. Rakovsky at the final session of the Anglo-Russian Conference. He said that the Soviet Government was ready to use all its influence to restore the equilibrium of Europe on the foundation of respect for the rights of every people to independent existence. M. Rakovsky reiterated Russia's readiness for further disarmament if the other States do likewise. He said that the Delegation would be glad to hear the readiness of Britain to summon in the immediate future an international disarmament conference.

M. Rakovsky protested against the Rumanian seizure of Bukovia and the uniting of Bessarabia with Rumania and appealed to the British Government to assist the population of East Galicia to decide their own fate. He also urged reconsideration of the Lausanne Convention relative to the Straits as opposed to the Soviet and peace.—Reuter.

ALL-INDIA SWARAJ CONFERENCE

A Poor Attendance: Proposed Settlement of Nationalist Party Differences

Calcutta, Aug. 18.

The All-India Swaraj Conference presided over by Mr. C. R. Das was poorly attended. Only about half-a-dozen leaders outside Bengal were present. Madras and the Punjab were entirely unrepresented.

The Congress was concluded after passing a resolution in favour of the establishment of a federation of Indian States.

A private meeting of party leaders was convoked to discuss a communication from Mr. Gandhi to Mr. Motilal Nehru proposing a settlement of the differences between the two wings of the Indian National Congress.—Reuter.

Calcutta, Aug. 19.

The All-India Home Rule Conference ended to-day.

The Conference passed a resolution that the party's object was the establishment of a federation of free Indian States.—Reuter.

NEW DIFFICULTIES IN BENGAL

Campaign to Remove Governor for Daring to Defend the Police

Calcutta, Aug. 20.

To other difficulties of the situation in Bengal there is now added a growing campaign in favour of the removal of the Governor for a passage in a speech made at Dacca on August 6 defending the police against charges of corruption.

The Nationalist Press construed Lord Lytton's remark as an insult to Indian women.

The campaign against the Governor, fostered by the Nationalist leaders, reached its height to-night. Crowds estimated at 20,000 tried to attend meetings of protest in the Town Hall which were addressed by Mr. C. R. Das, Mr. Motilal Nehru and Mrs. Naidu.

Five overflow meetings were held outside the Town Hall, all of which were characterized by impassioned speeches, urging a social boycott and demanding that Lord Lytton apologise on his knees; or otherwise he must go.—Reuter.

BRITISH FLEET IN THE FAR EAST

Strengthened by Addition of H. M. S. Vindictive: Two 10,000-ton Cruisers

London, Aug. 18.

The "Manchester Guardian" reports that the Admiralty have decided to send to the China station the light cruiser Vindictive instead of one of the smaller ships of the "D" type.

The change will make a huge difference in strength of the British force in the Far East. It will give the British squadron there two 10,000-ton cruisers armed with 7.5-inch guns. These vessels are superior to any cruising ships in the world at present, but will be eclipsed by the new cruisers which all the Powers are building under the Washington Agreement.—Reuter.

BRITAIN INDICTED BY U.S. ADMIRAL

Inspired Washington Conference to Promote her Merchant Shipping Interests

Williamstown, Aug. 19.

Remarkable charges were made to-day by Rear-Admiral Rogers, of the United States Navy, in the course of an address at the Institute of Politics.

He declared that Great Britain dominated the world's commerce and had inspired the Washington Conference in order to prevent the United States from having a sufficiently strong navy to protect her merchant marine.

America's limitation of armaments played into the hands of Great Britain, who hoped indirectly to limit the competition of the American merchant fleet by direct action on the American navy.

Rear-Admiral Rogers added: "It is alleged that American bankers are awaiting Great Britain's initiative in the matter of a loan to Germany. They should reflect how far this is explained by the ability of Great Britain to control the commerce by which German will pay reparations, and thus make American credit the tool of British shipping."—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 19.

Sir James Salter, in an interview to-day, said that he was astonished at Rear-Admiral Rogers's statement. He averred that British ships went where the interests of private owners and shippers took them. The British Government never knew where American ships were or what they were doing.—Reuter's American Service.

Note:—Sir James Salter is Director of the Economic & Finance Section of the League of Nations. He was General Secretary of the Reparation Commission from 1920 to 1922, Director of Ship Requisitioning in 1917, and Chairman of the Allied Maritime Transport Executive in 1918.—Reuter.

HINDU-MOSLEM OUTRAGE

Mosque Attacked by Hindus

Secunderabad, Aug. 17.

The local superintendent of police was killed and there were some Moslem casualties during a Hindu-Moslem disturbance at Kulabarag yesterday. It is alleged that the Hindus attacked a mosque and that the Moslems retaliated by attacking a Hindu temple. A strong force of troops and police has been despatched. The situation remains serious.—Reuter.

BY-ELECTION IN WALES

Seat for Sir Alfred Mond

London, Aug. 15.

In the West Carmarthen by-election, necessitated by the retirement of Sir Ellis Griffith (Liberal) to give Sir Alfred Mond a seat, Sir Alfred Mond (Liberal) was elected by 12,760 votes. Mr. Owen (Labour) received 8,351 votes and Sir A. Stevens Stephens (Conservative) 7,896 votes.—Reuter.

THE ASSASSINATION OF MRS. EVANS

Three Suspects Convicted

Mexico City, Aug. 17.

The trial of the five persons accused of the murder of Mrs. Evans resulted in three being convicted and two being acquitted. The crime is punishable with death.—Reuter's American Service.

THE PRINCE OF WALES

Forthcoming Visit to America to be Quasi-Official

Washington, Aug. 20.

The State Department, announcing its arrangements for the Prince of Wales's visit, to which it is understood his Royal Highness has assented, says that the Prince will arrive in New York on August 29 and proceed immediately to Long Island, where he will entrain in the evening for Washington, which will be reached the following morning. The Prince will visit President Coolidge at Washington, returning the same day to Long Island, where he will remain until September 13.

It is understood that the visit to Washington will be considered quasi-official, the Prince coming in an official capacity to pay his respects to the President.—Reuter's American Service.

OBITUARY

Lord Francis Knollys

London, Aug. 15.

The death is announced of Lord Knollys at the age of 87.—Reuter.

The late Lord Knollys was born on July 16, 1837, and from 1868 to 1901 held an appointment to the late Queen Victoria, having in the meantime, 1870-1901, acted as Private Secretary to the late King Edward VII, then Prince of Wales. When King Edward ascended the Throne, Lord Knollys continued as his Private Secretary, and on the death of King Edward he became Private Secretary to King George and Lord in Waiting to Queen Alexandra. He was the second son of the late Gen. Rt. Hon. Sir W. T. Knollys, K.C.B., and received the decorations of C.B. in 1876, K.C.M.G. in 1886, G.C.V.O. in 1901, P.C. in 1903, created first Baron of Caversham in 1902, G.C.B. in 1903, and Viscount in 1911.—Ed.

Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge

Aug. 17.

The death is announced of Admiral Sir Cyprian Arthur Bridge at the age of 85.

Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge was Commander-in-Chief of the China Station from 1901 to 1904, when he retired.—Reuter.

Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge was born on March 15, 1839, and was the son of the late Archdeacon Bridge. He entered the Navy in 1853, became Rear-Admiral in 1892, Vice-Admiral in 1898, and Admiral in 1903. He saw service in the White Sea in 1854, and also in the Bay of Bengal during the Indian Mutiny. After his retirement from active service in 1904, he presided over the North Sea Inquiry Commission, and in 1916-1917 was a Member of the Statutory Mesopotamia Commission.—Ed.

ROUND-THE-WORLD AIR FLIGHTS

Maclaren Reaches Canada in Trawler: Americans Still Delayed in Iceland

Prince Rupert, B. C., Aug. 18.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren, the British world-flier, arrived here to-day on board a trawler and proceeded to Vancouver. All are well except Sergeant Andrews, who will be placed in hospital at Vancouver. He is suffering from a nervous breakdown.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren attributes all his difficulties to delays, owing to the accident to his machine in India, which made him one month late in reaching the fogs and storms of the north. He paid a warm tribute to the co-operation of the Canadian Government and to the friendliness of the Russian officials. He doubted whether Major Zanni would be able to cross the North Pacific this season.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Aug. 17.

The round-the-world fliers will get only a letter of commendation attached to their service records as a reward for their historic flight around the globe, it was disclosed to-day. Those letters will be written by Mr. Weeks, Secretary of War who to-day expressed regret that Congress had not authorized him to promote the world fliers or give them some decoration for their accomplishment.

Mr. Weeks asked Congress at the last session to allow him discretion to promote certain junior officers in recognition of unusual service. He had in mind such men as Lieutenant Russell L. Maughan, who recently flew across the continent, and Lieutenant Lowell M. Smith and his associates on the globe-circling cruise.—Reuter's American Service.

Thorshavn, Faroe Isles, Aug. 15.

The Italian world-flier, Signor Locatelli, has arrived at Thorshavn from Stromness.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 16.

The Italian world-flier, Signor Locatelli, arrived in Iceland to-day.—Reuter.

Reykjavik, Aug. 17.

Signor Locatelli has arrived from Horna Fjord. He hopes to proceed with the American airmen, possibly on Monday.

Signor Locatelli says that if he experiences insurmountable difficulties in Greenland he will return to Italy by the same route. His present flight is preparatory to an Italian attempt to fly to the North Pole in 1925.—Reuter.

Reykjavik, Aug. 18.

The start of the American world-fliers to Greenland will probably be delayed for some days owing to damage sustained by the machines while attempting to take off to-day.—Reuter.

Reykjavik, Aug. 19.

The American world-fliers have abandoned their intention of flying via Angmasalik. They propose to fly to Frederiksdal near Cape Farewell, nearly 850 miles in a single flight.

It was when taking off for Frederiksdal that one machine broke its bracing bar and the second broke its propeller. The mishaps were due to the load of petrol and oil being the heaviest since the start of the flight.—Reuter.

Major Zanni at Hanoi

Bangkok, Aug. 16.

Major Zanni has arrived.—Reuter.

Bangkok, Aug. 17.

Major Zanni has departed for Hanoi.—Reuter.

Hanoi, Aug. 18.

Major Zanni has arrived at Hanoi. He will depart for Canton to-morrow.—Reuter.

Hanoi, Aug. 19.

Major Zanni's aeroplane overturned when taking off for Canton owing to the ground being sodden-ed by heavy rains.

Major Zanni and his mechanic were uninjured. The machine has been rendered useless.—Reuter.

Buenos Aires, Aug. 20.

A public subscription is being raised to enable Major Zanni to replace the aeroplane which was damaged at Hanoi.—Reuter's American Service.

Tientsin, Aug. 21.

Mr. Murphy, Major Zanni's advance agent, who was on his way to Weihaiwei and Japan in order to make arrangements for the flight, has been ordered by Major Zanni to proceed direct to Japan from Tientsin in order to transport to Hanoi the plane which was reserved for the second stage of the flight. Mr. Murphy left for Japan to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WOMAN AS CANDIDATE FOR TEXAS GOVERNORSHIP

Opponent of the Ku Klux Klan

Dallas, Aug. 17.

With Kukluxism as the main issue, Mrs. Muriel Ferguson has become candidate for the nomination for the Governorship of Texas. Many are rallying to her support, because her principal opponent, Judge Robertson of the Dallas District Court, has not repudiated allegations of his sympathy with the Ku Klux Klan.

Mrs. Ferguson is believed to have a fighting chance, and, if successful, will be the first woman Governor of a State in America.—Reuter's American Service.

THE REVOLT IN BRAZIL

Confined to the Amazones

New York, Aug. 18.

It is officially confirmed that an outbreak has occurred in the Amazones, which, the Brazilian Foreign Office states, concerns naval units on the Amazon. Three vessels have been dispatched to quell the rising. The official communication on the subject adds that the mutiny is not important.—Reuter's American Service.

Buenos Aires, Aug. 20.

The Brazilian Federal troops stationed on the River Parana today sank a steamer carrying rebel forces after heavy firing. Many of the rebels were drowned.—Reuter's American Service.

PILGRIMS TO MECCA AND ARAB TRIBESMEN

Complaint of Ill Treatment

Cairo, Aug. 16.

Egyptians have been complaining about the treatment of pilgrims to Mecca at the hands of tribesmen and also of the dearness of water, the price of which has been raised by the authorities. It is now stated that Emir ul Hadj has suggested the stoppage of the annual gift of money to Mecca and suspension of the pilgrimage.—Reuter.

FRANCE AND JUGO-SLAVIA

A Defensive Alliance

Belgrade, Aug. 18.

Negotiations ending in a defensive alliance between France and Jugo-Slavia for a period of five years were concluded to-day. This alliance is on lines similar to the Franco-Czech alliance. The new treaty will be signed in Paris next month.—Reuter.

SPANISH OFFENSIVE IN MOROCCO

Madrid, Aug. 16.

A communiqué states that the Moorish rebels continue to press the Spanish positions on the Lau, communications with which have been cut. A Spanish offensive has begun and the French have taken similar action in their zone.—Reuter.

ITALIAN CROWN PRINCE IN S. AMERICA

Buenos Aires, Aug. 20.

The Crown Prince of Italy, who has been visiting the Argentine, has departed for Chile. Everywhere he was cordially received.—Reuter's American Service.

FRENCH TRADE RETURNS

Paris, Aug. 20.

Imports for the first seven months of 1924 totalled 33,000,000 tons, of a value of Frs. 22,973,000,000.

Exports for the same period totalled 16,000,000 tons, of a value of Frs. 24,296,000,000.—Reuter.

SON BORN TO PRINCESS MARY

London, Aug. 21.

A son has been born to Princess Mary, Viscountess Lascelles.—Reuter.

SIGNOR MATTEOTTI'S BODY DISCOVERED

Rome, Aug. 16.

Police dogs have unearthed the decomposed body of Signor Matteotti 13 miles from Rome.—Reuter.

BRITISH NAVAL SQUADRON AT QUEBEC

Quebec, Aug. 19.

The Special Service Squadron arrived here to-day. The Squadron was enthusiastically greeted by the vessels in the harbour. Thousands of cheering spectators lined both banks of the river.—Reuter.

DOMINIONS AGAINST SECOND YEAR OF WEMBLEY

London, Aug. 21.

Reuter learns that replies have now been received from all the Dominions except Newfoundland with reference to continuance of the British Empire Exhibition in 1925. They unanimously opposed continuation mainly on the ground of the expense of maintaining the staffs and renewing the exhibits, etc.—Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

FRENCH PREMIER'S REVIEW OF THE LONDON CONFERENCE

Only the First Step Towards Real Peace, but the Beginning of a New Era: The Ruhr Policy: Inter-Allied Dbts: Communist Demonstration on the Subject Amnesties

Paris, Aug. 21.

The Chamber of Deputies was packed when M. Herriot made his statement on the London Conference to-day. He said that the Conference was only the first stage towards real peace. The agreement marked the beginning of a new era of undiminished guarantee and security and ensured France the Treaty of Versailles. The Prime Minister said that the consequences would be grave if the agreement were repudiated and a policy of isolated action preferred. The policy in the Ruhr had dominated the negotiations, though he had refused to allow the Ruhr to be included in the Conference. It had been impossible for him to eliminate the problem all the more because he had had very strong reasons for thinking that if France remained in the Ruhr she would remain absolutely alone. It was a choice between re-establishment of the inter-Allied Entente or maintenance of isolated action.

M. Herriot said that the French Government had neglected no opportunity to bring up the question of inter-Allied debts, but it was impossible to join discussion of the debts to the execution of the Dawes plan. He said that the debts and the question of security would be discussed at a special conference later, but the evacuation of the Cologne zone would not be contemplated until Germany had satisfied her treaty obligations, including disarmament. The Conference had reached a deadlock on July 26 and its failure did not seem impossible. M. Herriot claimed that France saved the Conference by proposing arbitration as a solution.

M. Herriot's speech was applauded by the Left and was received with laughter and protests by the Right. Noisy interruption by the Communists, who subsequently violently demonstrated on the question of amnesties, compelled the President to suspend the sitting.

Later.

M. Herriot strongly opposed the motion of M. Bokanowski to adjourn the discussion until the committees reported on the plans. The motion was rejected by 320 votes to 209. A Communist motion was rejected by 359 votes to 26.

Mr. Snowden's Indiscretion

Mr. Philip Snowden's interviews published in the English press criticizing the London Agreement and expressing fears that France may use the occupation of the Ruhr as a lever to extract commercial advantages from Germany beyond those provided in the Dawes report have led to indignant comment by the press.

The "Echo de Paris" expresses the opinion that Mr. Snowden is attempting to dictate as to how France should conduct her affairs and demands that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald should formally repudiate Mr. Snowden's imprudent words.

The "Oeuvre" expresses the opinion that Mr. Snowden shows narrow comprehension of the fact that Britain's true commercial interests, which are like those of France, lie in development of the world's power of absorption and not in restriction of Germany's exports. The journal declares that his policy is not worthy of a Socialist.

The "Gaulois" is of the opinion that the interviews show that the attitude of the British Treasury and Foreign Office towards France has not changed.—Reuter.

Germany and the Dawes Plan

Berlin, Aug. 21.

The Federal Council has adopted all the Bills carrying out the Dawes report.

The representative of Mecklenburg-Strelitz voted against the bills. The representative of Thuringia abstained from voting.

The Railway Bill, involving a change in the Constitution, was adopted by the requisite two-thirds majority. The representatives of Bavaria, Thuringia, Wurtemberg and Mecklenburg-Strelitz abstained from voting.—Reuter.

Reichstag Expected to Reject London Decision

Berlin, Aug. 22.

After a sitting which lasted several hours, the German People's Party in the Reichstag unanimously decided to accept the decision of the London Conference in spite of the burdens imposed on Germany, but added that it was the duty of the Government to clear up the diplomatic situation by all the means in its power.

The German National Party in the Reichstag unanimously decided to adhere to the resolution of July 22 demanding immediate evacuation of the Ruhr and restoration of the German railways, etc.

All the papers interpret the National Party resolution as meaning that the Party will vote against the Dawes Bills in the Reichstag next week thus ensuring their rejection. This will mean immediate dissolution of the Reichstag and another general election which will be tantamount to a plebiscite.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 22.

The Chamber of Deputies yesterday evening adjourned till this morning. The Communist motion which was rejected proposed an adjournment until the Senate had discussed the Amnesty Bill.—Reuter.

THE CAMPAIGN TO REMOVE BENGAL'S GOVERNOR

Alleged Insult to Indian Women

London, Aug. 21.

With reference to the telegram from Reuter's Calcutta correspondent yesterday that a campaign was being carried on in favour of the removal of the Governor for a passage in a speech which he made at Dacca, it has been ascertained that Lord Lytton, addressing a police parade on August 6, in the course of a warning to the revolutionaries for their threats against the Bengal police, said that the thing which had distressed him most since coming to India was finding that mere hatred of authority could drive Indian men and induce Indian women to invent offences against their own honour merely to bring discredit on Indian policemen.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Mr. Cyril Tolley's Triumph: A Great Amateur Golfer

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, July 9.

The victory of Cyril Tolley of the Royal and Ancient, St. Andrews, in the French Open Championship is the biggest thing a British amateur has done for many a day. It has only two parallels in the last quarter of a century and more—Harold Hilton's victory in the British Open Championship 27 years ago and Roger Wethered's tie with Hutchison at St. Andrews in 1921. It is a great service Tolley has done to amateur golf. It is an even greater service to British golf. For he won out of a field which included Hagen, Sarazen, Duncan, Frank Ball, Boomer, Massey, and some other very notable players, and by winning he prevented Hagen conveying to America the impression that his success at Hoylake could be repeated just as often as he cared to try.

As every golfer knows, Mr. Tolley is a post-war product, but his pre-war history and how he began is not generally known. It was as early as five years old that he first became acquainted with the game, which his father used to play on the old Blackheath course. Mr. Tolley was London-born, and because he was a delicate boy, an image a little difficult to conjure up, his family took him at the age of nine to live in Eastbourne, and there he started to play. On account of his physical condition, he was not sent to a big school, and had plenty of opportunities for golf practice. When he was 13 he was made a member of his first club, and was given a handicap of 16. Then he began to win. Three seasons later he played for the first time in the Sussex County Championship with a handicap of two. When the war came his age was 18, his handicap plus one, so that we should in normal times have heard of him before we did. He joined the Inns of Court O.T.C., obtained a commission in the Tank Corps, and went to France in the beginning of 1917. He was in the fighting at Ypres and Cambrai, was smashed up at Bourlon towards the end of the same year, and spent the next 13 months as a prisoner in Germany. Mr. Tolley narrates in his book, "The Modern Golfer" how he came back to the game. On Christmas Day 1918, two days after his return to England, he played his first round on the Willingdon course, near Eastbourne, sending his drive about a dozen yards, his second about 30 yards, and his third with a terrific slice out of bounds. But shortly afterwards he won a medal competition with a card of 65, which made a record for the course. Some weeks afterwards he entered for his first big open competition, the Golf Illustrated Vase contest, in which, as he says, he "faded gracefully away after lunch," and in which he first saw Mr. Roger Wethered, and greatly wondered, watching his magnificent long game, who he was. Mr. Tolley then went to Oxford, where Mr. Wethered was golf captain, and so began one of the most remarkable coincidences in talent in the whole range of University golf.

The Scottish Coronation Stone.

Mr. Kirkwood, the Clydeside Socialist, made a determined but unsuccessful attempt in Parliament to raise the question of the retention by England of the Scottish Coronation Stone. The Stone is the property of His Majesty, and no Government has the power to interfere in the matter. It appears that Mr. Kirkwood was visiting Westminster Abbey, and, deciding to have a look at the historic Stone, wended his way to that part of the building where it is located. To his indignation he discovered that a sum of sixpence is charged for the privilege of seeing the Stone. This, in his opinion, was adding insult to injury Not only, he says, was this "valuable and venerable relic" taken from Scotland without the consent of the Scottish people, but the latter visiting the Abbey are compelled to pay sixpence to see their own property. Mr. Kirkwood does not, however, stress the point that the English people are making money out of a Scottish relic, objectionable as that might be. His grievance is that it remains on English soil. It would seem, however, that even a Scottish Prime Minister of a Socialist Government, who, according to Mr. Kirkwood, should be powerful enough to move mountains, let alone stones, cannot remedy the grievance.

A Highland Steer at Wembley

The Marquis of Graham is £10 poorer. At Wembley Mike Hastings, a stalwart cowboy threw a Highland steer weighing 800 lb., specially chosen from the Marquis's herd and sent down from Scotland. The Marquis had wagered £10 that a cowboy could not throw such a steer in one minute, the sum to be paid to the cowboy if successful, and Mr. Tex Austin to pay £10 to a London Hospital if unsuccessful. It all happened quickly. The high stout wooden gates of the steer stockade were no sooner opened than what appeared to be a tawny streak dashed straight across the arena, flanked on each side, it seemed, by two horsemen—one the judge and the other the competitor.The spectators had scarcely time to breathe a deep-toned "Ah" before Hastings had flung himself from his galloping mount and gripped the swaying head of the steer. It would be hard to say which was the more astonished at the quickness of the movement—the spectators or the steer. For a moment the steer stood stock still, and his attacker taking full advantage, almost succeeded in getting the animal down. Indeed, it was actually off its feet, but with a supreme effort recovered, and it looked as if Hastings was beaten. However, he did not let go, and with a deft movement he managed to turn the steer, force it upon its side, and so beat it to the ground.

If the Highland steer was small in stature, it stood no higher than a Newfoundland dog, it was sturdily built. Its shaggy brown coat and great horns marked it out from the short-horned, and straight-haired animals normally thrown in the ring. Its turn of speed seemed if any thing faster than that of the prairie land cattle.

It had been announced that an attempt would be made to ride the Highland steer, but none of the cowboys were inclined to accept the challenge.

Not long ago a Highland steer was tried in a Spanish bull-ring. The story goes that it simply cleared the arena of toreadors, matadors, and all the attendants.

American "Brithers"

In America patriotism is observed on a colossal scale. The Order of the Scottish Clans, for instance, whose object and constitution are obvious from its designation, boasts a membership of 25,000. With Americans coming over here in thousands it was inevitable that members of the Order should participate in the exodus, and the idea has therefore been conceived and developed of making the visit of these Scots a domestic affair. Under the aegis of the Order a large party will arrive in Glasgow early in August for a two months' stay. An official welcome is being arranged in Glasgow, and on the occasion of the party's visit in Edinburgh, Inverness, and London Arrangements for this last are being undertaken by the Highland Club of London, whose message of welcome has been broadcast throughout the New World. In thanking the club for its kindly greetings a member of the committee of the Order writes:—"Never before in the history of our Order has such a gathering of the clans set sail for the homeland, and the jubilant anticipation of our reception in Scotland will prove the immortal words 'that man and man the world o'er shall brithers be for a' that.'"

Scots Abroad and Income Tax

Your tax-gatherers are making perpetual exiles of Scots who have gone abroad. So writes Mr. William Kellie Smith from Melfort House, Argyll, who is home from Batu Gajah, Perak, F.M.S., in a letter which he has sent to all members of Parliament. He goes on—We Scotsmen have always gone abroad to push our fortunes; for Scotland is a poor country, and it is difficult for a Scotsman to make a fortune among other Scotsmen. But we always yearn for the land of our birth, and especially desire that our children should, after their first few years in the East, be reared in Scotland ("Ye canna raise bairns in the tropics.")

We want them to be Scotsmen too, with the word of God and the poems of Burns in their bones. So after they are a few years old we make homes for them in Scotland, mainly in Highland counties. If we have struck it rich enough in the torrid tropics, we will buy some land, employ a gardener or two, a keeper or two, and perhaps a shepherd and farm labourers. For climate, education, accessibility, and comfort France, Italy, and Switzerland would suit just as well. But we prefer to be Scotsmen, if possible, and not too expensive, else we ourselves would have ceased to be Scotsmen. It was our practice to come to Scotland to see our wives and families annually, if possible, and remain for so long as we and our business could afford our absence, not exceeding five months in any year. We paid income tax on the money spent by our wives or ourselves in Scotland, but never on our earnings abroad. If we were very fortunate we retired, and returned to Scotland bringing the wealth we had made with us, and were then subject to the full taxation. Heavy though it was, we never grumbled at that. But now your Inland Revenue officials, your tribe of Zacchaeus, always short of stature mentally, have either hoodwinked Parliament, or some "Mutt" or "Jeff" of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, and declare that it is the law, that if we return to "auld Scotland" for even a single day to visit our wife and family we shall be liable for Income tax. and, I suppose, Super Tax, on all the income we earn under the tropical sun. Can you imagine anything so silly and so cruel. Silly, because the State must lose the taxes on the money that foreign domiciled Scotsmen and their wives spend here. For, of course, we cannot come to Scotland on these terms, and pay taxes on the money at the place where we earn it, and be taxed again in Scotland where we earn nothing. We are merely exiles, and our wives and families too, for whom we must find Continental residences, and those whom we employ in Scotland or might employ have to go on the dole among the city crowd. That is where the cruelty comes in. The loss to Scotland is considerable in money and in men, and will become greater as this foolish law grows older. We are the pioneers who create the trade which keeps the factories and shipping of the old country going, and employ her people at home. Tropical incomes like white men's lives in the Tropics are precarious, and competences must be made in a few years. They cannot stand double taxation in the process of accumulation.

Going Back to School

My little nephew of 12 is by no means dull at his books, but his knowledge of all things athletic fills me with amazement. He knows exactly how many centuries Hobbs has scored, how many wickets Tate has taken, how many strokes Duncan took to each hole in his last round at Gleneagles, and how Whitcombe might have won the Open Championship if he had done only 41 in the first half of his last round at Hoylake. Just now he is full of athletic records. It is not his fault if I do not know all about Liddell and the hundred, Abrahams and the broad jump, and Stallard and the mile. But last week I found him disconsolate. He brought me the newspaper open at a paragraph headed "Athletics and the Olympic Games," and said, with a break in his voice—"Uncle, I know why the games are called Olympic. I know the difference between metres and yards, and I know all about the first Marathon race; but no one can tell me what kind of a race a pentathlon is, nor yet what a decathlon means, and I have asked everybody I have met to-day." The little chap was so deply distressed that I did not laugh at him, but I got him to stand beside me while we counted the number of events with pentathlon or deathlon in front. We found that there were five of the one kind and 10 of the other. Then I told him what I could remember of the Greek games of old, with their contest of the five exercises, leaping, discus throwing, running, wrestling, and boxing, for which javelin throwing came to be substituted. It was easy for him to understand how a second race should have taken the place of wrestling, and also how there should have been an extension to a second group of 10 events in a modern athletic competition. But his remark that no one could tell him the meaning of penthathlon has led me to write this note.

Well Done Cutty Sark

In an article in The Nautical Magazine there is an amusing summary of the records held by that Clyde-built wonder clipper—the Cutty Sark. These are tabulated as follows:—

1. The number of articles in the papers and periodicals of all varieties; in this she is is second only to the Marie Celeste.

2. The enormous numbers of "Letters to the Editor" on what she did or did not do.

3. The thousands of log books she produced.

4. The colossal number of people who sailed in her or knew someone who had, or had seen her or knew someone who had, or had met her last skipper or knew someone who had.

"Is now in lavender and moth balls" is the summing-up of her condition in old age.

Stolen and Recovered.

An interesting foreign postcard, addressed to my sister, has come into my hands (writes R.D.S. in the Glasgow "Herald.") It was posted in Manchuria on November 29, 1923, sending Christmas and New Year greetings from a friend in China, but was only delivered in Edinburgh on May 30, 1924, exactly six months later. The apparent reason for the long delay is shown by the strange device of a rubber stamp on the face, which reads:—

What it was For

The signs underneath the English words are Chinese characters, and it seems to indicate that stealing letters and postcards is a national pastime, and that it is actually officially recognized.

One of the passengers on the C.P.R. liner Marburn for Canada is an ex-ploughman from Aberdeenshire who has been home to Scotland for a holiday. In 12 years he has secured a farm of 640 acres, has over 100 head of cattle, a splendid two-story house, also two motor-cars, but he had come back to Scotland "tae see aboot a wife," as he explained. "Its a' fixed up; she 's coming oot in September.

I've jist wired tae Sasakatoon for a bridescake, a gramophone and a hen hoose." What is the hen house for, he was asked, "O, that's tae keep hens.

The hens 'll keep the wife. I'm frae Aiberdeen!"

Cricket

In an intensely exciting finish Forfarshire defeated Perthshire by a single run in their Scottish Counties Championship match at Broughty Ferry. At the finish R. W. Sievwright, who took seven Perthshire wickets for 55 runs was carried shoulder high to the pavilion. In the same competition Fifeshire, at the expense of Stirling County, gained their first victory. Uddingston and Kelburne consolidated their position at the top of the Western District Union Championship table. Rain spoiled the match between those two Eastern rivals, Grange and Carlton, and brought about an unsatisfactory draw. Drumpellier beat Stewarts by one run. In the Schools Championship Fetmes scored 272 for 9 closed, and 30 for 2; hile Loretto had 210 and 90. Merchiston defeated Glenalmond.

AMERICAN MOVEMENT TO STOP WAR

Internal Organization to Press New World Policy on Congress Candidates

Washington, July 25.

A campaign for world cooperation to prevent war will be opened tomorrow by 36 organizations represented in the National Council for Prevention of War.

"Stop war! Cooperate!" is the motto adopted for the movement, and its sponsors say that it will cover nearly every state in the union. One hundred and fifty thousand ministers have been asked to preach sermons on "World Cooperations" next Sunday, and public meetings will be held in many places.

The Council has announced that all the presidential candidates will be asked the question: "How far will you cooperate for world peace?" and that later the same question will be asked of candidates for the Senate. It is proposed by the organization to carry on the work for an initial period of three months after the opening days of its drive.

Mr. Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the council, said to-day that the purpose was to "mobilize for peace now, and during the next three months to show these men who want to represent us in the national government that the will of the American people is for cooperation in international affairs."

A statement by the council said that those behind the campaign believed "the time has come to eliminate 'isolation' once and for all and establish 'cooperation' as America's foreign policy."—Reuter's American Service.

THE NEW ALBANIAN PREMIER

A Striking Personality

The news that Archbishop Fan Noli has become Premier of the Albanian Provisional Government is encouraging, says a correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian." At Geneva, during the assemblies of the League of Nations, Mgr. Fan Noli was one of the most popular and generally respected delegates. I had the opportunity of seeing a good deal of him, and formed the highest opinion of his character and qualities. Mgr. Noli spent 15 years in America, and speaks English perfectly, with a slight American accent. If my memory is accurate, his French is almost equally good, but linguistic facility is far from being the most important of his attainments. Mgr. Noli is a man who would be remarkable in any country, and among the delegates to the League of Nations from the Balkan countries he was easily first. An accomplished diplomatist, full of tact, with a large knowledge of the world and of international politics, a ready and witty debater, he made from the first a great impression at Geneva. I remember in particular one hot afternoon in the large glasshouse (formerly a winter garden) of the League secretariat, where a Commission of the Assembly was discussing the differences between Albania and the neighbouring States, Mgr. Noli "laid out" the opposing Balkan delegates in a masterly fashion, but always with perfect good humour. He had much the better case, but the way in which he put it no doubt contributed to the decision of the Commission in his favour.

In private Mgr. Noli is one of the most agreeable of companions. He has a quality that always makes a man interesting—he himself is interested in everything. He has a wide culture, and seemed to me to have read most things worth reading in English and French, and to be a first-rate talker about most things under the sun, including the higher criticism and the origins of Christianity, about which he turned out to have a great knowledge. But he talked equally well about the respective merits of Gustave Flaubert and Anatol France. Anybody less like a typical ecclesiastic of the Orthodox Church than Mgr. Noli I have never met.

Nor have I ever met anybody, lay or clerical, who was less of a clericalist. Mgr. Fan Noli is an all-round liberal—as liberal in theology as in politics—and, as a true liberal most be, thoroughly tolerant. He is greatly attached to his Mohammedan fellow-countrymen, who are equally attached to him—indeed he confided to me that the Christians were the most troublesome inhabitants of Albania, if only on account of their sectarian squabbles. The European country towards which his own personal sympathies tend is England. His influence will always be used on the side of peace and of a Balkan understanding.

HOUSE OF LORDS AND WOMEN MEMBERS

A Lively Debate: Opposition From Lord Banbury

Westminster, July 11.

In the House of Lords an animated debate took place on Viscount Astor's Bill to enable Peeresses in their own right to sit and vote in the Upper House.

Speeches made by Viscount Astor and Lord Darling were directed to proving that the House of Lords could anticipate nothing but advantage and efficiency from the presence in its midst of Peeresses in their own right.

On the other side, Lord Banbury held up the presence of lady members in the House of Commons as a terrifying example.

The whole debate was rather suggestive of the tourney of chivalrous days, when knights fought for the glory of their lady's smile. Lord Darling was perhaps the most chivalresque of the combatants, for he called to his aid the lance of poetry, while Lord Banbury relied on the more bludgeon-like weapon of what is called common-sense.

> Iron-jointed, supple-sinewed, they shall dive and they shall run,
> Catch the wild goat by the hair and hurl their lances in the sun.

This quotation from Tennyson's "Locksley Hall" was advanced by Lord Darling's gentle utterance as a prophecy of the athletic girl of to-day. "Iron-jointed, supple-sinewed"—the words in past ages would have seemed utterly inapplicable to a girl; yet to-day they are true enough, and Lord Darling had even heard of cow-girls at Wembley, who if they did not catch the wild goat by the hair wrestled with wild cattle.

Queens and the Lords

There was a finish in Lord Darling's manner which was a delight in itself. He spoke of history, and asked why in the beginning women were not summoned to Parliament. He gave the answer: the Barons were strong, just as Lord Banbury was strong, in upholding their hardly and newly conquered rights, and were willing to share them with but few men and certainly no women.

Yet there had been women members of Parliament, and of that very House. Either King or Queen was a member of Parliament, and Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, Queen Anne, and Queen Victoria had been members of the House of Lords.

Changed Times.

"Catching the wild steer by the hair" was a thing not thought of by ladies in the days of chivalry. They sat on a dais while the Barons milled one another in their honour. To-day things had changed. It had been suggested that the Upper House would lose dignity through the presence of Peeresses. How was such a thing possible? Ladies of the oldest blood of England and Scotland could not detract from the dignity of any assembly. If a lady could sit upon the Throne, why not on the benches of the Upper House?

The doughty champion on the other side was Lord Banbury, whose zest in Opposition in the House of Lords has bated not a whit. He insisted that the promoters of the Bill were attempting by Act of Parliament to alter a patent given by the Crown. If the Bill were passed a precedent would be established that a patent could be altered by Act of Parliament.

All the ladies elected to the House of Commons during his time there had come there to replace their husbands. His experience was that nearly everyone in Parliament regretted the admission of women to the House of Commons.

He himself was an admirer of women, but not in the House of Commons.

Dignity and Efficiency.

Lord Banbury inquired rhetorically whether the women of the country cared twopence about the measure, and answered his own question in the negative. He asserted that women had not been a success in the House of Commons. It was impossible for men to treat them as equals, for the fairer sex always exercized its power of fascination, though, it might be, unwittingly.

Viscount Astor, in moving the Bill, insisted that he was not trying to reform the House of Lords. It was desirable that the point of view of eight million women voters should be represented in the Upper House. That point of view was necessary, desirable and good in a large number of matters. There could be no question as to the competence of women.

The debate was adjourned.

OUR PARIS LETTER

Jaures' Remains Likely to Go to Pantheon: Curious Souvenir of J. J. Rousseau

From Our Own Correspondent.

Paris, July 10.

The Cabinet has decided to ask Parliament for authority to exhume the remains of Jean Jaurès, the great Socialist orator, and re-inter them in the Panthéon. The Senate has already voted the transfer of the remains of Michelet and Ernest Renan, but this has not yet been discussed by the Chamber. The proposals will no doubt be voted. They form part of the process of making the Panthéon into a sort of secular Westminster Abbey, the essential difference being that no great man who had pronounced religious opinions stands any chance of obtaining this posthumous glory. The inscription over the portal of the Panthéon is "Aux grands hommes la patrie reconnaissante," but the Third Republic has, in practice, limited the meaning of the phrase. It means the Panthéon to be a strictly lay temple. It has more than once been consecrated and deconsecrated, and, so long as the present régime lasts, it will be a public building arousing emotions only in the breasts of ardent disciples of free thought.

Its most distinguished inmates are, of course, Voltaire and Jean Jacques Rousseau. Nearly 30 years ago there was a heated controversy as to whether these great men really occupied the tombs on which their names were inscribed, and so much doubt prevailed that, as the only final means of settling the question, it was decided to open the tombs. This operation, at which I was present, was carried out with a singular absence of ceremony. The officials were accompanied by a crowd of journalists and of sensation-seekers, who chattered, cracked jokes freely and, had any refreshments been available, would surely have drunk the health of the great departed. Voltaire's coffin, a plain deal box, was found lying on the stone floor under a heavy wooden pyramid-shaped cover. The skull and the larger bones were almost intact; the rest had dissolved into a whitish dust rather like cigarette-ash. The skull was so like the head of Voltaire's statue by Houdon, which stood close by, that the investigators' doubts were set at rest and the remains were unhesitatingly declared to be those of the "sage of Ferney." Rousseau's bones seemed to have been treated by his contemporaries with more ceremony than Voltaire's. They were found in a wooden coffin with an outer covering of lead. As in the case of Voltaire, the smaller bones had become dust, but some reddish hair remained. As I was leaning over to look at Rousseau's ashes, a piece of the wooden coffin came off in my hand. I still have this souvenir of a very strange hour spent in the vaults of the modern French Temple of Fame. As a curio, it is certainly unique, though its possession is a source of very much less satisfaction than a common blue and white vase such as one used to be able to buy in the native city of Shanghai for a few cents.

The Olympic Games.

After five days of the athletic competitions which form the real basis of the Olympic Games, it is quite evident that the United States will beat all the other competing countries hollow. At present Finland is second, Great Britain is a bad third, and the rest to all intents and purposes are "nowhere." With their immense population, the United States were sure of victory if they really desired it and were prepared to work for it. They have the material, and they have made good use of it. Even before the main portion of the Games began, their success at Rugby football, a form of sport which was quite new to them, gave a foretaste of the energy and determination with which they approached the great international tournament. Their well-deserved success is an object lesson in purpose and perseverance. Financially the Games do not promise well. An excellent beginning was made with the Association football tournament, which brought big gate money, but the athletics do not attract the public, and the attendance on week-days looks very meagre in the vast area of the Stadium at Colombes. The French Olympic Committee insured against the receipts falling below Frs. 10,000,000 and it looks as if they took a wise precaution.

Incidentally, the Games have brought sad disappointment to many excellent citizens who saw visions of letting bedrooms at exorbitant prices to competitors and the immense numbers of foreigners who, it was supposed, would flock to Paris. Americans were in especial demand, it being hoped that, owing to the appreciation of the dollar, they would not object to exaggerated prices in francs. The would-be domestic profiteers failed to realize that the American committee, being nothing if not systematic, would make it own arrangements for lodging its competitors. They also exaggerated the "drawing" power of the Games, and they have now been reluctantly compelled to admit that the expected harvest of dollars is only a delusion.

Proportional Representation.

On the proposition of M. Camille Chautemps, Minister of the Interior, the Cabinet has approved the text of a bill putting an end to the present system of Parliamentary elections and reverting to the practice previously in force for many years. The last two general elections have been conducted on what is called the scrutin de liste, the main principle of which is that votes are reckoned not so much in favour of persons as of political ideas. Although a candidate who obtains an absolute majority—that is to say, more than half the total votes cast—is sure of election, the great majority of seats are allotted in proportion to the total of each list, composed of candidates supposed to hold identical ideas. In most cases the total has to be reduced to what is called an electoral quotient, obtained by dividing the total of votes by the number of seats, this latter number being determined by the population of each department as established at the last census.

The object of the electoral quotient is to give representation as nearly as possible in accordance with the expressed wishes of the electorate. In practice, the system has proved much too complicated, and the arithmetical calculations which had to be made after the last general election in May proved baffling to the public. Proportional representation, after having been tried at two general elections in France, has thus proved a failure, possibly because the inventors of the system aimed too high. They tried to make it do too much, and the result was that they obscured the issue.

The Government now proposes to return to the old system, known as the scrutin d'arrondissement (in which the votes go to the candidate individually and not to any conglomeration or list) with this difference, that the second ballot—necessary when no candidate obtains an absolute majority at the first ballot—is to take place at a week's instead of a fortnight's interval.

MR. CARTER TO RETURN TO LUXOR

"My Work Not Yet Finished"

Mr. Howard Carter, the Egyptologist, arrived in London in July on his return from a tour in Canada and America, where he lectured on his discoveries in the tomb of Tutankhamen, in the Valley of the Kings. The visit extended over eleven weeks and embraced seventeen large cities. Yale University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Science.

With regard to the future Mr. Carter was reticent, but he volunteered the information that he intends to return to Luxor next winter. "My work is not by any means finished," he said. "Fifty per cent. of it has still to be done, and I am going back to Luxor in November." Questioned as to the attitude taken up by the Egyptian Government before he left the Valley of the Kings, and the possibility of a recurrence of the trouble, Mr. Carter said, "I do not see why there should be any further trouble."

VANCOUVER LETTER

Chinese Freemason's Death: Child Adopted on the High Seas

From Our Own Correspondent.

A court application of interest to Shanghai was heard recently in Vancouver. In the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice D. A. McDonald granted Mr. A. H. Buschman and Mrs. Buschman, of Shanghai, permission to adopt a baby at that time en route to their home in the Orient. The order was without legal authority, as the little one had passed beyond a British Columbia judge's jurisdiction and was on the high seas, but the court acceded to the request of Mr. C. L. Fillmore, barrister, to give the moral sanction that goes with the order.

Recent trans-Pacific arrivals in Vancouver include Mrs. H. F Merrill of Shanghai who is spending the summer here with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Atkins Her little daughter Phyllis and baby girl accompany her. Mrs. Merrill, formerly Miss Kathleen Atkins, has lived in China for five years An interesting passenger arriving here was Mr. L. McLaren, a veteran manufactorer of Leeds, England, who is familiar to many who frequently cross the Pacific. He has been travelling around the world for 45 years. His particular hobby is cotton-growing in the British Empire and his business is introducing machinery.

Major W. R. McD. Parkes, who is associated with the Hongkong Customs, sailed to-day on board the Empress of Asia, also Bishop F. W. Warne, of New York, a returning missionary.

The death took place here recently of Lam Chong, a native of Canton, and a resident of British Columbia for 31 years. He was highly respected both by foreigners and his own countryman. Lem Bow-hing, a Chinese consular agent, the presidents of the Chee Kong Tong (Chinese Free Masons) and the Lem Sai Hor Tong, another local benevolent association, and Mr. Alex Henderson, K.C., were among well known men at the funeral which was exceptonally well attended.

PARIS CANCER TRAGEDY

A Wife's Ordeals

Paris, July 17.

Fuller details are now available concerning the death in a Paris hospital of the Polish author, Jan Soznowski, who was shot on Tuesday by a woman understood to be his sweetheart, whose object was, as stated in a previous message, to put an end to the agony that he was suffering from incurable cancer of the liver. She, it now appears, was in reality his wife, an actress of exceptional talent and beauty.

Sonowski served throughout the war as a volunteer in the French Foreign Legion and went through the horrors of the fighting round Arras and Neuville St. Vaast with the utmost courage. When peace came he settled at Warsaw, and rapidly made an enviable position for himself as art critic and novelist. There he met his future wife, who had been in the theatrical profession since childhood. She is only 22 years old, but has revealed herself in Poland as an actress of the first rank under the name of Stasia Uminska.

About a year ago she suddenly disappeared from the Polish stage, and only her family knew that she had gone into the country to nurse her stricken lover. It had been their dream to spend their honeymoon in the country for which Soznowski had fought, but their arrival in Paris was solely due to the fact that his Polish doctors thought the only chance of saving his life was to be found in a course of radio-therapy that could only be had in Paris. Then they were married in order that she could be constantly at his side. On arriving at Paris the young wife went straight to the hospital, and never left her husband till his death.

In view of the collapsed condition in which she remains no warrant, contrary to what has been previously stated, has yet been issued for Madame Soznowski's arrest. The Polish Consul-General and many other members of the Polish colony have visited the hospital, and great efforts are being made, with the support of a large body of French public opinion, to find some means whereby she may be spared the ordeal of judicial proceedings.

HEALTHY LONDON

Lifetime Average Extended 20 Years: Lowest Death Record

In the course of 80 years the Londoner's lifetime has been extended by more than 20 years.

This interesting statement is contained in the annual report for 1923 of the Medical Officer of Health for the County of London, with that of the School Medical Officer.

The year, he states, was remarkable for having the lowest death-rate ever recorded in London. The infant mortality rate was even more exceptional, as it was only 61 per 1,000 births, as compared with 75 the previous year. The comparatively low mortality from influenza, bronchitis, and pneumonia, the low rate from measles, and the improvement as regards the rates from scarlet fever and diphtheria upon those of 1922, account in large measure for the very low general death rate.

A reduction in the number of homeless persons was shown at the annual enumeration. Considerable advance was made in the provision of new housing accommodation.

The civil population in the middle of 1923 is estimated to have been 4,564,109. British from the middle of 1921 to the middle of 1923 exceeded the deaths by 80,041. The balance of movement of population in the two years has resulted in a loss of about 35,000 persons.

Marriages during 1923 numbered 39,294, compared with 41,611 in the proceding year. Births numbered 91,662, or 6,870 less than the preceding year, the birth-rate being 20.1 per thousand, as compared with 20.9 in 1922. The downward movement in the birth-rate dates back to the early Eighties.

The deaths numbered 51,991, the death-rate being 11.4 per thousand. The decline of infant mortality since 1900, it is observed, is found not only in London and England and Wales, but in most European countries.

Expectation of Life.

The following tables are given to show how the Londoner's lifetime has been extended during the last 80 years, the first column representing the period and the others the expection of life in years, males and females:

Period	Males	Females
1841-50	34.6....	38.3
1851-60	36.4....	40.4
1861-70	35.7....	39.9
1871-80	38.0....	42.4
1881-90	40.1....	44.5
1891-00	41.2....	45.4
1901-10	47.2....	51.9
1901-10	47.2....	51.9
1911-12	47.2....	51.9
1920-22	53.8....	59.1

The report of the school medical officer (Sir William Hamer) says the proportion of children found to be suffering from ailments for which treatment has been necessary continues to fall. Parents continue to show an increasing interest in the inspections of their children. The slow but steady improvement in the personal cleanliness of the children is maintained. The condition of the teeth of entrant children was rather better than in 1922. This may be due to attention to dental conditions now given at Infant Welfare Centres.

The analysis of the statistics relating to the 200,000 children examined shows that the steady, continuous work of the School medical service continues to bear fruit in improving conditions of health in London school children. Over a period of years that improvement is very striking.

JESUS, THE CHRIST

A sermon preached by the Rev. Clifford M. Drury, pastor of Community Church, on Sunday, August 18, at one of the Combined services of Community and Union Churches held in the Union Church.

Text Acts 17:3 "And that this Jesus, whom, said he, I proclaim unto you, is the Christ."

In the 17th chapter of Acts we have the story of Paul preaching in Thessalonica. The record tells us that for three consecutive sabbaths, Paul, as his custom was, went into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews. The burden of Paul's preaching was that this Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the Messiah promised in the Old Testament. "This Jesus, whom I proclaim unto you, is the Christ."

Now what was the significance of that title 'The Christ?' The Greek word 'Christos' is the translation of the Hebrew word 'Messiah.' This Hebrew word is derived from a verb meaning "to anoint." The word 'Messiah' therefore means 'the anointed one.' Only twice is this Hebrew word used in the New Testament, each time by John and each time John takes pains to translate its meaning. In all other places in the New Testament the word 'Christ' is used to express the meaning contained in the word 'Messiah.' The words are synonmous. If we really desire to know what the title "The Christ" meant to the Jews of Paul's day, we must then go back and study the conceptions held of the Hebrew term 'Messiah.'

According to the Levitical law, priests, prophets, and kings were all anointed with oil in the ceremony of consecration. Saul was anointed king by Samuel. He was set apart for his task. Even though priests and prophets were anointed, still we find that such terms as 'the Lord's anointed,' 'mine anointed' and 'thine anointed' apply only to kings. Once the word is used to apply to a Gentile king. In Isaiah 45.1 we read: "Thus saith Jehovah to his anointed, to Cyrus."

The full development of the word does not come until the intertestamental period. In those dark days when the Romans invaded the land and defiled the sanctuary, we find the Jews using this title 'The Messiah' in the technical sense. All of the prophecies of the Old Testament were studied with fresh zeal. A person with a superhuman character was looked for. He was to be a descendant of the Davidic line, a king of Israel, one who would subdue the oppressor. And above all he was to establish a kingdom of righteousness with a throne founded upon wisdom and justice, while he himself would be filled with the Spirit of God.

This was the conception of the Messiah which was held by the Jews when Jesus began His ministry. Now the question is, what attitude did Jesus take to this title? Did He accept it as applying to Himself?

There are those who say that He did not. Let H. G. Wells be the spokesman of the critics. In his 'Outline of History' he writes: "Except for one or two passages in St. John's gospel it is difficult to get any words actually ascribed to Jesus in which he claimed to be the Jewish Messiah (rendered in Greek by 'the Christ.')"

My theme to-day is that he did accept it. He looked upon Himself as being the object of all prophecy. He either directly or indirectly gave forth this idea and allowed the impression to go uncorrected in the minds of both His friends and of His enemies. This assumption of the title of 'Messiah' to 'Christ' is one of the strongest reasons we have for believing in the deity of Jesus.

Let us examine our evidence. The scriptural passages can, for convenience sake, be divided into two groups. First there is the testimony of His friends and then there is the testimony of His enemies.

In the first place we find that Jesus allowed His disciples and His followers to believe that He was the Christ. It is inconsistent with His moral nature to believe that Jesus would voluntarily and knowingly allow any person to believe something about Himself which was not true. Once Paul was taken for Mercury and Barnabas was taken for Jupiter, and these two men wasted no time before they corrected the impression. Is it possible to think of Jesus as having a lower moral standard than that of Paul and Barnabas?

In the fourth chapter of John we have the story of Jesus talking with the Samaritan woman. "I know," said the woman, "that Messiah cometh (he that is called Christ)" "And Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am he." Here is a clear cut assumption on the part of Jesus of this title.

Not only did Jesus allow this conception to be held, but He openly rejoiced in the knowledge that this conception was held. Recall the story of Peter's confession. "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." And Jesus replied "Blessed art thou Simon Bar-jonah." This marks the only time, according to our written records, when Jesus called an individual blessed.

Finally among His friends we come to the confession of Martha. Lazarus had died and the conversation had turned to the subject of the resurrection. And then Jesus said: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die. Believest thou this?" And Martha replied saying: "Yea Lord: I have believed that thou art the Christ, the Son of God." Now if Martha was wrong, why didn't Jesus correct her?

Even more important than the testimony of friends, is the testimony of His enemies. The critics say that the friends of Jesus were inclined to crown Him with the greatest compliment within the power of man—so they called Him the Messiah even when He had not laid claim to so great a title. Certainly His enemies would not do this. And as we study the growth of the opposition to Jesus we see that the key note to the whole trouble was that Jesus claimed to be the Messiah. It was this that constituted the chief offence of Jesus in the day of His trial.

We can trace the growth of this opposition in the gospel according to John. In John 7 we have the account of Jesus teaching in the temple. His words bring considerable discussion. "Can it be" someone argues "that the rulers indeed know that this man is the Christ?" The idea is dismissed with the words: "Howbeit we know this man whence he is: but when the Christ cometh, no one knoweth whence he is."

However, we find even at that early date that the Jewish rulers were beginning to be suspicious. They met in solemn assembly and agreed that if any man confessed his faith in Jesus as the Messiah, that this man should be expelled from the synagogue and his name removed from the rolls. This was a very serious punishment in those days. Read the 9th chapter of John in the light of this explanation. Here is a man who was blind and who was cured by Jesus. The Pharisees question the man's parents but they remain silent for fear of being put out of the synagogue. Is it possible that these Jews would make such a rule for nothing? An old proverb says that where there is smoke there must be fire.

In the 10th chapter of John we have the story of another encounter of Jesus with the Jews. "If thou art the Christ," they asked Him, "tell us plainly." "I told you," Jesus replied, "and ye believe not." There was no doubt in the minds of His enemies as to His claims. They took up stones to kill him because, they said: "Thou, being a man, makest thyself God."

And finally we come to the evidence brought forth by the trial. Seven different times during the trial and the crucifixion the accusers, or the soldiers, or the judges, or the malefactors made reference to the fact that Jesus claimed to be the Messiah.

The high priests asked: "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The soldiers blindfolded Him and then struck Him in the face and mockingly said: "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that struck thee?" Early on Friday morning He was taken before the judges who asked Him: "If thou art the Christ, tell us." Before Pilate the accusation takes a political turn but still the central idea is there: "We found this man perverting our nation and forbidding to give tribute to Ceasar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king." Pilate accepts this title: "Whom will ye that I release, Barabbas or Jesus which is called Christ." While hanging on the cross the scoffers say: "He saved others; let him save himself, if this is the Christ of God, his chosen." And finally we have the mocking of one of the malefactors. "Art thou the Christ? save thyself and us."

Can there be any doubt about the statement that Jesus was crucified simply because He claimed to be the Christ? What better evidence do we need than this to prove to ourselves and to others that Jesus had indeed assumed that title? H. G. Wells must deliberately shut his eyes to much of the gospel records when he writes to the effect that Jesus never assumed this title of 'the Christ.'

It is foolish to believe that Jesus was anxious to have people give a mental assent to these claims merely for the glory that it might give Him. The essence of His teachings was that there was a real connexion between belief in these claims and forgiveness of sin, life eternal, and character.

During the first part of the 19th century, a German astronomer by the name of Johann Elbert Bode discovered the fact that the planets were all spaced from the sun according to a fixed ratio. He proclaimed what is known as Bode's law. However there were several vacant spaces. "Look in a certain place" he said "and you will find a new planet." And they did and the planet was found. At least two new planets have been found as the result of the proclamation of this law.

A similar experience happened in the realm of chemistry. Certain scientists discovered that the atomic weights of the elements ran according to a certain proportion. Only there were some blank spaces. The bold prediction was made that certain elements existed having a certain atomic weight and the scientists even gave many of their properties. In the course of time several of these elements were discovered. A few remain yet to be found.

The God who formed the laws of astronomy and chemistry is the same God who formed the laws of the spiritual world. If in the scientific world men are bold enough to predict certain great facts from a knowledge of certain established principles, is it too much to say that this can be done in the spiritual world?

Jesus Christ, the great master mind in religion, proclaimed a new principle in religion, and after he made that proclamation he was bold enough to predict a certain result. "If ye love me—ye will keep my commandments." How is it possible to love Christ without trusting in Him, accepting Him as a truthful man, and believing in His own claims? John, the great lover of Christ crowns his writings with these words: "These things were written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God." The greatest lover of Jesus is he who believes that Jesus is the Christ. This is the principle which governs the prediction of character: "ye will keep my commandments." There is a real connexion between holy character and faith in Jesus as the Christ. It was a new discovery in the world of religion. Buddha never said: "Believe in me and you will have a good character." No other teacher said it, except Jesus. This was the basis for holy living here, and life in the world to come. "This Jesus whom I proclaim to you is the Christ." If you believe in Him, you will keep His commandments, and even though you die, yet shall you live

SUNDAY BASEBALL

Why I Will Not Play It

By Harry Kingman.

Since some of the most important baseball games held in Shanghai are played on Sunday it is natural that a player, who does not play Sunday ball, should feel that he is contributing less than his best service to his team. A conflict of loyalties makes his position a difficult one. During the past week, due to a downright desire to do all that I could to help the Shanghai team win its series with Keio University, and because of the earnest urgings of my fellow players, I have attempted, with an open mind, to rethink the problem, and to decide anew whether or not I should take the field on Sunday. At a friend's request I take this occasion to make a public statement of my reasons for determining not to do so.

Sunday observance by a Christian should not, of course, be mere fetishism. Christ, when He was being criticized by the self-righteous people of His day for observing Sunday in a manner which they tagged as irreligious, remarked, "The Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath." Putting aside tradition and authority He seemed to confront every man with the problem of deciding for himself how best to use the day.

The New Generation

Certainly there are circumstances, I believe, under which a Christian might feel entirely justified in taking part in Sunday sport. I have witnessed industrial communities where I felt that Sunday afternoon baseball meant more to the bodies, minds, and spirits of the workers than anything else could have done. I agree, laso, with the team-mate who, last Saturday night, argued that many of the Shanghai people who would attend the game on the next afternoon would be better off there than in any other place to which they would be likely to go.

But, it is my conviction that for those of the new generation who are going to attempt solving some of the perplexing problems of present society, there must be a more effective use of Sunday than as a play time. Out of my experience in life has come the positive conviction that not material things, but spiritual things, rather, are of the supremest significance. I recognize, of course, that many are able to close their eyes to this truth, and that they will not concur with me in feeling that human beings need to set aside a time when, by an effort of the will, they hoist themselves out of the accustomed ruts, and do some serious thinking on the things which are essential. But the God that I have slowly grown to know, since He lifted me from out the weak and unhappy existence that I was leading a number of years ago, somehow causes me to sense the unreasonableness of attempting to muddle through life without trying to understand more of it than I stumble upon in my office, or on the street, or in the daily routine.

A Day to Be Marked

One day demands of a true Christian the same quality of living as another. The case that I seek to make for a special use of Sunday is not that a man should be better on that day, but rather that he needs to mark off one adequate period a week which he will employ in the manner which will make him of most value to society. Our present schedule of living makes Sunday the most convenient and suitable span of time for such special use. I, personally, am signally indebted to many of the Sundays which I have spent in fellowship with my father, or in reading, thinking, or worship. If I am ever able to make any worthwhile contribution to others it will be at least partly due to the fact that I have looked upon Sunday as an opportunity for character developments, a day to be utilized for toning up my spiritual life.

Thinking men are no longer slaves to tradition or external authority. That which is outworn and outlived is being cast aside. This is fortunately true in religion as well as in other phases of life. The Sunday that was endured by some of the older generation—a blue, cheerless, painfully-pious, unnatural occasion—is passing out along with other religious unrealities. But the need for those, who refuse to live an aimless, useless existence, to regard Sunday as an opportunity to put themselves in the presence of the best that they can discover, is as vital a need as ever. I choose not to play ball on Sunday because I feel that it is less than the best use of the day for me, and because, if I had any influence with those who are young and who are still forming their characters and ideals, I would throw it into the balance on the side of using Sunday in a manner which would give them a truer understanding of the things in life which really count.

Some will not care for this statement. Of them I ask only an equal degree of tolerance towards my convictions which I display towards theirs.

IMPRESSIONS OF CHINA

By George E. Sokolsky.

Applied Economics

The story is told that two Chinese were discussing religion. Said one to the other:

"We have too many gods. thousands of them. And our gods worship thousands of gods. The Christians are wiser. They have only one God. That is a sign of economy and efficiency."

"Ah," said the other, "as for economy, the idea of One God was invented by the Jews."

To W. W. Yen

Why try? The professional politicians in Peking, those who vote in Parliament, who spend their afternoons in tea-houses in Central Park and their evenings outside Chienmen with the shrill ladies have you beaten. You have tried to do a man's work, why spoil it by becoming their puppet? If you let come Premier one will wonder how you finally won them over, they will live upon such crises? Leave the business to militarists or millionaires. Such men understand the ways of the Rialto. They know the price of each job, the exchange value of such things. A Hanlin scholar, a gentleman, a lover of beauty labours in vain in the city of dust.

The Kuomintang

Unmistakable, clear was the language of the Kuomintang Manifesto. "We do no evil even evil be done to us." The instructions against anti-foreign movements, the historical survey of the attitude of the Kuomintang toward foreigners, the insistence upon maintaining friendly relations with foreigners cannot be altogether disregarded, in view of the Shameen strike and the iteration of anti-foreign statements from Canton. When speaks the voice of the Kuomintang and when the voice of that minority in every political party in China which loudly proclaims itself the Chinese people

Parliament

If it is true that no Premier can be elected because none of the candidates are rich enough to pay the price Parliament demands, one wonders not at the rapacity of the Tuchuns. For after all, they have to maintain provincial troops. They have to contribute large donations to provincial institutions. They have to keep down bandits and robbers. They do something for their money. What does Parliament do? Yet, Parliament can become a great institution. It can develop into an organ as important to China as the Mother of Parliaments is to the Anglo-Saxon peoples. Why should not the merchants and bankers and honest men of the country frankly bribe parliainto decency. Why should not the good men impose upon themselves a tax to pay the salaries of the parliamentarians and then force them to carry out a programme of reconstruction through a model cabinet. They might then make their own Sung Hung-yi, Premier, and Dr. W. W. Yen could continue his reconstructive efforts, without fear of being manœuvred out of office by the God of Jealousy.

Panchan Lama

They worship at his feet, the believers. They see in him the reincarnation of a saint, of perfection. He will be welcomed in Peking as he has been welcomed in Lanchow and as his emmissaries have been welcomed in Loyang. But will he carry a message to Peking? Will he bring more than his person? When Tsao Kun falls at his feet will the great leader of Buddhism speak of righteous living and the sufferings of the people? When Wu Pei-fu goes out to meet him, will he tell of the need for a better life for the masses of the Chinese people? Will he preach an end to civil wars? Will he lead men to patriotism and to serve the country? Or, will his visit be just a little more superstition like that which followed the travels of the Hantan tablet, the iron maker of rains.

THE AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHER

IV.—On Subjects and Composition

BY R. V. DENT.

Herein the snapshotter will find no learned dissertations upon the laws of "good composition" primarily because he is not interested in how to make exhibition pictures; if he is he soon becomes a serious worker in photography. Secondly because it is a difficult subject to teach. The only school is the study of work done by artists of standing.

None the less, there are certain fundamental principles which it is as well for the snapshotter to know and which it is always risky to neglect, as when disregarded they generally cause a displeasing effect ascribed to poor composition. The greatest of these principles is to hold the picture within its frame. The satisfactory placing of the subject matter within the borders of the picture is half the battle in good composition whether it be a simple or a complicated subject. If the eye is continually tempted to wander out of the frame it is safe to assume that something is wrong with the general composition. For a picture must be complete in itself, satisfying, and the observer must not be anxious to know what was just beyond the edge; if he is, then the chances are that the picture is a failure.

Thirdly, it must have balance. A mass near the frame will balance a larger mass on the opposite side slightly more distant from the border. Light will balance shade (sometimes, not always) and a low key will balance a high one. Mass on the side with nothing to balance it is apt to produce a very disturbing effect.

Lastly, there must be a principal point of interest; if there are two figures one must be subordinated to the other. Incidentally, it is the neglect of this rule that leads to most group-photographs being thorough failures from an artistic point of view.

Keep in the Frame.

Let us now apply these simple rules to average snapshotting; it is very well worth while as the resulting improvement in picture-making more than compensates for the slight extra care required. There are two ways available to the ordinary amateur to achieve good composition; by selecting the best view-point from which to photograph and/or trimming the finished print with or without enlarging the desired remaining portion. It is usually the combination that makes good pictures, and it is safe to assert that there is hardly a photograph that cannot be improved by judicious trimming even if just a tiny piece. To keep your picture in the frame watch the exits from your view-finder or judge them in the original; avoid lines leading out unless they lead clear out of the picture; thus, a wall can be cut clean at the edge, but to include a portion of a sloping roof is apt to spoil the effect. A tree can be cut vertically, but cut horizontally it must not be cut downwards as reason rejects the possibility of trees being suspended in mid-air; therefore always include the foundation, for everything rests on something. Cut boldly well down from the top of a mast or tree and the eye accepts it; but cut off the extreme top only and the observer is disturbed by the missing fraction which he knows should be there.

Beware of the Centre.

Never centre your subject, for while a geometrical design may be wondrous beautiful it is not generally considered as pictorial art. Symmetrical design does not mean centring. Thus in photographing a house or building, full-face centred representations are usually the least desirable as the artistic possibilities (if there were any) are lost and it shows but two dimensions; also the lighting is usually flat. It is nearly always desirable to include the third dimension . . . . depth, which gives solidarity . . . . by showing some part of one side. A monument taken full-face may be a good record of an inscription, if that is what is required, but a three-quarter view is usually far preferable as regards truthful rendering.

Pictures must have balance. Thus when placing a pagoda etc: to the left or right, see that a tree or figure or some small mass balances it and completes the picture. A small tree in the distance balances a large one in the foreground; remove that small tree and the whole composition falls to the ground.

Lastly, have a principal point of interest around which your picture is built, subordinating all else to it. The eye should rest comfortably on that point and take in everything else as subsidiary. Thus subordinate the background to a figure or vice-versa, for you cannot paint two pictures on one canvas.

A Few Common Errors.

Bear in mind these four fundamental principles and plus your own good taste you will avoid the comical efforts one sees so sadly often; wherein a tree appears floating in space or seems growing up from the head of a figure in front of it, a boat going full speed out of the picture instead of into it, a bridge cut off from the bank in imminent danger of collapse, and a passing pedestrian minus his pedal appendages . . . . to mention but a few of the more common errors. We are not dealing with the added misfortunes of under-exposure and poor technique which usually accompany these snapshots.

In all photography, a good rule is never to make an exposure unless on something worth while and of interest to you. Indiscriminate snapshotting is not only a waste of money but soon leads to a general loss of interest in the hobby. A few good pictures are worth a hundred bad ones.

Good subjects are rare so it is poor economy to save on films when they are found. Take several times from slightly different view-points and the chances are one will give you precisely what you wanted. If in doubt about your exposure . . . . give more.

Get the clouds into your pictures by using a sky-filter or, better, the K1 filter previously recommended. The sky always has tone, and blank white paper represents neither sky nor anything else satisfactorily and is the ruin of many an otherwise excellent picture. Values are of supreme importance and good technique is the only key to that.

The Light.

Lighting is very important in fine photography, as in all the graphic arts. A knowledge of chiaroscuro is essential to really good work. The worst light is a powerful midday sun as the contrasts are too violent and frequently beyond the power of any printing medium to reproduce. Snapshotters are told always to get the sun behind them, but this is, to put it mildly, nonsense; what matters is to prevent the sun's rays from striking the lens and this is done by either a lens-hood or shielding the lens by the hand or body or a hat, being of course careful not to cut into the field of the lens. The film-worker has little need to fear halation but he must be on his guard against flare and general fogging of the negative from sunlight striking the lens.

The best light comes from over either shoulder; from directly behind it gives flat effects so this should be avoided.

Moving Objects.

The photography of moving objects is a study in itself; in cinematography blur does not show because the eye does not perceive details when objects are in rapid motion. But in still photographs we naturally expect to see the motion cut sharp. The tables of shutter-speeds required to stop various movement are interesting but apt to mislead the amateur as they do not sufficiently stress the point that at many of those shutter-speeds it is highly improbable the film will receive enough exposure to give a printable negative.

The rule for photographing moving objects is . . . . estimate the shortest exposure which promises reasonable hope of a printable negative and give that exposure, trusting to judgment and luck successfully to "stop" the motion. Use the largest aperture of the lens, of course, and focus in advance on the position you expect the moving object to reach when you wish to snap it. Note that if it requires "x" exposure to stop the motion of an object passing at right angles, two-thirds will suffice if it is passing at oblique angles and one-third if it is coming nearly towards the camera (in practice even less). The amateur is therefore recommended to choose the latter position. It is perfectly easy to "stop" the motion of an ordinary train 100 feet distant with so slow an exposure as 1/50th second if it is coming towards you whereas about 1/300th is required if it is passing at right angles. The same thing applies to all races. For athletics try to get the subjects against the sky, avoiding dark backgrounds as this makes the best of slight under-exposure. Real speed-photography requires special equipment and is beyond the scope of this article.

How to Manage Waves.

Wave and water photography must be done slowly, not fast, as water is usually in motion and a high shutter-speed "freezes" all effect of motion. 1/30th of a second or thereabouts (in good light use stop F 16, U.S. 16) is just right. Slower it is a blur and faster all sense of motion is lost. Beautiful sea-side and wave pictures can be made by photography and this tip will help very considerably.

In all speed-work foresee the position you want and press the release just before you want the picture, thus allowing for the lag of the fingers and shutter; otherwise you may find you just missed it.

V.—On Amateur Portraiture

It is said that if the amateur photographer wants to lose his friends quickly he need only make portraits of them!! There is a lot of truth in this, unfortunately, and the snapshotter would be well advised to start experimenting with someone who is not in a position to hit back when he sees the perhaps startling results obtained!

The impossibility of dealing with the immense subject of portraiture in a brief article, except in a most superficial way, compels us to select the most helpful information likely to assist the average amateur and let a great many points pass unmentioned.

The commonest errors of amateur portraiture are under-exposure, excessive contrast, false perspective, and wrong values. We are of course using the word "amateur" in the usual narrow sense and mean by it the beginner or not advanced amateur, for in photography the real amateur is frequently a better worker than the average professional.

Under-exposure is best guarded against by the use of some kind of motor as recommended in our article on exposure, although the exposures therein mentioned will serve, bearing in mind that near objects require full exposure.

Use a Reflector.

To avoid excessive contrast, development of the film must be for about half the time usually given for normal contrast. But apart from this, indoors the use of a reflector is almost essential if the light enters the room by fairly near windows. It is common to see amateur prints showing half the face quite black; the use of a cloth reflector would have prevented this. Place a large white towel or sheet over the back of a high chair as near the subject as possible without it showing in the picture. You will note a distinct lightening of the shadow side of the face as it reflects the light back on to the subject; this makes a great improvement both visually and photographically.

As the use of reflectors is practically compulsory in all indoor portraiture the amateur is recommended to note this.

Another common cause of excessive contrast is trying to make posed portraits in full sunlight. The face always comes out too dark and all contrasts too violent. Therefore work anywhere except in direct sunlight for serious attempts at portraits.

False perspective is inevitable with the short-focus lenses fitted to hand-cameras if they are used too close to the sitter; do not try to get too large an image as results are sure to be unsatisfactory. Better to get a smaller image and enlarge or trim down than a large image which is badly out of drawing. The use of a supplementary lens for large heads and busts is sometimes advantageous. In such cases absolutely exact (by tape measure) focussing is required. Incidentally these attachments are useful for photographing small objects such as vases and curios, etc., which otherwise come out too small on the film.

How to Pose.

Place your sitters sideways to you, or your lens will exaggerate the perspective. Three-quarter face is generally preferable to profile as it shows more character; full-face is best of all but by far the most difficult as regards modelling as any error in lighting will result in no modelling at all. By modelling is meant the relief effect seen in good portraits without which no picture can be considered a portrait.

Correct value—that is giving each tone its due prominence without falseness—is a great desideratum in all portraiture. As mentioned before the difficulty is that the ordinary non-orthochromatic film is blind to red, yellow and orange and over-sensitive to blue and violet and ultra-violet; in ordinary practice one is photographing almost entirely by blue and ultra-violet rays which means that the film "sees" things entirely differently from our eyes. Kodak film is orthochromatic but unless a filter is used it remains almost blind to yellow and orange and renders greens too dark, while still remaining totally blind to red. The human complexion mainly reflects the colours yellow, orange and red of the spectrum and this explains at once why, apart from sheer faking to "make things look like what they ain't," retouching is a necessity in commercial studio work. But it is always undesirable except to correct blemishes and the amateur can eliminate the need for most of it by using a K 1 filter which will vastly improve his tonal values. If he can use panchromatic material (obtainable locally in the form of Eastman Cut Flm) and a deep correcting filter (K 2) retouching is totally eliminated. In the hands of experts this is the finest work done in photography.

Correct Lighting.

The elements of lighting should be outlined, as modelling of the features depends on correct lighting. Avoid flat front lighting as that destroys modelling. The keen amateur will experiment with various directional lightings if he wishes to see what a difference it makes. Side light gives excessive shadows even with a reflector. The best light falls on the sitter from above his head at an angle of about 45 degrees.

Backgrounds for the amateur are best left alone. Be careful if using a wall that the shadow of the sitter is not thrown right up against it, as it is not usual to sit touching the wall. White walls will never show white if a portrait negative is correctly developed unless they were specially illuminated. A blanket makes a good background for a head and bust. If working in home surroundings either have the further details completely out of focus or in good focus, but a half-and-half blur effect intrigues the mind and is undesirable. If there are annoying high-lights in the finished portrait, touch them out with a lead pencil; very easy to do and greatly improves the appearance of the print.

Do not attempt "stunt" lightings and effects, as they do not exist in nature and anyway would seem poor imitations of studio work. The amateur is safe only so long as he does not strive to emulate the studio-worker, for he has neither the skill nor the equipment of the latter, and portrait specialists, if worthy of their name, are more than photographers but are artists using photography as their medium of expression.

Snaps of Children.

By far the finest field for the snapshotter is the instantaneous portraiture of children; frequently such pictures give more real pleasure to the parents than posed and conventional studio portraits.

Here indeed do we find the Elysian fields waiting to enchant the amateur photographer, particularly if he or she has growing children around. For nowhere can the hand-camera give greater or more lasting pleasure than in making pictures of the children as they pass through the various stages. Well done, such portraiture is indeed worth while.

What constitutes a real portrait? What is it that makes one picture a living souvenir of the child or adult we know, and the other but a map of his features, calling forth no answering chords in the mind of the observer? The answer is likeness, expression, and the presence or lack of personality in the portrait. Every subject has personality and character which the real portrait has found and it is recognized at once. The other portrait missed it and shows but the outward form. Everything, therefore, must give way to a correct representation of likeness and personality, which necessarily includes expression and pose. All the artifices of portrait workers in any medium are permissible only so long as these are retained.

It is obvious that the amateur at home has many advantages to counterbalance his possible lack of technique. Who has not seen wonderful snapshot portraits of children? The reason why they are so good is that the subjects were at ease and absolutely natural and have not that "being photographed" camera-conscious look which is so distressing.

Posing Themselves.

Do not try to pose children, for they pose themselves. Watch patiently for a desirable pose and expression and "snap" them. They should not know when the picture was made. still less have known in advance just when the picture was to be made. This applies to all portraiture if it is to be satisfactory. Babies should be given something to play with to distract their attention from the camera. High shutter-speeds are not required; 1/20th or so is ample for children's play as a rule. To get them on the swing, photograph just at the "dead" instant when it starts on the swing back.

Development for outdoor portraits of children can be done for what is called normal contrast; that is, full time if tank development is used. But for all other portraits soft negatives — that is, with little contrast—are quite essential; that means, cut down the tank time by about 40 per cent. and print on a soft paper, not vigorous. Therefore, if you have your work done for you your photo-finisher should be warned in advance to develop for portraits. Thus it is advisable to use up a roll of six exposures when attempting home portraits (except outdoor children) or the other pictures will be under-developed. As every snapshotter should understand what development is and how it is done we shall discuss the elements of it in our next article.

U. S. PRESIDENT CAMPAIGN

Small Choice Between Two Big Parties: La Follette and Labour

This size-up of the American political siutation has been written especially for the "North-China Daily News" by one who has just returned from a trip to the States which afforded him unusual opportunities for coming in touch with representative opinion and material which does not ordinarily get into print. It represents, of course, simply his own reaction to current events.

It has been a great year for the "Old Guard" Conservatives in America this year. Never in American history have the two main political parties nominated men so near alike or written platforms so closely resembling each other or—so meaningless. The "Big Interests," Wall Street, cares little which party goes in, either one is entirely friendly. Coolidge will not be driven by any one, but seems to follow Mellon as gladly as the lamb followed Mary, and Mellon is one of the wealthiest bankers of the world, a man of the same type as Judge Gary. Davis, the Democratic nominee, is very "proud of being the counsel" of Morgan, the Standard oil Co., and a number of other of the biggest trusts in America. Compared with the days of Roosevelt or Wilson the political outlook in America to-day is decidedly, and proudly, reactionary.

The National (nominating) Conventions had points of interest. In the Republican Convention the nomination of Coolidge for President was assured long before the Convention met. So there was little interest on the part of the public, the Convention Hall was never filled. Platform and presidential nominee decided before the Convention, the thing of interest was the taking over of party management by Coolidge. This was rather bitterly resented by the old Bosses and was a bit badly bungled by Butler, Coolidge's manager. This bitterness came clearly to light in the choice of Vice Presidential nominee. Coolidge had His votes promised and absolutely assured. No one was tied to a vice President however. Coolidge wanted Pres. Burton of Michigan University as running mate. The "Old Guard Bosses" to spite Coolidge nominated ex.-Gov. Lowden—who promptly refused to accept the nomination. Coolidge then tried to get Borah, probably the most respected, scholarly statesman in America today, but Borah would not stand on the meaningless platform that had been built, was not in sympathy with the very conservative attitude of Coolidge in the oil scandals and flatly refused to run. Coolidge then shifted to the support of Herbert Hoover but the Old Guard did not propose to give one thing Coolidge wanted if they could help it and nominated Dawes. And Dawes accepted. Alas.

Dawes: Financial Expert.

We hear of Dawes as the man who solved the financial problems of Europe, a man who builds hotels for poor men out of work. Very good, but he is also to man who "loaned" something over a million dollars to Lorimonr's bank while the examiners were counting the assets of that institution, taking the money back to his own bank immediatly on their departure, a little deal that came to light when the Lorimer bank went to pieces, Dawes' bank being held responsible by the Illinois Supreme Court the records of which are open to all. He is also the man who has worked out the most effective system yet devised for breaking up Labour Union organizations. This is well recorded in the minds of the Labouring Group, and will show very clearly in the November election. One other thing the Old Guard did in Cleveland, they left all criticism of the Oil Crooks carefully out of the record, more than that, Daugherty, the worst of them all, was one of the big men in the convention committees. They were so sure of winning the election in November that they felt they could do anything and the voters would stand for it. They are not so sure now.

The Democratic Convention was as different as it is possible to be. Here was the longest hardest fight of history. The cause of the fight was the rule of this party that a two thirds majority is necessary to nominate. Two men, M'Adoo and Smith each had a very determined partisan following, each could keep the other from the nomination, no one could be nominated without their support. New York was determined to nominate Smith if force could do it. Jamany, (Smith), men took possession of the Hall, howled, jeered, cajoled and fought for days for their man. And M'Adoo who had planned and worked for years, (no one in history has ever worked as Road—for the presidency,) refused to give up. Finally the delegates worn out and disgusted took both out of the race and nominated Davis. And in their mad haste to have it over with, nominated Chas. Bryan, brother of Wm. J. as Vice President. Davis, the outstanding cultured, scholarly bluestocking of the party, tied up with "Brother Charlie" Bryan, wild and wooly, uneducated butcher and cigar store keeper, in no way fitted for such a position except that he "comes from the west and is wild and wooly." It would be difficult to hunt through all the Democratic Party and find two people more unlike. Men roared with laughter when they heard of the astounding combination. A racehorse and a "Rocky Monntain Canary"* plowing together. The Democratic platform, as I have said, very carefully says nothing. No new idea, no progressive measure of any kind is suggested with sufficient clearness to tie the nominee to anything whatever after the election. Words, merely words. An impossible, a ridiculous nomination with a luke-warm, milk and water platform. The Democrats had every chance of winning the election, they threw it all away in their Convention.

But the money interests are satisfied with both platforms, all the nominees. All are for Big Business, all are reactionary.

Time for a New Party.

But there is a fly in the ointment. The old parties have grown rapidly together, they stand for the same things nowadays. The "Baltimore Sun" offered a prize for the best statement of the difference between the parties. The following won: "A Republican is a person who thinks a Democratic Administration bad for business; a Democrat is a person who thinks a Republican Administration bad for business; both are right." The time has come when a new party will be, must be born. Strangely in America we have been growing away from Labour Government while England has gone ahead. Common place progressive measures of Roosevelts time are howled down now as "Bolshevik." Babbit and Main Street, the Rotary, Lions and Elks swallow whole what is told them by those higher up. Few have any idea what a "Bolshevik" really is, they do little thinking themselves, they have money but money never thinks, money never has brains.

The thinking, progressive men have been forced out of both parties. Since Wilson's breakdown the reactionaries, very often very dishonest reactionaries, have been in power. To them the sad thing is that some have been caught, others "stand pat" for fear will be. Much is known that cannot be proven, the records are in the hands of friends. The Democratic party hnd a great chance. It used to be a party of protest, now at the time of greatest need of protest it becomes very tame. Roosevelt for a time stirred things up in the Republican Party, but he is dead and Republican Bosses see to it that no radical gets a hold in the party again. E.g. Coolidge-Dawes. Yet there are progressives in both parties. Borah is the most respected man in Washington, but, the Press, (owned in Wall Street) sees to it that he is not too well advertised. La Follette is a man that the Press fears so much that they make it a point to ridicule him and discount him at every turn. About as radical as Roosevelt he is painted as a wild anarchist, Bolshevik, or worse. And, our little city Main Street business man swallows whatever is rolled down to him by those "above" "on the inside" of Big Business, very much as the toad swallows the shot rolled down the board. His only hope is that when he dies they may tell the truth about him as they did about Algelt after he died. "News" is power and Big Business knows it and controls the Press in U.S.A. so that to-day it is almost impossible to get a fair report or honest estimate of any happening that has a bearing on the political or financial situation, and the big financial interests controll both parties now. The big business interests manafacture the public mind through the press, a condition the people are just beginning to understand.

So the progressives, utterly frozen out of the old parties, must start for themselves. Bryan is the only man nominated by either of the old parties who is not frankly conservative and with the trusts, and he is guaranteed safe. The Bryans are perfectly willing to stand gracefully on their heads if they can gain office thereby. Some wag has said that William J. would be an evolutionist if monkeys could vote. Clearly seeing this situation La Follette months ago worked out plans for running-independently. He says he is still a Republican. If Roosevelt was a Republican he makes the claim with more reason than Harding or Coolidge. He has chosen as his running mate a Democrat, Wheeler, the man who pushed the Oil Investigation, fighter, fearless and already proven above reproach for the Oil Gang got their friends in Congress to vote a Congressional investigation of him and they could find nothing they could even offer. They would have given millions to have been able to ruin him.

La Follette on Child Labour.

La Follette is, as I say, called a "Red." He is more conservative than Lloyd George or MacDonald. He has written a platform that is progressive and definite. For instance he is against child labour. The fight against this ammendment promises much bitter feeling. In the south they fight it with a cry of States Rights. Georgia voted it down almost unanimously on this basis, but showed her hypocrisy by refusing as a State to do any thing to better the condition of her great crowds of cotton mill children. Every one knows that La Follette and Wheeler will fight hard to carry out. The platform they run on.

What chances have they for election? They have tremendous forces against them. First it is almost impossible to get any fair report of them or their speeches or their programme. The Big Press will kill them off by misrepresentation, ridicule, garbled reports of speeches cut here and there as is advisable for their ends. People will be told that to elect them will bring horrible financial disaster, a panic.*

Another thing, the common labourer in America, the man who needs help, education, steady work, good food, is a very hard man to reach. He comes from every land under the sun and speaks every language and to teach him to help himself is very hard to do especially if his employer tells him that the support of a progressive man will close his shop.

On the other hand the old line parties have made a grand mess of things. Coolidge has not grown in favour the last few months. He has fought for Mellon and his group. He has kept cool, very cool, in the Oil Investigations. He has put all the ice on them he dared. Now he comes with Dawes with his Illinois Supreme Court record, that places him in a very bad light in the matter of common honesty, and a perfect phobia toward Labour Unions. Will the voters put up with these men? Not if the facts can be gotten through the Press to the voters. And Davis and Bryan? The Democratic party is all torn to pieces with its convention fight. Davis is very far from the type of man the Democrats usually follow and know. He would be far more at home with Mr. Taft, Mr. Hughes and Mr. Roots in the Republican party. And Bryan? "Brother Charlie" will take much confidence from the party in the East, will add very little to its hold in the West. He was put on the ticket solely to keep Willian Jennings from bolting for he had repeatedly expressed his dislike for Davis and his policies. With Brother Charlie the Vice Presidential Nominee William J. swallowed Davis, saying that his opposition was not to him personally but to his principles!! William J. often proves how simple minded he is, but I wonder, if he is as disgusted with Davis as Davis is with Brother Charlie!!

Any way it will be a new kind of campaign. There is yet time to turn the whole political world upside down. The whole Labour Orginization has come out for La Follette. Macdonald resigned in his favour. He has the Labour Press for him. La Follette and Wheeler can stand all the light that can be thrown upon them. They will gain with every bit of real study that is made of them or their record. It is quite otherwise with Dawes and Bryan and even Coolidge has much to explain in his "icing" of the investigations in Washington His frank alliance with Mellon and Wall Street became glaringly apparent in his very determined support of the Mellon Tax Bill and his effort to make Congress take it exactly as presented. Davis alone of the group seems to stand clean. He seems to be frankly just what he claims to be and as such should be respected. He has proven himself a very able man with great personal charm. He is a conservative at the head of the, supposedly, radical protesting party, a party torn with bitter strife, and is bitched with a man who makes the whole campaign seem ridiculous.

La Follette cannot win as things stand. Whether he can get funds and publicity in time to win by November is a grave question. That his strength has greatly increased and the hold of the old parties has greatly decreased and that this will probably continue gives the great interest the campaign is now developing. And, with both old parties held by the Trusts, he is a voice of protest, a voice for the child labourer, a voice for the common people who ride in Fords. The Old Party Candidates are riding in Packard Limousines this time.

A SCHOLAR'S LIFE UNDER THE REDS

Limited Privileges But Gradually Withdrawn: What Constitutes Being "Safe" Under Bolshevism: The Dread Cheka

The following article is a translation of portions of an account of his life in Petrograd under the Reds by a Russian man of letters. A good deal has had to be omitted as being dangerous expressions and opinions, which might have served to reveal his identity.

In the spring of 1918 scholars, as well as the representatives of other intellectual professions, struck their flag before the Bolsheviks. But the latter having other things to do, did not at once meddle with the academical life. Lunacharsky and other big wigs of the Public Instruction Department behaved more or less friendly towards the scholars who began to think Science might advance even under the new régime. The idea of a High School Reform consonant with the spirit of the times was at once put upon the carpet; since the new rulers were lacking a plan of their own, some scholars remembered their old hopes and projects. Thus the first reforms were introduced in perfect concord In the spring of 1918 universities were reorganized, an Academy of Material Culture was founded (formerly the Archæological Commission, the centre of archæological exploration of Russia, that had the control over all monuments, etc.), as well as a Museum Department, an Archives Dept. and so forth.

Some poignancy, I confess, was not wanting: academical degrees were abolished, the students were allowed a part in the administration, certain Law courses were struck off.

The Cheka As Usual.

The Cheka, not sufficiently imbued with Lunacharsky's humane views, was meanwhile executing several professors or starving them to death in prisons. Private mansions containing treasures of art—to be included in "The General State Stock"—were plundered; old monuments were destroyed and so on.

The scholars, having protested and abused the Bolsheviks (in the calm of their studies, of course) passed to the order of the day: they were organizing, reforming, putting affairs in the right way, abusing the Soviets again and so on.

Unfortunately the work went from bad to worse; more and more frequently had we to accompany the coffins of our colleagues to the church-yard. How many passed away in 1918-19!

One felt painfully in that choking atmosphere, personal safety being totally absent.

But the Soviet Government was growing stronger; people became accustomed to consider it as such. Some began to petition the Soviet authorities (by letters and personally) inducing them to improve the position of scholars, since a complete intellectual break-down of the country was to be feared. The Soviet government complied with and threw us something that we, being starved and tormented, were ready to consider as, not a bone , but a piece of greasy meat.

Fancy 4lb. of butter a month (we had not seen it for a whole year), four cakes of chocolate, 1½ lb. of bread daily, meat, groats, etc.

A "Scholars' Home" was established in the palace of the late Grand Duke Vladimir (that shall be inscribed in the biggest letters in the annals of Russian culture!). Scholars with their families rushed thither for the sake of earthly blessings unheard of.

The Scholar's Bone.

I doubt whether there were any other place attracting so highly cultured a society. But there were drawbacks too. We had to stand (more seldom to sit) in queues in dark, though beautiful corridors for many long hours once a week. We had to carry our rations home unassisted: some carried them on their shoulders, other on their boots, some on children's carts. (Those who had got them blessed their fate; since I had no babies, I made a hand-sledge of planks of a demolished house that I had been given for fuel). I was unable to construct a cart for the summer; so I had to carry the goods in my hands, stopping for rest almost at every step). Nobody seemed to heed these drawbacks: as time went on, people got more and more accustomed and skilled; even the scornful remarks of a "proletarian" at the sight of an overloaded "bourgeois" were not taken nótice of. Gorky and his bottle-companion, a M. Rodov (formerly the proprietor of an extra-fashionable night café, now manager of the "Scholars' Home"), the reputed authors of the "Home," were extolled.

One circumstance was, however, forgotten: while we were receiving our very satisfactory "academical" rations, the rest of the population (except the hangers-on of the Soviet authorities, of course) were starving.....

The compromise has been achieved, quite imperceptibly, our prestige has been lost (scornful jokes about "academical" butter, chocolate etc. were to be heard everywhere); now we have forfeited even the moral right of protest against any measures of the Soviet authorities.

Fed from Abroad.

Before long our sufferings being known abroad, international feeding, dressing etc. of Russian scholars was organized—by leave of the Soviet government—through the said "Scholars' Home." Norway was the first to supply us with cod-fish and herring, then came Finland, France, the United States etc. At that period we were receiving academical rations and, properly speaking, could get on without this help from abroad. At any rate the life of scholars has been saved; but did their scientific work go on better? Something was done, several scholars did, perhaps, much: it is difficult to form an opinion, the printing of papers being practically impossible. Scholars used to take their old papers from their desks, refashion them and adapt them in some way or other for the "State Publishing Office" ("Gosizdat") that paid a decent honorarium. The show-windows of bookshops in Moscow and Petrograd are filled with books by well-known scholars (beside political, chiefly Communist publications). Their exterior is smart, but the paper is very bad.

We enjoyed the blessings of an autonomy for a short time only. Reforms were introduced, not suggested by our people, but hatched amid the Communist Party (assisted by some professors who felt "red"). The Soviet authorities acted very cautiously: they were slowly proceeding to their aim—i.e., they wished the high school to become a means of instruction of officials in Communist principles.

Purging the Masses.

The mass of students had to be "purged," i.e., all undesirable elements were to be excluded, and old professors were to be replaced by new ones chosen among Communists.

The first aim was easily attained, since new students were admitted only on a special recommendation of the Party and Professional i.e., workmen's bodies; those already admitted were struck off the lists at periodical purges; the endless control of the so-called "Mandate Commissions" was introduced.

As only too few professors had joined the corps of "Red Professors," special (short-dated) preparatory courses were established, where only reliable persons were admitted. One by one these were appointed professors. The most undesirable of the old were discharged, chiefly under the pretext of age limit. These measures have been carried through since the summer of 1922, when the new "High School Statute" was introduced, which gave the control of the universities and high schools to those whom the Soviet Government could trust. (The Moscow schools attempted a protest, but were not encouraged by others). In the autumn of 1923 the high school was a melancholy sight.

Exiled.

Many professors (chiefly those of philosophy and history) had been discharged; a numerous group had been—owing to an absurd accusation—exiled or transported to various provincial towns (such transportation has now become a fashion). Of course, a group of red professors was appointed instead; one of them had taken his degree in the spring of the same year; in autumn he was already in charge of a chair.

The behaviour of the old professors ought to be noted: in private conversation they displayed a deep indignation, but at official meetings their conduct was quite different. I recollect such a meeting (one of the last attended by me): the official report of the discharge of a group of well-known scholars—by somebody's order—is met with a complete silence, no one putting a question about the reasons of such an extraordinary measure.—

The other day I received a letter from Petrograd saying that people were envious of me, as I had not been compelled to witness the devastation of the University. (The letter does not, of course, contain any details). It is evident, the Soviet authorities are obstinately pursuing their plan.

Other high schools and scientific institutes are nearly in the same condition. Thus the Archæological Society has been dissolved.

Privileges Cut Down.

In order to draw a full picture of a Russian scholar's life, I must add that after the introduction of the "New Economical Policy" ("Nep") the academical ration was little by little curtailed; it was abolished by order on October 1, 1923. The "Scholars' Home" has lost its former importance. The pecuniary remuneration has increased, but still not so as to cover the expenses; a scholar has to work in (or at least to figure in the lists of) several institutions. So I touched my salary at four institutions (at the highest normal rates, the priviliged ones being reserved for "responsible officers" belonging to the Communist Party); a member of my family was serving too, and still we were earning no more than Gold $100 a month. Though living very modestly we were unable to put money by.

These last years, however, I have not had to starve, but still, as you can see, the conditions of life are not attractive.

THE QUEEN CITY OF CANADA

The Beauties and Delights of Toronto

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Toronto has been well named, the Queen City, for she is unrivalled in diversities of qualities which appeal to all classes and conditions of men. She is beautiful, abounding in fine parks, streets avenued with trees, with hill, dale and deep ravines vieing with each other in picturesqueness. She is religious, with more churches, in proportion, than anywhere else, not only well attended with worshippers, but singularly well off in excellent preachers. She has amusements and recreations to suit every taste. She is the second industrial city in Canada; the first intellectually, resting in an excellent university comprising colleges of every department of art and sciences required by the professions. Twenty-three years ago my impressions of the city were such that I exclaimed, "Here is a city where I could wish to spend the evening of life." Toronto, since then, has increased her population three and a half times, the estimate for 1923 being 583,771. She has lost none of her former beauty, but has grown in every way, and the impression formed upon my first visit has now deepened, and my desire confirmed.

The latitude of Toronto is between 43 and 44 degrees north, on a parallel with Marseilles. Her area is over 32 square miles. From east to west she stretches for a distance of 10 miles, and from north to south the distance varies from 3 to7 miles. She has 439 miles of street, 14 miles of lanes, and 189 miles of street railways (single track mileage). Toronto is an Indian word and means "place of meeting" and in the 17th century the name was applied to the County of Huron between Lake Simcoe and Lake Huron. In 1787 the land upon which Toronto now stands was sold to the Crown for £1700 by the Missisanga Indians. In 1794 Governor Simcoe named the settlement "York" in honor of the Duke of York, second son of George the Third. In 1797 the first parliament of Upper Canada was held at York. It was afterwards nicknamed "Muddy York." The population then numbered 456. In 1813 Toronto was twice sacked by the Americans (U. S. A.). The town was captured by General Dearborne with over 2,000 men from the neighbouring states, and the Parliament buildings and other buildings were burned. In 1834 the city was incorporated by act of the provincial legislature with the name of Toronto. It then had a population of approximately 9,000.

Education. Toronto is the chief educational centre of Canada. There are 103 Public Schools providing primary education. In 1923 there were 70,865 registered pupils, besides 6,919 registered in the kindergarten branch. There are 8 Collegiate Institutes and 3 High Schools. The registered attendance in 1923 was 7,253. Then, in addition, there are Forest Schools, High School of Commerce, Normal School and Technical Schools.

The Central Technical School is one of the best on the continent. The building cost $1,400,000, the site about $300,000 and the equipment $300,000. The total enrolment of students in day and evening classes is over 8,900. The value of Public School property is $14,462,254 and Collegiate property $3,272,191. The University of Toronto embraces the faculty of Arts, Medicine, Applied Science and Engineering, Forestry and Music, and the department of House-hold Science, Social Service, Public Health, Nursing and University extension. There are four colleges and 11 affiliated institutions. In October 1923, 4,575 were enrolled. There are 23 different buildings housing the different departments of study in connexion with the University. In the Great War 5,761 members of the staff, graduates and students, enlisted for over seas; 615 were killed or died of wounds. In the month of June Convocation assemblies are held when the different degrees are conferred, and it is a sight to be remembered. This year no less than 450 women graduated, and the procession to the Hall was a wonderful display of floral beauty. Each of the women graduates, dressed in white with black gowns and cap, carried a large bouquet of roses. The day before, the Colonnade adjoining the beautiful Hart House tower in the University grounds was unveiled. In this colonnade the names of all who fell are engraved upon the walls, members of the University, 615 in all.

Churches. Toronto is the diocesan offices. The 11 chartered Catholic Archbishop and an English Bishop, and it is the Canadian centre of organization for the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. There are 336 churches as follows:—Anglican 64, Baptist 45, Congregational 4, Disciples of Christ 9, Hebrew 10, Lutheran 3, Methodist 68, Presbyterian 57, Roman Catholic 36, and 40 other denominations and 74 Missions.

Banks. Toronto abounds in Bank offices. The 11 chartered Banks have 249 offices. Most streets have at least one office, and the chief streets several. Each chartered bank is represented in the principal thoroughfares by 2, 3, 4 and even 5 offices. People are not prepared to travel far, and the banks vie with each other in providing convenient offices in all parts of the city. The savings bank department in each office is well to the front, and the total sums deposited aggregate to a large amount. If the Hongkong and Shanghai bank in Shanghai catered for the inhabitants in the same way, there would be at least 3 branches in Nanking and Bubbling Well Road, and other districts in Shanghai would be proportionately provided for; other Banks contributing their quota in proportion. The subscribed capital in the banks in Toronto equals $43,266,600. The bank clearings for 1923 show that Toronto for the first time holds the first place in the Dominion. The return for 1923 amounted to $5,591,568,205.

Manufactures. Toronto is the second industrial city in Canada. Montreal is first in production and capital invested, Toronto first in number of establishments. There are 1,000 factories, large and small where all the different commodities are made. Electric power is obtained from Niagara. There are over 200 American branch industries making light goods and a comparatively small number of industries making heavy goods. The following industries in Toronto are unique (in Canada): aluminium, bicycles, billiard tables, cash registers, imitation ledgers and kodaks.

Electric Power. Rates for electric power in Toronto are exceptionally low, and this is a predominent advantage to manufacturers. Power is supplied from Niagara Falls, 36 miles distant. House owners greatly benefit by the cheap rates and use it for all purposes.

Shopping. The large well-equipped departmental stores in the city are well worth a visit and are one of the features of life in Toronto. The principal one is that known as T. Eaton & Company, opened in 1869 by Timothy Eaton. It is said to be the best organized departmental store on the continent. It employs 21,000 hands in Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal, and other branches. There is a large factory where many of the goods are manufactured for the stores and Mail Order; an immense building, in addition, which confines its attention to mail orders. This establishment covers an area of 77 acres in Toronto and the east, including Hamilton, and over 43 acres in Winnipeg and the west. In December 1869 Timothy Eaton opened a little shop on Yonge St. 24-ft. by 60-ft. The windows were set with an assorted stock of staples, haberdashery and other goods. Timothy Eaton laid down the principal of cash only, and one price. It was a bold adventure indeed in those days of bartering and haggling over prices on a low credit footing, but results justified the faith of the founder. His maxim was "good satisfaction or money refunded." The present establishment, besides catering for every want of man, has a rest-room, with closely adjoining frolic park, a play ground for children, free parcel check-room, post office and information bureau, "lost and found" office, an adjusting office in each department, a grill room and cafeteria, telephones, elevators and escalators, and a deposit account. Another great store is that of the Robert Simpson & Company, opposite to Eaton's, and, daily, a constant throng of people are seen passing from one to the other. It would be difficult to compute the number of thousands of people passing through these buildings daily.

Parks and Play-Grounds. Parks and play grounds number 59 and cover a total area of 1,473 acres. In addition there are 5 water lots covering 300 acres. The largest parks are High Park, 336 acres, Exhibition Park, 235 acres, Island Park, 224 acres, Humber Boulevard, 129 acres and Riverdale Park nearly 109 acres. There are 33 well equipped play grounds, 52 base-ball fields, 8 cricket fields, 36 foot ball fields, 175 tennis courts, 14 bowling grounds, 2 quoiting grounds, 2 croquet fields, 3 lacrosse fields, 52 skating rinks, 49 hockey rinks, 2 toboggan slides, 12 miniature slides, 2 bathing stations, 2 curling rinks.

Libraries. Toronto is well equipped with public libraries. The most convenient one for readers and borrowers is centrally situated. The largest reading room is in the south of Toronto, but there are 14 branches in different parts of the city. The Reference Library has over 100,000 volumes; and contains also the John Ross Robertson Historical collection with 4,000 framed pictures illustrating early life in Canada.

There is a Boys' and Girls' Home, the only one in the Empire. In 1923 over 103,000 books were borrowed. In the building are held the famous Canadian History "Story Hours" attended by 46,200 boys and girls in 1923.

Hospitals. There are 10 hospitals besides the General—hospitals for children, consumptives, incurables, for isolation purposes, and one for veteran soldiers. The General Hospital was erected at a cost of three and one half millions, and has accommodation for 350 patients.

Transportation. Steamboats run regularly four times a day to Niagara, connecting there with the railway service for Buffalo and New York. The street car system has been publicly owned since September 1, 1921. Much of the track has been re-laid and extensions made, the whole now consisting of 222 miles. On an average day cars carry approximately 750,000 persons, the capital expended being $42,000,000. A single charge of seven cents is made for an individual trip, irrespective of distance, so that it is possible to travel the whole length of Toronto, about ten miles, for seven cents. A slight reduction is made for buying more than one ticket, namely, four for twenty-five cents, and a book of fifty for $3.00. The cars are so constructed that passengers enter by one door and before they can leave, by the exit at another door, must pass the conductor, before whom the passenger drops a ticket into his box and, if necessary, he supplies them with a transfer for use on another route. To insure safety to pedestrians, no motor car is allowed to pass a tram car at rest, an example worthy of veneration in all places where cars are used.

Principal Places of Interest. are the City Hall covering a space of 5½ acres and costing $2,500,000. The clock tower rises 300 feet above the street level. The clock base has a diameter of 20 feet, and the weight of the bells 7½ tons. A splendid panoramic view of Toronto is obtained from the top of the tower, and is easily reached by an elevator.

Government House. is pleasantly situated over the second ravine in Rosedale overlooking the Don Valley. The cost, including land, $1,174,659.

Parliament Buildings. are very handsome and imposing, and are situated in Queen's Park. They house Departmental offices and the Assembly chamber. The original cost was $1,282,679, but as the result of a fire in 1909 the west wing was destroyed and cost $659,000 to reconstruct. The north wing was subsequently built at a cost of $756,704. A red star at night in the upper window over the legislative chamber indicates that the House in in session.

Osgoode Hall. named after the first Chief Justice of Upper Canada (1792-1793) Hon. William Osgoode—is the headquarters of the Law Society of Canada and the Supreme Court of Ontario.

The Island. is one of Toronto's greatest resorts. In summer, ferries which run every quarter of an hour convey immense crowds to Hanlan's Point at the west end where there is a stadium with a seating capacity for 10,000 persons, and amusements of many kinds, not to mention public dancing. Multitudes are ferried to the centre of the island where beautiful grounds well shaded by trees afford plenty of room for picnic parties, baseball, cricket and tennis players. In the grounds, here and there, are wooden constructions which provide table and sitting accommodation for picnic parties.

Exhibition Grounds. This park contains 264 acres and extends for nearly a mile along the shores of Lake Ontario. An exhibition is held annually from the last Saturday in August to the second Saturday in September. It is estimated that it is attended by one and a half millions of persons, 200,000 of them coming from outside. Over 2,000 motors, arriving from the States, have brought their visitors to the exhibition in one day. There are over 80 buildings on the grounds, which, including land, are valued at $11,000,000. The grand stand has a seating capacity for 16,800 people, with standing room for 8,000 more on the sloping lawn. The coliseum can seat 10,000 and there the Royal winter fair is held.

Museums. The Royal Ontario Museum, situated in Bloor Street, in many respects is the most important in Canada In addition to the geological, archaeological, mineralogical and zoological specimens, North American Indian life is exhibited both in picture and models. Scenes from hunting and social life are shown in very realistic fashion. The collection of Chinese exhibits is the finest to be seen anywhere.

A smaller but very representative museum adjoins the Normal School building and exhibits some copies of the Old Masters, sculptures, engravings, pictures and relics of North American Indians.

Amusements. Few places of the size of Toronto are so well equipped with places of amusement. The Arena Gardens with a seating capacity of 6,700 and floor space 80 ft. by 200 ft., used in winter for ice skating and hockey matches. When used for concerts this space will seat 2,000 people. In addition there are a number of places for public dancing. Moving pictures are provided all over the city. Places are provided for badminton, boxing and wrestling, cycling, ice boating, motor boating, polo, racquets, snow shoeing, skiing and yachting. The Royal Canadian Yacht Club with its 2,037 is the largest fresh water club in the world. The fleet comprises over 100 yachts of all classes. A club house is situated on the island and has its own ferry service with two steel steamers running every half hour from the foot of Yonge St. At the end of the lagoon, the club operates the best marine railway and shipyard for yachts on the Great Lakes, with a large building shop for repairs. The Prince of Wales cup was presented by the late King Edward the 7th (when he was Prince of Wales). It has been raced for annually since 1861.

Clubs. There are 15 leading social clubs and 6 for women.

Music. Toronto is the musical centre of Canada. It is the home of two famous choirs which have won renown in Europe and America. Concerts frequently given in the winter months. Several of the finest orchestras on the American continent have assisted at these concerts.

Sunnyside. At the extreme west of Toronto a large tract of land has been reclaimed and has been made into a fine beach extending one and a half miles, known as Sunnyside Beach. There is a bathing pavilion with accommodation for 7,700 bathers at one time. There is a dancing pavilion for 400 couples, and numerous amusement devices and games. It is very largely patronised.

Life in Toronto can be most enjoyable for all classes and conditions of people. There are walks innumerable through charming dells, ravines and avenues and parks, and the authorities are to be commended for the exhaustive way in which they have provided for the enjoyment of the inhabitants of a city, which, we think, has no poor.

THE BOOK PAGE

NOTES AND NEWS

Mr. Austen Chamberlain is preparing a monograph upon public men and the manner in which they write their speeches. The paper is likely to embody personal recollections of a very interesting kind.

Mr. Thomas Hardy has just celebrated his 84th birthday. His only competitor for the title of the Grand Old Man of Letters is Sir George Trevelyan, who will be 86 this month.

Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith's next novel is to be called "The George and the Crown." It will be serialized in England and in the States before appearing in book form.

An American writer, Mr. Arthur D. Howden Smith, has, according to "Discovery," undertaken the bold task of re-writing "Treasure Island," and has actually adopted Stevenson's characters, plot and all. Stevensonians will agree that the wretched thing needed a little touching up.

There will be issued from the offices of the "Studio" in the autumn an édition de luxe dealing with "Old English Sporting Books." The letterpress is being written by Mr. Ralph Nevill.

Though his time is fully occupied as Professor of English Literature at Cambridge University, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch has found time to write a new novel, "Castle D'Or," which Collins are publishing.

At Sotheby's recently the MacGeorge perfectly preserved copy of the first issue, 1751, of Gray's "Elegy" brought its auction maximum, £1,550 (Maggs). Mr. Augustin Birrell once picked one up for half a crown, and a few weeks ago another copy of the original issue was unearthed in the Eton College Library, where mercifully repose Gray's original manuscript of the "Elegy" and of his "Ode to Eton."

In "The History of the Temple, London," which Mr. Murray is publishing immediately, Mr. J. Bruce Williamson has provided a really complete volume on a hitherto somewhat neglected subject. He traces not merely the legal history of the Temple, but incidentally records the history of the times and manners, beginning with the Order of the Knights of the Temple, to the close of the Stuart period. The history is compiled from original documents belonging to the two learned and honourable societies of the Temple, and is illustrated.

The discovery of some youthful verses by Milton was first reported in the "Times Literary Supplement" early in 1922, and details were given in various issue of "Notes and Queries." In "Some Newly-Discovered Stanzas by John Milton" (Nisbet, 7s. 6d.) Mr. Hugh C. H. Candy reprints the whole of his material, with full notes and an argument in proof of their authorship. It will be remembered that the stanzas, of which 166 survive out of 178, are written in a little book containing illustrations of Ovid's Metamorphoses, with explanatory quatrains in Latin and German. To these was added in manuscript a series of English stanzas, usually eight lines long in rhymed decasyllabled couplets. The language and the handwriting make it practically certain that Milton wrote them. They are of great interest as foreshadowing the Milton that was to be. Mr. Candy assigns them to 1623, when the poet was 15.

Professor Sarolea, who has recently revisited Russia, has better qualifications as a writer on Russian questions than the ordinary traveller. His book, "Impressions of Soviet Russia," while it expresses the arguments for the Soviet régime and makes certain admissions in favour of Bolshevism, is in the main an attack on the theory of Communism and a condemnation of the actions of the Bolshevist oligarchy, which the writer regards as a system as oppressive as the former autocracy. Perhaps the most interesting part of the book is the discussion of the Jewish question in Central and Eastern Europe.

WHISPERING LEAVES

Dare's Gift and Other Stories By Ellen Glasgow. Murray's Imperial Liberary.

Ellen Glasgow always writes well. To take up a book of hers is to be sure of entertainment and to be certain of freedom from annoyance. If that reads like faint praise, such is by no means intended. The best masters of the craft are very annoying at times, especially in the short story, which novelists seem to use to air some fancy or conviction not allowed to intrude in the longer form. Truth to tell, this author does not escape that criticism. She has her special fancies which she embodies in her short stories. In the majority of the tales in this book is a ghost, the corporal intrusion of a person who has died. It is not always convincing in the telling, in spite of the simple and sincere manner. But the reader forgives the unevenness of the stories and for the usual reason in such a book, that one of them is a little masterpiece to come upon which is worth reading a dozen inferior tales.

The gem is "Whispering Leaves," a story of a lonely, sensitive child who is left to be brought up by relatives who cannot understand him. When his "mammie" (darkie nurse) dies he does not realize it, keeps on seeing her and relying upon her as he has always done. This ghost of "mammie," the only remaining influence in the child's life, is also seen on several occasions by another relative who visits "Whispering Leaves," presumably through her sympathy with the lonely little life. The effect of this is told very realistically and convincingly. It is a charming tale.

THREE TALES

New Friends in Old Chester. By Margaret Deland. Murray's Imperial Library.

These are three tales of the 18-seventies of a village, or two villages, in Pennsylvania. The places, Old Chester and Mercer, would probably be called 'towns' in America, just as many a small settlement that would be called a hamlet in England rejoices in the title "city" in the new country. And the people take themselves much more seriously than do any city folk in England. Margaret Deland has taken them seriously, too. She has studied them so profoundly, indeed, that she makes them live for us, and we follow with deep interest and anxiety all the vicissitudes of their narrow lives. In story-telling these three tales are a veritable triumph. Had the author shown us something of the countryside we should have hailed her as a second Miss Mitford. But Margaret Deland is not interested in the country, only in the people. At all events she is not sufficiently interested in the country to tell us anything about it. At no point in the stories can the reader clearly visualize the place of the action, whether it be on the road or in the church or in a room of a house; that is to say he cannot visualize it from what the author tells of it. Her triumph is that, in spite of this, the reader must follow with an almost breathless interest every word and action of every character. It is as if we were watching and hearing an absorbing drama played on a stage with only a black velvet background (in the Gordon Craig manner) so that there should be nothing to distract the interest from the characters.

The craftsmanship, the construction is flawless. There is no attempt to mark a definite beginning or end. These tales are just sections cut out of lives of which we feel the movement of the origin and the future. At the same time they are rounded off with an economy and polish very rare and refreshing in these slipshod days.

Of the three stories it is difficult to say which is the best. Probably the majority of readers will choose the first one, "Eliot's Katie" and the reason given will be the simple one that it is the longest. It tells of one English workhouse girl who has emigrated to America as a servant. She has an illegitimate child for whose education she sacrifices everything of comfort and luxury. The child grows up a "lady" and despises her mother. The telling of the mother's final sacrifice of the truth she cherishes, to serve her dauhter's happiness, is done with a quiet restraint which is masterly.

The other two tales are equally well told and the book places Margaret Deland in the forefront of American story-tellers.

DRAMA ON THE DOWNS

"Patricia Ellen." By Mary Wiltshire. Messrs Mills & Boon.

This is a novel that is saved from oblivion, so far as reviewing is concerned, by the persistency of the reader to "carry on" with it, in view of certain marked characteristics that hint at the promise of better things. There is a wholly unnecessary prologue to chapters written by one with a love and understanding of the Wiltshire downs and country; but minus a sufficiently virile fair for writing to make it interesting. Then the book takes on a much improved tone, and before long one is completely enthralled with the history of Ellen Cooksey. From a harmless, pleasant little story it develops with psychological strength into a finely sustained study of the life of a worthy and capable woman battered by unhappiness and bulwarked against the sheer adversity of it by a fierce determination to give her child all that which its father had been denied in life until he met his wife.

"Patricia Ellen" opens as a homely, undistinguished love story of a gentle-minde artist, a genius, and a plain, buxom wife, commonsensed and efficient. She is the daughter of an innkeeper, an exsergeant major who met his wife "the maid and foster-sister of his Colonel's wife" in India. That description of the status and relationship of the mother of our heroine should have been enough to deter the most optimistic of novel readers. But the reviewer is, perforce, a pioneer, and in this instance was rewarded. Anyway, that sentence accounted for the aristocratic portion of the baptismal appellation of Timothy Haddendon's wife.

There is a fine description of the death of the artist from pneumonia in a lonely cottage that has been snow-bound for three days by a great storm. The frenzied yet persistent vigil of the terror-stricken, fighting wife, the approach of death, and the enforced company of her dead husband, not forgetting the crying child to whom no warmth can be got, for the fuel has finished, are all told in a memorable way. One could not easily forget that picture of the isolated country cottage to which no help could be got, and even for this description alone the book is worth reading.

"Patricia Ellen" was a poor title to choose, though not as poor as the insipid illustrated paper cover, but it is a book worth reading. It has character, and has escaped the commonplace.

"BLACK OXEN"

"Black Oxen," By Gertrude Atherton. John Murray, London.

Taking rejuvenation as her theme, Gertrude Atherton, in "Black Oxen," has written as powerful and as interesting a book as could well be made on the subject and she has treated it with artistic as well as scientific directness, and an appreciation of all its complex phases which marks her, once again, as a writer of distinction.

The story of Mary Ogden and of her return as a young girl to the country of her birth after an absence that was practically a lifetime, is told with vigour combined with a fine restraint. In her exceedingly original treatment of her theme the author shows the irony of regained youth being denied the passion and abandon of youth; of a mature brain in a young head; of an apparently immature girl endowed with worldly wisdom and political and social strategy and experience; of a beauty that draws upon itself only the hared and envy of those who once were old and trusted friends. These are the women. All these phases are dealt with in a most unexpected and interesting fashion. They composed the secret of rejuvenation which Mary Ogden had to discover for herself after she had undergone the scientific treatment that restored her aged body to the spring of youth. She had not anticipated, or, perhaps had not thought of it, which is more likely, that rejuvenation of body did not bring with it rejuvenation of mind and brain and heart, so freeing them of their load of memory, erudition, past regrets and vain ambitions, giving in return the impulse of happy, careless youth. That was the tragedy of Mary Odgen, Countess Zattiany.

With her finger on the pulse of every whim and fancy, thought and deed of her characters, and there are many and every one interesting, Gertrude Atherton has evolved a series of studies as clear cut as a glacier. And as fine and as hard and as scintillating. What these characters succeed in doing, or endeavour to do on "restored youth superimposed upon exhaustive knowledge," is at once traditional of a certain type of humanity, and symbolical of all human nature's fear of knowledge that deals with things beyond the average ken.

CHINESE CARPETS

Chinese Carpets and Rugs. By Adolf Hackmack; translation by Miss L. Arnold. (The French Library, Tientsin).

Although Chinese carpets and rugs are now exported to nearly every part of the world and are so greatly admired, the inner meaning of the colours and designs and symbols of those of native pattern are but little understood by the general public. This book is a by no means unsuccessful attempt to give briefly, in clear and concise language, information concerning Chinese carpets and their manufacture, without encumbering the work with historical and technical facts. The development of carpet weaving from the earliest times is briefly traced in an interesting manner; the subject of the colours of Chinese carpets is dealt with clearly and in an instructive and informative style; carpet designs are discussed in a way the layman can understand, and the operation of weaving the carpet is described admirably. Profusely illustrated, produced on the best art paper with an unassuming yet attractive cover, this book should make a wide appeal to those to whom the Chinese carpet is more than a meaningless household convenience.

THRILLS AT EPSOM

Another Good Racing Story

Trainer and Temptress: By H. S. ("Atty") Persse and A. J. Russell. Publishers, Messrs. Mills and Boon, London.

The Shanghai racing season is still a month or so away but for enthusiasts who are weary awaiting the first saddling bell the London publishers have come along just at the right time with this story of the Epsom Derby. As might be expected from an author-owner and trainer, the book rings true throughout and if the harsh critic might suggest that certain incidents are very highly coloured there is always the retort, truer probably on the Turf than in any other walk of life, that truth is stranger than fiction. But apart from the thrilling, spicy chapters of "Trainer and Temptress" there is much in the book that will make a very strong appeal to all lovers of racing. There are pages descriptive of the training work on the Downs, of the rivalry between different stables, of the loyalty of employes to their charges, and of the wonderful scenery of the centre of English racing.

The racing story is one which invariably finds a huge circulation—the success of Nat Gould proved this beyond question; and the authors in this instance should be similarly well rewarded. For they have produced a book which is well worth reading. One wonders, though, what would have happened had the authors collaborated in a volume of true stories of English racing such as only men with the "inside" knowledge possessed by owners, trainers, etc., could give us. Even in our own small circle in Shanghai here, a few of our owner-jockeys could probably give us books of reminiscences which would startle not a few. There is, of course, in "Trainer and Temptress" the usual attempts to nobble the Derby candidate—no less than a couple of thousand honest Bradburys passing hands in this connexion! But the gem of the book, for the betting public, lies in the following:—

"Came Saturday—Settling day. Peter nibbled his pen and examined his pass book £5,040 in the bank—£5,000 due to Harry Saunders. 'And I've spent half my life advising people not to back horses,' he groaned.

"There were some mugs on Epsom Downs on Derby Day, he thought, as he wrote out the cheque. 'And the biggest of these was Peter Todd, the mug who trained the winner and didn't back it, also the second and put his all on to win."

We all know the moral.

WHEN KNIGHTS WERE BOLD

"Chance—and the Woman." By Ellis Middleton. Publishers, Messrs. Mills & Boon, London.

This is another story of the days when knights were bold, masked highway robbers a-plenty, fair damsels frequently in distress, and elopements or abductions all in the evening's sport. The author has previously set many mouths watering with his "Road to Destiny" and in his latest book he more than sustains the promise of his earlier work. "Chance—and the Woman" is a tale of the North country or, at least, of the doings of a number of London "bucks" in a North country vale in which there happens to be residing a couple of the season's beauties. Stephen Burgoyne—friend of princes, dukes and earls—but himself plain Mr. Burgoyne—is the hero of the book and a vastly entertaining gentleman he proves too. But for joyous entertainment the reader may be commended to the early chapter in which Lord Alverford and Bill the Tinker are so prominent and from which the 'ardware dealer emerges so successfully, to appear later on in the pages of the book in an equally happy rôle. For those who delight in tales of its kind "Chance—and the Woman" will be found to be one of the best and as there have been many such this is paying the book a compliment.

PRETTY POLLY

"Matrimony Place," By Sophie Cole. Publishers, Messrs. Mills & Boon, London.

Sophie Cole has written many novels which have secured for her a very wide circle of admirers. Her latest venture, "Matrimony Place," will not only strengthen the admiration of that circle of admirers but should considerably widen it. For in this book she has given us a charming tale of simple, every day people going about their work and their pleasures in a normal manner and in this respect, at least, differs vastly from the "up-to-date" novel which we are unfortunately becoming so familiar with. It is a great pity that more writers do not follow the authoress of "Matrimony place" for light reading of this kind would certainly help towards a return to the "normalcy" which the nations of to-day are crying for. "Matrimony Place" is the story of Polly Stokes, a country girl who, orphaned in her teens, is taken care of by a London relative and in the great city finds all her keenly anticipated delights interspersed with the usual quota of trials and tribulations. Not the least well-drawn portrait of the story is that of Mrs. Drayton, a lady who with her flat, motor-cars, beautiful clothes, etc., is—somewhat unconventional. "Matrimony Place" will fill in an idle evening very noicely.

"Tales from Turkistan," by Ste Lob. (Blackwood. 6s.) consists of a series of true stories of a region hardly known to English readers. They have an atmospheric quality which is quite distinctive; they are not altogether easy reading, being almost entirely lacking in dialogue and inevitably bristling with words and proper names of a jaw-breaking unfamiliarity. Once conquered, they have a humour and an actuality well beyond most stories of adventure. There is a cheerful brutality about the methods adopted towards dangerous enemies that is the very converse of the growing sentimentality of this age. It is the difference between the man on the spot, with his life and his friend's life, and perhaps his women's lives in deadly danger, and the critic at home in the armchair. "Schooner and Soviet," we believe, has appeared in print before. One or two of the stories take us to the French "front" at its most ghastly stage.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

ALOHA WANDERWELL, INTREPID MOTORIST

The First Girl to Drive a Car Across Asia

By Elizabeth Pepys.

I have wandered far and wide,
I don't want to put on side;
But I'm bound to hold my head a trifle high,
For I'll bet no other car
Ever travelled half as far,
Or heard quite so many languages as I.

"The Song of Wanderwell II."

"Are you having the time of your life?" was asked of the seventeen-year old girl who is motoring round the world in the Wanderwell endurance contest.

"Well," was the slow reply, judicially delivered, "of course it is all immensely interesting. But it isn't always exactly comfortable, except when we are in towns. Many's the time in the blazing sun that I've thought I couldn't keep my hands on the wheel to steer the car another minute. But I'll be sorry when our trip ends. We expect to get back to the States in the Spring, but we'll keep on going till we hit the next world's exposition.

"When I joined the expedition," went on Miss Wanderwell, shaking her curly head sagely, "I was only 15 and hardly knew one end of a car from the other. As it is I have most of the mechanics to my brother, though I'm pretty good about locating trouble. That's why we have two cars so that one can tow the other. Once we both had to be towed by camels, however. Yes, my brother and I have been alone since Aden. Our two mechanics couldn't tackle India, and our last secretary was married before that, so in the picture you see one of our secretaries, an ex-mechanic, my brother and myself.

"We hope to make most of the distance to Peking in our cars. Bandits? I don't believe they'd trouble with us. My brother's crew was captured by Pancho Villa in Mexico in 1919, but when he could see that there was nothing to take, he turned round and fitted them out with gasolene and water. When we were on the Libian desert we camped for the night on an oasis, against the advice of those familiar with the country, who said we might expect to be attacked. It was the only oasis any where round, however, so we made ourselves at home there as usual, drew up the two motors parallel with each other, stretched a canvas over the top, then the boys slept beneath the cars, the secretary inside one car and myself in another. The mosquitoes kept me awake but they didn't have the same effect on the Polish mechanic who was supposed to be on guard. When I realized that three Beduins were almost in the camp I tried to tell him, but couldn't wake him or any of the others without letting the Beduins hear as well. Consequently I had to wait for what seemed ages, till the intruders wakened one of the boys. He sprang up, clicking his revolver, the rest followed suit, and as we were seven in the party just then, we were something of a formidable crowd to attack. The secretary spoke to them in Arabic and managed to explain our mission so that we soon got on friendly terms. They got us some dates and we gave them some chocolate. But, O, I was frightened for a moment."

FUTURE CHINESE CINEMA STARS

How Shanghai Valentinos and Pickfords are being Trained

By Elizabeth Pepys.

"I want emotion. Give me anguish. Yes, physical suffering. Now mental agony. Yes. Don't forget the camera. Cut!"

Was a tragedy occurring at 14 Jukiang Road? Should one rush in to prevent disaster, or hurry away to inform the police? Neither. The inscription on the door explained all. "The American-Oriental School of Acting," under the direction of Naomi Bailey was instructing Chinese young men and women in the technique of acting, and this was the drill in facial expression. In a large room on the first floor lined with pictures of cinema favorites, perhaps a dozen Chinese men and four or five girls were seated, watching with keen interest each in turn they were chosen to express different emotional experience. The new feeling selected for registry during this lesson was anguish. The director, Miss Bailey, explained briefly the connotation of anguish, and this was interpreted by the class. The first boy gave his representation of physical pain. "Good," pronounced Miss Bailey, "good for a slight scratch. Now show that you are in genuine pain, that you can hardly endure it." The boy grimaced, but not convincingly. "This way," said the director, and in an instant her mobile face was wracked with an agony so real that the on-lookers winced in sympathy, and one at least was reminded of Emily Dickenson's quaint quartrain:

"I like a look of agony
Because I know it's so.
One does not feign convulsions
Or simulate a throe."

Once having seen the effect which should be produced, the amateurs are fairly successful in reproducing it. It is manifestly more difficult for the Chinese to drop their carefully assumed mask of suave indifference and allow feeling to become articulate than for the more emotive Westerners. These students, however, are in earnest and again and again they struggle to gain the physical expression of a psychic state until they have managed to achieve some sort of harmony between thought and action.

Gulf-like differences between the various students in their facility of representation are discerned even by the casual visitor. Many already show an ease gained from training, others are even beginning to originate action for themselves. "Do you have any pupils you can't train?" I inquired.

"After I feel that I have had opportunity to gauge a pupil I am very frank with him," replied Miss Bailey. "I have had to tell some that while this study might be of personal benefit to them, they could probably not expect professional success in the cinema. Others, I'm assured, have great futures ahead of them. Yes, we are already receiving requests from local companies for actors trained here. I'm confident that China will be a tremendous field for screen work."

After a review of facial expression previously studied, surprise, astonishment, curiosity, disdain, hopelessness, and the like, various scenes from a typical drama were presented in pantomime, no costumes or "props" being used. The outline of the scene is given in manuscript to the students, is explained in English by Miss Bailey and passed on through an interpreter. Then the different pupils go through with the action, different groups repeating until all have had an opportunity to express their conceptions of the scene. The director watches keenly, suggesting changes, illustrating gestures, reminding the amateurs of the camera's position, even taking part in a wrestling match to demonstrate how it should be done.

"Are your pupils from the student or the business classes?" I asked.

"Both" came the reply. "The girls are mostly at home, some of the men are in business and come here after hours, others are devoting themselves entirely to dramatic work. The man who has been watching from that corner is a director in a local cinema concern, sizing up the material here. This other is a writer and teller of tales. Some of the group have been here some time, others are absolute novices.

"Yes, they have dancing. I consider that absolutely essential for expression of emotion as well as for grace of movement. I have a number of private pupils, foreign and Chinese who are studying for the so-called legitimate stage as well as for the moving pictures. Voices culture is extremely important and I enjoy that side of the work immensely. Yes, I would make special classes for small groups who wish to study some particular branch of dramatic art, Shakespeare readings, aesthetic dancing or the like."

As the class was over, we turned to go, followed by the interpreter's appeal to the pupils: "Please leave your 'Facial Expressions' at the desk."

Shanghai Mother Goose

Rescuing the Moon

Hi-diddle, delight, in the middle of night
The dragon swallowed the moon;
The populace banged with all its might
And the dragon disgorged it soon.

Sulky Sue.

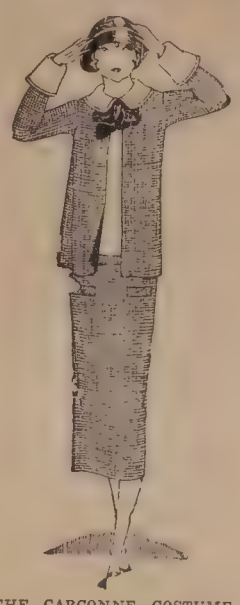
Here's the Rain-God won't give us rain.
We've held processions again and again,
We've painted his face and threatened him too,
Now what under heaven can our farmers do?
We'll treat him like the real Sulky Sue
And refuse to burn incense until he comes to.

—Elizabeth Pepys.

THE PERFECT OUTLAW LADY

We suppose that the male sex which is the childish, artistic, credulous, romantic sex, will always cling desperately to the illusion that there exists somewhere the Perfect Outlaw Lady—a creature who is at one and the same time and in one and the same person sweet as an angel, tough as anything, beautiful as Helen, harmless as a dove, dangerous as a wild cat, refined as Mme. Recamier, athletic as Hercules, companionable as Falstaff, spiritual as Aurora Leigh, exactly as chaste as her man happens to be feeling himself at any given moment, witty as Voltaire, gullible as Simple Simon, and a darned good cook. If she is religious so much the better; she will be respected for it.

Men may not always want to marry her, they always want her to want to marry them; and they are always ready to feel sorry about her broken heart when they tell her she can't. Not being able to secure all these attributes in one person is perhaps what leads so many men into polygamy.



THE GARCONNE COSTUME

NEW SUMMER RESORT

The Season's Discomforts Minimized

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Bettina, my little Crumb of Bread:

I do so hope that you are having a marvellous summer at Peitaiho, that the typhoons have not been roof-lifting this summer and that no popular epidemic is running its course among the holidayers!

There, the raven shall croak no more. But haven't you noticed that when, after much agony of decision, you are finally committed to one watering place, all the others seem a bit undesirable, not to say sinister? Such is human nature. Even while I express my best wishes I cannot but believe that you would be happier where we are. But I have pledged my word to the management not to divulge the secret of our resort, for it is only tiny and if I should weakly yield and whisper its location in your ear you must promise to guard the secret as you would the latest find in tailors.

We all of us have some special luxury from which we can hardly bear to be separated for the holidays. Mine is a reading lamp. Reading in bed is to me what yachting trips are to some, chocolate creams to others, mint-juleps to still more, or movies to a real cinema fan. Give me the latest novel to read in bed and I can forget that the baby appears to be coming down with measles, that John doesn't like my expensive new hat, that the cook has asked for an assistant and that I lost heavily at mah-jongg. Consequently, when I realized that I had a reading lamp, placed exactly at the proper angle, I felt sure that the summer was going to be a success.

Sine Qua Nons.

Thank heaven, the golf links are fairly satisfactory to John. Of course there could be improvements, but I hardly think that we shall have their short-comings dinned into our ears three times a day the way we did last year. The links can make or mar a holiday, can't they? There is plenty of tennis to play, too, and the other boarders are not all stars or dubs, I'm relieved to say.

I asked Junior what he liked best about the summer, and he promptly plumped for ice-cream. Positively that child is a regular American in his avidity for frozen goodies, and the nursery seems to thrive on them. Yes, my dear, foreign ice, and plenty of it for the long colds. After this you'll not be surprised to hear that we have electricity, and a reasonable supply of fans. John gave me an extra one, small size, for my very own, and I attribute my improved disposition to the fact that I can almost always be comfortably cool.

The Social Round

There is a dance every Saturday night and somehow or other there seem to be enough men to go round. Honest. To them that have shall be given, specially in the matter of masculines, for you know how it is—the fewer men there are at a resort, the harder it is to get those few out.

Mosquitoes? Yes, a-plenty. This is not heaven, I'm describing, just an ordinary house; but thank goodness, it's screened. O, I've given it away at last. We have found the ideal summer resort in our own home in Shanghai.

Contentedly yours,

Nan.

DRESSES THAT DANCE

Points of Importance for Evening Gowns

By Elizabeth Pepys.

"I fear nothing I can face" one handsome woman used to say, with well merited assurance. Most of us would do well to make sure that what people say behind our backs must be flattering, and this is never truer than in the case of dance frocks. It is the back view which is visible in the dance and the critical sitters-out will pass judgment almost entirely upon the rear of a gown.

Wisdom's part, therefore, is to introduce some sort of floating movement, and the gowns of the moment are particularly adapted to soften the contours of figures which the dance often reveals unflatteringly. A train from the shoulder, a floating scarf, a sleeve that swirls out with the suggestion of the old "angel-wing" all give that swinging, buoyant effect which adds so much to grace of movement.

Another device which adds to the airy lightness of the artistic evening gown is the uneven hem. Panels, draperies, trains and irregular transparencies of chiffon make for the unexpected, which always pleases the eye. The decolletage is ordinarily lower in back than in front and the only restriction seems to be that it should be cut high enough to give your partner some place to put his hand.

Shaded chiffon is used in a number of the summer dance frocks, and a Paquin model with circular panels, so many that the skirt seems hardly more than a collection of strips is especially delightful. Another inspiration is many-layered white tulle over flesh coloured satin, trimmed with fan-like handkerchief movements flying out softly from shoulder and waist, with a narrow suggestion of a girdle from which dangles a spray of long stemmed roses. Layer over layer of black chiffon, strikingly beaded in white, with long shoulder wings is another happy thought. The main thing to remember is to avoid any suggestion of tightness or strain. The fulness in the skirts is cleverly concealed, although it sometimes overflows into flounces and flares.

BULLFINCHES

Bullfinches have caps like sloes;
Bullfinches have vests like poppies;
You may see them, best of shows,
Haunting in our coppice.

Bullfinches have hoods of grey,
Belts of white to please you, flipping
Silver through the darkest day,
Up then down a-dipping.

Bullfinches make little tunes.
Soft and gay and unassuming,
All on April afternoons
Of the blackthorn blooming.

Bullfinches of blackthorn's snow,
Berried bough or summer coppice,
You may see them row on row
Where the fancier's shop is—

See the vests of poppy brave
Beat on wire in wooden inches.
Isn't he the hateful knave
Who would sell bullfinches?

IMMINENT PROSPECT OF WAR BETWEEN KIANGSU AND CHEKIANG

CHI HSIEH-YUAN OF NANKING MOVING LARGE NUMBERS OF TROOPS BY RAIL AND WATER TO SOOCHOW AND QUINSAN

POSSESSION OF KIANGNAN ARSENAL AND SHANHAI DISTRICT THE PRINCIPAL OBJECTIVE

Wu Pei-fu's Plan to Unify China

Peace Conference Do Nothing: Unification Only to be Achieved by Force According to Nanking Tuchun

LU YUNG-HSIANG OF HANGCHOW SAID TO BE WELL PREPARED WITH MONEY AND MAN

The prospects of warfare between Chêkiang and Kiangsu appear very grave, indeed one may feel that fighting is inevitable.

Chêkiang, governed by Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, is the last Anfu-stronghold in Central and North-China.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu controls all other provinces north of the Two Kuangs and Yunnan. Control of Chêkiang would complete his dominion and enable him to make a grand onslaught on Dr. Sun.

An important item in the struggle is the posession of Shanghai District and the arsenal geographically in Kiangsu actually controlled by Chêkiang. According to Marshal Chi, in an interview given to our special correspondent, Shanghai is a perpetual cause of friction and disruption in China.

Large bodies of troops have been moved from Nanking by rail and river to Soochow and Quinsan. The objective appears to be Shanghai.

Marshal Lu of Chêkiang is said to be well prepared with plenty of men and money.

To show the development of events we have preserved the order day by day.

MONDAY.

NANKING TUCHUN ON WAR SCARE

Marshal Chi Clears the Air

Following Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang's explanation as to the presence of the defeated Fukien troops in his province and his reaffirmation of peaceful intentions, Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan now comes forward with two telegraphic statements (published in the Chinese press) in which he assures the Kiangsu gentry of his desire to avoid hostilities. In the course of his second telegram the Nanking Tuchun significantly states that "any untoward incident (in view of the proximity of Kiangsu and Chêkiang) would make it impossible to secure my territory and safeguard my people. Therefore, if I have taken precautionary measures, I can show good reasons."

The text of the two telegrams, which were in reply to a communication from members of the Kiangsu gentry, is as follows:—

"Your telegram of the 19th respectfully noted. Your concern in the political situation and your solicitude for the welfare of your native province arouse my utmost admiration. The troops under my control all remain at their original stations, and there has been no military movement here at all. During this time of unrest, many unfounded rumours are current, but none should be given credence. Chi Hsieh-yuan as a governor of a province regards it as his primary duty to preserve peace, and he has not changed his mind from first to last. Regarding the other points you have touched, it is for such a blunt man as Chi Hsieh-yuan to dare to discuss and express an opinion.

Sgd. CHI HSIEH-YUAN,
August 20.

Chekiang's Breach of Faith.

"Referring to your telegram of the 19th, the Peace Pact between Kiangsu and Chêkiang has been and is being observed by this province. Since the entry of Tsang and Yang into Chêkiang, rumours from all quarters have been rampant. I find that Article 3 of the Peace Pact stipulates that in the event of any outside troops invading any of the two provinces or passing through any of them, the authorities of the province concerned shall deem it their duty to prevent or stop them from doing so. Now, Chêkiang has not only failed to prevent or stop them, but has even admitted them. Whether Chêkiang has observed or disregarded the Peace Pact, public opinion will be our arbiter. The reason why I have remained silent is because any interpellation from me might cause alarm to the people. As I have repeatedly declared before, my object shall always be to give my territory security and the people peace. In view of the proximity of Kiangsu and Chêkiang to each other, any untoward incident would make it impossible for me to secure my territory and safeguard my people. Therefore, if I have taken precautionary measures, I can show good reasons. In short, if Chêkiang does not attack Kiangsu, Kiangsu will not attack Chêkiang. This is my sentiment which will never be changed. Your appeal for peace on behalf of the public is a noble act that should rouse the gratitude of all. Kindly convey my reply to the public so that people may feel reassured.

Sgd. CHI HSIEH-YUAN,
August 21.

RUMOURS SHIPS COMING TO WOOSUNG

Foochow, Aug. 23.

The rumour of the departure of the gunboats for Shanghai is without foundation.

There is a crisis between the former Tuli, General Sun Chuan-fang, and the present Tuchun, General Chou Yin-jen. There have been great movements of troops on both sides, but there is no indication of their leaving for other frontiers. A local conflict is expected at any moment.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SUN PAO-CHI COMING AS PEACEMAKER

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 25.

Mr. Sun Pao-chi left Peking today for Shanghai.

The former Premier, who is a native of Chêkiang, will try to smooth over the present difficulties between Kiangsu and Chêkiang. With this object in view, he may call at Nanking.

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS FROM NANKING

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Aug. 25.

There has been a steady movement of troops out of the city for the past 24 hours. This morning at least 4,000 soldiers, with baggage, provisions and guns, started for Soochow, travelling in large boats pulled by launches. Other soldiers are moving towards the Anhui border. There is no movement of troops so far by the Shanghai-Nanking Railway.

The people are nervous and apprehensive, but business is going on as usual. The Government schools are still planning to open on time.

VIEWS OF ANFU PARTY

The supporters of General Lu Yung-hsiang in Shanghai admit that if Wu Pei-fu supports Chi Hsieh-yuan whole-heartedly the latter might win the local war but would be in danger of becoming subservient to Wu Pei-fu in Chihli Party councils. If Chi undertakes to fight Lu Yung-hsiang without Wu Pei-fu's support, they insist that Lu will have a victory. They claim for Lu 40,000 troops and sufficient funds to carry on the war. They admit that Chi Hsieh-yuen has the advantage of not being required to move out of his own province to battle, but they assert that not all of Chi's generals are loyal to him. Stories of treachery, however, are reported from both camps.

Chang Tso-lin's Interest

Perhaps a more serious phase of the situation arises from the activity locally of the old Anfu Party. This party is now supporting Lu Yung-hsiang as the last of the Anfu tuchuns. They argue that the time is now ripe for the final battle between Mukden and Loyang. If Chi Hsieh-yuan should win a victory over Chêkiang, it would mean that Chang Tso-lin would step into the arena in opposition to the mastery of the whole of China by the Chihli Party under the leadership of Wu Pei-fu. Chang Tso-lin is plentifully supplied with funds, large sums of which are said to be on deposit in Shanghai to be used as may be necessary in this war.

WEDNESDAY.

With no desire to cause unnecessary anxiety, with particular remembrance of the many occasions on which war has appeared inevitable, only to fizzle out at the last moment, it cannot be denied that the situation as between Kiangsu and Chêkiang is grave.

As already stated in these columns, the escape of the two Fukienese generals, Tsang and Yang, into Chêkiang is a mere pretext. The real issue is whether Marshal Wu Pei-fu decides that the time has come to attempt to drive out Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang, the last big Anfu chieftain in Central and North China. If Marshal Wu Pei-fu could do this, he would control all West, Central and North China and would be favourably placed for a grand attack on Dr. Sun Yat-sen, believed to be a long-cherished design of his.

It this plan is put into execution with success, it must, to all appearance, bring in Marshal Chang Tso-lin to attack Wu Pei-fu, his great enemy.

An important but subordinate part of the issue is the possession of the Kiangnan Arsenal, Shanghai district and Woosung, geographically Kiangsu's, actually controlled by Chêkiang, and obviously a most valuable prize.

PRES. TSAO FOR PEACE

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 25.

President Tsao Kun is working energetically to prevent war between Chêkiang and Kiangsu, but it is said that his emissary at Loyang has been given the cold shoulder.

Peking, Aug. 26.

Censorship has been instituted. It is feared that war very probably will break out between the Chihli Party and Chêkiang shortly.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WUSIH AND SOOCHOW MUCH DISTURBED

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wusih, Aug. 26.

The city is much upset by the rumours of war and many wealthy families are removing to Shanghai.

No fighting is expected nearer than Nyishing, but the people fear that, in the event of fighting there, should Chêkiang prove victorious, the troops will come on to Wusih to loot. All steam launches and small boats are being pressed into service for transporting troops.

It is expected that fighting at Nyishing will begin this week.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Soochow, Aug. 25.

Soochow is full of the wildest rumours. But as usual these rumours must be taken with even more than a grain of salt. It seems a fact that quite a number of wealthy people are leaving town to-day—perhaps for Shanghai. There is an unusual stir in the two large camps. Some soldiers yesterday told me that they expected to all be ordered out within three days. But where, they did not know. All of the launch lines fear that the launches are to be commandeered for troop transportation. All the pawnshops in town closed their doors this morning. It is pitiful to see a whole city living in such a state of nervousness, fearing even their own shadow.

A SERIOUS SITUATION AT NANKING

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Aug. 26
(11.50 p.m.)

A heavy exodus of troops and supplies continues, but the streets otherwise are deserted. Only a very small business is being done on account of the merciless conscription of labourers by the military commanders. Leading officials to-day regard the position as being very serious.

BRITISH AND OTHER LAUNCHES SEIZED

News received from Soochow on Tuesday states that one of the Asiatic Petroleum Co.'s launches flying the British flag has been commandeered by the troops.

Mr. L. F. Jovino, general manager in Shanghai of the Yangtsze Inland Steam Navigation Co., informs us that he received news on Tuesday, by letter from Chinkiang, that 13 of the Company's passenger launches and boats had been commandeered by Generals Ma, Huang and Yang for the transportation of Chinese troops, and that coal had been commandeered from the Company's depots. The Yangtsze Inland Navigation Co. is registered at the Italian Consulate-General here and its vessels fly the Italian flag. The Company has been in existence for 10 years and is engaged in the business of carrying passengers by steam launches and towboats from treaty ports to inland towns on river tributaries.

Later information received by Mr. Jovino is to the effect that the steam-launches Heng-lung, Hung-chi, Hung-li and Chiang-li were commandeered by Gen. Ma at Tsing-kiangpu. The Kiang-li was to have left Tsingkiangpu on Monday and tickets had already been sold, but the passengers could not remain on board the vessel owing to the threatening attitude of the soldiers. The local agents were powerless to interfere. The launches Heng-te and Heng-an were commandeered by Gen. Huang at Yangchow, the Heng-yue and Chunan by the ship-ping Bureau at Nanking, the Heng-foo by Gen. Ma at Wuhu, and the Heng-yue, Zung-lee, Keng-kwan and Heng-ching by Gen. Yang at Chinkiang.

It is said that all of these boats are being used to carry soldiers to Kiangyih, Nyishing, Liyang and Hsiaoho.

Launches belonging to other Companies received similar treatment, with the exception of those of the Tai Sung Chong Co., a Japanese firm.

Siccawei Observatory reports that it has received no telegrams from the Yangtze Valley since Monday.

EFFECT ON BUSINESS IN SHANGHAI

Business in Shanghai has in all, or most, departments been so dull for some time now that the "war rumours" cannot be described as having any great unsettling effect. The dollar exchange shows a steady rising tendency, and this should continue in view of the extra demand for the payment of troops. In ordinary times, these payments always have been precarious, but with serious work, or a pretence at it, in view, it is up to the rival commanders to see that the soldier is promptly paid, the dollar always having been an important element in Chinese warfare. Hence the heavier demand for dollars, and the rising rate.

As in general business, so on the Stock Exchange, the war scare has had little or no effect on an already moribund market. The misfortunes of the June settlement put a check on gambling and the market toned down very considerably. At the moment, the business doing is only on a small scale, and chiefly in debentures. But this slackness is not unusual at this holiday season and the uncertainties of the political situation are not entirely the cause of the lull in affairs.

FROM THE CHINESE PRESS

(No responsibility is taken for the accuracy of the following.)

The Arsenal is working overtime. On Monday 50,000 rounds of 7.9 quick-firing ammunition and 4,000 rounds of shrapnel were despatched to Kashing.

The Chinese newspapers daily publish several columns of telegraphic appeals for peace addressed to Nanking, Hangchow, and Lung-hua by various organizations, and the replies from Marshals Chi Hsieh-yuan and Lu Yung-hsiang and General Ho Feng-lin. While both sides profess peaceful intentions, yet they do not deny that they are taking military measures as a precaution. Hence the continuation of the panicky feeling among the populace.

Both the men-of-war and the land forces stationed near the Arsenal have commenced to enforce martial law since Monday. Ships and boats are not allowed to pass near the men-of-war and, when challenged, must submit to an inspection by a naval officer. No person without a "pass" will be allowed to be in the streets at Nantao during late hours of the night.

Two censors have been appointed to the Chinese Telegraph Office and six censors to the Headquarters of the Chinese Post Office by General Ho Feng-lin to examine all telegrams and letters handled there.

THURSDAY.

Attempt to Close the Shanghai-Nanking Railway

Scarcely anything really definite with regard to the possible armed clash between Kiangsu and Chê-kiang developed yesterday, either one way or the other. A few local incidents occurred which it must be admitted were of a menacing order, but they did not have any specially alarming effect.

The most satisfactory report, which comes from a highly authoritative source, is that any actual outbreak of hostilities, even should it happen at all, is believed to be unlikely for another week or 10 days.

There was a measure of excitement at the Shanghai-Nanking Railway station early yesterday morning. A force of Gen. Ho Feng-lin's troops marched up and it was explained that an order had been given to close the line in order to check the movement of troops. The gates were locked and a discussion followed with the railway authorities, as a consequence of which the commander of the troops refrained from an actual seizure of the station. A few soldiers were left on guard within the station premises, an officer with the nominal duties of military station master was installed and soldiers also were posted in the telegraph and other offices. As a consequence of all this two early morning trains had to be cancelled. Normal running was resumed later.

It was reported that trains were running regularly on outside sections of the line and that there had been no interference whatever during the past few days. Some alarm was caused by the circulation of the news of a breakdown at Kashing and of course it was surmised that the troops had torn up the line. So far as can be gathered, however, a goods train met with an accident and a waggon was derailed, but from what cause cannot be ascertained. A large number of Chinese, eager to travel despite the possible dangers, camped outside the station gates, patiently waiting for the resumption of traffic on the line, but there was a distinct lack of excitement or panic.

River Under Military Control.

For several days special precautions have been taken on the Huangpu, especially as regards vessels under way after dark, and yesterday Admiral H. K. Tu, Commander-in-chief, issued from Admiralty House, Nanking, a notice to the effect that, as it might be necessary at any moment to strengthen the defences between the Kiangyin Forts and Woosung, vessels were warned until further notice not to proceed up-river between sunset and sunrise and any passing through the section by day must fly their national colours. In the event of a vessel being sunk or damaged through disobeying this order, the Government and the Admiralty will disclaim all responsibility.

The piece-goods auctions in Shanghai have been suspended.

The telegraph wires are working normally.

THE TERROR OF NANKING

Troops All Along the Line

By Our Nanking Correspondent.

Wednesday, Evening.

The rolling stock of the Shanghai Nanking Railway has been commandeered by Marshal Chi. Six troop trains left Nanking on the night of August 25 and eight on the 26th. Passenger trains from Nanking yesterday were delayed several hours on this account.

Not since the two Revolutions has the city of Nanking been so panic-stricken. All coolies and ricsha men in sight and even ordinary pedestrians have been pressed into service by the soldiers, ricshas and carriages must hide to escape being commandeered, and last night troops began to break into homes to conscript men. The commanders are trying to bring their divisions up to full strength. The rougher soldiers are constantly using threats of conscription to extort money from citizens. As a result, needed labour is almost impossible to secure, and transportation is at a high price. Chi issued an order on Tuesday afternoon against illegal conscription but with little effect. The situation will no doubt be somewhat improved when most of Chi's troops have left the city.

Educational leaders met on Wednesday to discuss the possibility of opening the schools and are anxiously a waiting the turn of events. This group and many others are issuing pleas for peace, and are trying to influence public opinion against the war crime. The bitter resentment of the common people is adequate evidence that any fighting will be a war of only militarists and mercenaries.

There is a heavy run on the banks and many large stores are refusing bank notes.

Your correspondent came by railway to Shanghai this afternoon. The largest number of soldiers was seen at Quinsan. Passengers boarding at that station reported the town emptied of inhabitants, the troops quartered in homes, schools and public buildings, conscription of labour in force, and the talk of war on every side. The train was crowded with refugees. At every station were special railway guards.

EXODUS FROM SOOCHOW

From Our Own Correspondent.

Soochow, Aug. 26.

The city is even more nervous than yesterday, and even wilder rumours are afloat. Of course what the people fear is not so much fighting as looting. All the police are armed with rifles, both day and night, as has been the case during past revolutions. A stream of the wealthy people, with their valuables, still flows towards Shanghai, and from all the surrounding towns more people are coming into the city. Practically all the launch lines have stopped, and many of the launches have been commandeered for moving troops. It seems that many troops are on the move. Many are being sent northeast to Changshu (Zang Zoh). No one seems to know why they are being sent towards the river.

CHEKIANG CONFIDENT

Hangchow, Aug. 27.

According to one of the staff officers of General Lu Yung-hsiang, the Chêkiang troops are fully prepared to cope with the situation at any moment in case General Chi Hsieh-yuan's troops should open fire upon the Chêkiang troops. Fighting will be actually started, if it takes place at all, immediately after the arrival at Hangchow of the troops under the command of Tsang Chi-ping and Yang Hua-chao who are now staying in the district of Changshan, Chekiang, states the staff-officer. There are at present approximately 70,000 Chekiang troops, including 5,000 troops belonging to General Tsang Chi-ping, (these figures need to be taken with the greatest reserve: numbers are being habitually exaggerated—Ed.) and it is reported that the number of the Kiangsu troops is about the same as the Chekiang forces, as soldiers have of late been recruited by General Chi Hsieh-yuan, Tuchun of Kiangsu in order to keep the balance of power between the two provinces.

General Lu Yung-hsiang of Chekiang, who is considered as one of the wealthiest Tuchuns in this country, is to all appearance optimistic so far as his military funds are concerned.—Eastern News Agency.

RUN ON TIENTSIN BANK

Tientsin, Aug. 27.

There was an exceptional run on the Tientsin branch of the Industrial Development Bank of China to-day owing to the inability of the Nanking branch of the Bank to pay out. All the demands were met and it is estimated that $500,000 were paid out to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

NANKING TROOPS ON THE MARCH

Thousands of Chihli Men Moving on Soochow and Quinsan

By Our Special Correspondent.

Nanking-Shanghai, Aug. 28.

Nanking is an armed camp. Soldiers are moving in from outlyng cities and are being sent to the front at Quinsan. The troops of General Chen T'iao-yuan, who is in charge of bandit suppression in Kiangsu, Anhui, Shantung and Honan, arrived at Nanking to relieve the divisions which have been sent to the front. These troops are veterans of the guerilla warfare of northern Kiangsu. General Bei Bao-shan's troops are said to have been stationed at Hsuchowfu to relieve Chen T'iao-yuan's brigades.

Kiangsu military men claim that they have not used as much as one-third of the rolling stock of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway. They are taking goods wagons as they come within their sphere of influence. These they use to send troops to Quinsan or along the line. These steel wagons are excellent for the purpose, being in effect armoured cars, considering the type of munitions used by both armies.

The Naval Force.

The Nanking fleet is on the move. Only three vessels are now stationed at Nanking, the remainder of the fleet being somewhere between that city and Shanghai. It is expected that the Foochow fleet will join Admiral Tu's ships in operations in the vicinity of Shanghai.

The conscription of coolies was rather unfortunate and proved a disturbing factor in the city. It was at first believed that these coolies were being taken into the army to be used to fill the ranks. Upon investigation, however, it proved that the coolies were being conscripted for transport purposes only and that some of them have already been returned from the front.

The explanation for a certain amount of panic in Nanking lies in the fact that it was believed that General Wu Pei-fu was sending troops to assist Marshal Chi. The residents of Nanking were fearful of new soldiers, unused to their ways and to conditions in the South. General Chi told your correspondent that there was no need for fears in Nanking from this or any other source. As a matter of fact, Nanking appeared to be the quietest city along the railway, except for the passing through the streets of brigade after brigade of soldiers.

Chihli Troops.

To a westerner, it is somewhat astonishing to see the Chinese troops marching into action. Only a few buglers precede the soldiers, who soon get out of step. Each man carries in addition to the usual implements of the soldier, a paper umbrella—probably made in Hangchow, together with extra straw sandals and other aids to comfort. During the war, the rations of the troops are increased, the Northern soldiers being provided with plenty of bread, biscuits and corned beef.

All the troops along the battle front are Chihli men except those at Soochow, many of whom are Hunanese, the remnants of an important revolutionary regiment. The Chihli troops are favourably impressed at this time with the green fields of southern Kiangsu, with the rich and prosperous country through which they are passing. It is more than likely that they will prefer to remain in Kiangsu rather than to be forced to return to the flooded areas between Tientsin and Paoting-fu. It is no secret in Nanking that this psychological factor is not altogether to be ignored in this war.

Shanghai and Shanghai alone is apparently the objective of the Nanking forces. There are to be no marauding parties travelling throughout the coast provinces for cities to conquer. If Marshal Chi succeeds in taking the Arsenal at Lunghua and the forts at Woosung, he will, according to the best information obtainable, be satisfied.

Where the Troops Are.

The concentration of troops is at present between Quinsan and Nanziang, Nanking holding the former place; Hangchow, the latter. The natural boundary between the two forces is the Soochow Creek and the Henli River. Should there be no attack on the Nanking forces from across the Taihu Lake, the campaign will probably be limited to this theatre along the railway. There is, however, danger that the Chêkiang force may come across the Lake or by the many waterways leading from Kashing and Sungkiang. In that event, the Nanking forces will probably fight their way through to take up a position at Nyishing with a view to dominating the entire position. The present plan of the Nanking forces is to take the offensive with regard to Shanghai; to fight only defensively as regards every other position. An observer who passed through the military field yesterday suggested that the opposing forces were now little more than three miles apart. Nanking claims altogether to have 60,000 troops mobilized, 35,000 of whom are at the point either at Quinsan or along the railway. In addition to these forces, Marshal Chi counts on the combined Foochow and Nanking navies.

Chekiang Outposts at Nanziang.

An effort to reach Shanghai on the railroad proved most unsatisfactory, although the lights of the great city did finally appear in the distance after the Chêkiang outposts at Nanziang had been passed. No cars were available in Nanking for the regular service. Intending passengers were advised by the efficient staff who were handling the cars, military and irritated ticket-buyers at Nanking, to remain at the station until the cars arrived and to get into them as soon as possible, as they would be sent to Shanghai with the greatest speed and with the greatest uncertainty as to the exact time of departure and arrival. We waited three hours for the cars to arrive, left Nanking at 8 p.m. and arrived in Shanghai the next morning at 5 a.m. As this was the afternoon express, there was only a day coach with very little food and much less to drink.

CONSCRIPTION IN FORCE AT YANGCHOW

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Yangchow Ku., Aug. 25.

Conscription of the civilian population to join the local military forces and move to Quinsan, began in this city last evening and has continued throughout the day. The order was given to conscript 2,000 men. This work was begun by the solders, but as these were preparing for departure this afternoon, the local police were ordered to continue, each of the five branch police stations being called upon to bring its quota up to 400 men.

Seizure of pedestrians, mostly of the lower class, began last night. Early this morning a large number of farmers who had entered the city with their vegetables, were grabbed while on their way home. Small merchants and tradesmen were also taken. Groups of these drafted men were to be seen on the streets, several soldiers preceding and following them. Fear seized the public, many stores were closed and women alone deemed it safe to be seen on the streets. Men of the upper class remained close to their homes or places of employment as the report went round that those wearing long gowns were not exempted. Large numbers crossed the Grand Canal last night fleeing to places of safety in the country, and it is stated that one ferryman accustomed to earning a few hundred cash a day, had realized $20 at this time.

The auto company which operates between Yangchow and Chinkiang, after several employees had been conscripted, sought exemption for the rest, offering to make a car available for officers, with free transportation to Chinkiang.

Soldiers seized five tankers of oil belonging to the Asiatic Petroleum Company, as the junks were sailing down the Canal past the city. Negotiations were being entered into this evening for the recovery of the oil, worth thousands of dollars, and it was hoped these efforts would be successful, since the military forces had no use for the oil but wanted the junks for transportation purposes.

Aug. 26.

Conscription continues to-day. The auto and launch companies are not operating, the launches being used to transport soldiers and equipment. Very few junks are to be seen along the Canal. It is safe to say that no farmers will be entering the city with their products, and business in general will be at a low ebb until conscription ceases.

WHAT WILL CHANG TSO-LIN DO?

Prospects of Crossing Great Wall Despite Floods

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Pelking, Aug. 28.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's attitude is engaging the liveliest interest in the capital. The consensus of opinion is that he will not move until Marshal Wu Pei-fu moves. It is felt that the Lord of Mukden will allow Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to take care of himself if Marshal Chi is similarly allowed to fight his own battles.

Another view is that if Marshal Lu can put up a stern fight, as is the general opinion, then Marshal Chang will make a bid to retain the support of the Anfu party by crossing the Great Wall, disregarding the handicap of the floods which hamper the Fengtien movements.

THE PEACEFULNESS OF LUNGHUA

A Complete Absence of Warlike Preparations

It will have been noticed from reports in recent issues of local newspapers that there is a difference of opinion between the military chiefs of Kiangsu and Chêkiang and it is even believed that there is some possibility of armed conflict. The more enterprising correspondents have gone the length of measuring out from day to day the hourly decreasing distances between the potential combatants and speculating when they will be near enough to open fire. It should be emphasized, too, especially in view of General Chi's very emphatic statements which we publish to-day, that, so far as he is concerned, the principal bone of contention—indeed, about the only one he wishes to feel between his teeth—is the Shanghai district, the strategical points of which are Lunghua, Kiangnan Arsenal and Woosung. It was with this knowledge in his mind that a representative of the "North-China Daily News" on Thursday went out to familiarize himself with the eventual battlefields and to note the preparations for defence and hand on the stirring story for the benefit of the general public. He found—nothing.

Of course, it was raining heavily at the time, and had been for an hour before, but that could not completely damp the warlike spirit and, in any case, surely if war is imminent something would have been done before, even if the troops did have to run for shelter from the rain. The investigator has unpleasant memories of 1913, both before, during, and after the fighting, and particularly remembers one very hot Sunday before the actual outbreak of hostilities when he walked for miles round the Arsenal and found trenches and earthworks everywhere, bristling with machine-guns and rifles, and even in places redoubts fitted with field-guns. Lunghua and the Arsenal area n Thursday were more peaceful than on a bright Sunday afternoon in the peach-blossom season and the few soldiers encountered were far more good-tempered than when badgered by sight-seers.

First a call was made at the railway station behind the Chinese City on the line from Hangchow. "Never-ending streams" of refugees have been fleeing from Hangchow and Soochow for the safety of Shanghai, and of course the station would be packed with thousands of desolate people and mountains of their household possessions. Soldiers would be harassing them, station officials would be tearing about in utter despair, the line would be blocked and there would be general commotion. Actually there was more order and quiet than at an English wayside station when the weekly paper with an account of the annual flower show and Oddfellows' supper arrives. Three or four railway guards and as many soldiers stood in a group on the front steps and three more lounged at the platform entrance. A long train packed with people—departing, not arriving—stood at the platform, and it did depart. The station was absolutely clear of refugees or their goods and chattels.

There was nothing to attract one at the station, so the car was headed for the more exciting area around the Arsenal, with scarcely a hope that one would be permitted anywhere near it. The chauffeur drove round the back and pulled up alongside the low mud wall flanking the troops' barracks. "Can go. You look see," said he, indicating the way in. The sentry-box, sideways on, appeared to be deserted and there was not a soldier in sight. Looking round the box, a soldier was discovered inside, sleeping peacefully. The whirr of the engine roused him, he put out his head, expectorated disdainfully when he found it was not an invading force that had arrived—and went off to sleep again even before the car re-started. The chauffeur then drove on to one of the principal gates and without hesitancy proceeded through it, the half-dozen soldiers on guard, only two of whom had rifles, drawing aside without saying a word and seemingly only concerned as to whether they would be splashed with mud from the wheels. Round and about the chauffeur drove inside the coveted area and never once was challenged, although some of the lines had the appearance of seldom, if ever, being traversed by motor cars.

After a while the car was stopped at the administration offices and the correspondent, not with a very clear idea as to whom he should ask for, but proposing to talk with anyone who would allow the privilege, tried to get inside. There the sentries did stop him and as in their ignorance they did not understand either English or what generally is believed to be good Chinese the point could not be debated. Another move was made to lines fronting towards the river and there again the sentries were not hospitable. Maybe the batteries are there, as no sign of them could be discovered elsewhere, and possibly they wished to preserve the great secret.

The tour was too tame, so the car was taken out of the Arsenal area and on to Lunghua, for surely there would be something doing there. Outside the Arsenal everything was as peaceful as within and so also all the way to Lunghua. There were soldiers about on the roads, but then there are at any time, and the only difference noticed was that about one in every six wore a double bandolier, and all had their rifles in linen cases, whereas in real peace times they keep them uncovered. The troops at Lunghua always choose to be very important and never fail to tread on the toes of anyone who steps back too far from the pagoda and comes anywhere near their barracks. So it was nothing unusual to find a rifle ported across one's chest, but even Private Hung who performed the evolution was quite cheery about it. The only bad-tempered person encountered at Lunghua—or, for the matter of that, on the whole of the trip—was Geraldine who sells the joss sticks and she was very annoyed when the only visitor on a rainy day would not part with a single bawbee.

That is all the excitement that can be found at present. A great deal may be happening, but there is no visible evidence of it and it is a fact that, so far as the defences of the Arsenal at the moment are concerned, half a company of men with a surprise rush could be over the wall and capture the place in 20 minutes.

The navy is somewhat of a mystery. At the moment there are six or seven vessels of variegated build, armament and age, of which the Haichi probably is the most powerful, frequently changing station between the Arsenal and Woosung. Their allegiance is said to have been given to Peking and at the moment they are controlled by an Admiral at Nanking, so one must form one's own conclusions as to which side they will support. It is interesting to note, however that it has been reported that the Admiral has requested Peking to pay the men in advance.

NANKING POLICY AND POSITION

Marshal Chi Says Talking Cannot Unify China: Only Strong Measures Can Avail: the Need of Settling the Issue Once for All

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

Nanking, Aug. 27.

"I am very glad that the 'North-China Daily News' wants my point of view," said Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan in an interview to-day.

"Although Shanghai is but a short distance from Nanking, the people of Shanghai seem not to have troubled to find out why I, who for many years have submitted to a very difficult situation for the sake of peace, now send my soldiers to protect the borders of Kiangsu Province."

Marshal Chi was in his yamên in full uniform, issuing orders for the transport of troops and ammunitions, receiving foreign consuls, and making preparations for his first war as Tuchun and his first military expedition since the days of Feng Kuo-chang, when, by forced marches, he brought the famous Sixth Division from Nanchang to Nanking and made Li Hsun Tuchun of Kiangsu.

Force Only Can Unify

"Everybody talks about the unification of China. Newspapers, societies, meetings, all discuss the unification of China. Some believe, as I have hitherto believed, that unification might be achieved by negotiation. But what are the facts? We have been negotiating for almost 10 years. We are still negotiating.

"No authority is recognized. So-called independent generals establish themselves in positions of authority where they are able to keep the country from unification and to prolong internal and international difficulties which beset China. Although I am a military man, I am a man of peace. If we could unify China by peaceful methods, I should be in favour of it, above all else. But one grows despairing as the years pass, and as the state of the country grows worse.

"The time comes when there must be action. Kiangsu has always recognized itself as but a part of the Republic of China and loyal to it. General Lu considers Chêkiang independent of the Republic of China. The fact that the most important commercial city in China, Shanghai, is a buffer between Kiangsu and Chêkiang makes for danger to the whole country. Shanghai is historically, traditionally and geographically a city of Kiangsu. By a political accident, the control of Shanghai has become vested in the so-called independent officials of Chêkiang. This has led to grave political difficulties, as every Chinese and foreigner knows. Foreign business men and officials have come to me and have asked that law and treaties be enforced in Shanghai. Complaints have been made to me of opium and arms smuggling and other illegalities. With sorrow and shame I have been forced to admit that although Shanghai was the jewel among all the cities of Kiangsu, the officials of Kiangsu could not control it.

Shanghai Festering with Plots.

"Last summer the so-called independent general of Chêkiang and I signed an agreement to preserve the peace. I signed in all sincerity for I am a lover of peace. As much as I realized the injustice and iniquity of the situation, I signed that agreement so that the people of Kiangsu would not suffer the horrors and privations of war. The peace agreement was praised by many local people and by many foreigners, but it was criticized as unworkable by many of my colleagues in the government, who realized that there can be no peace in China when any province or any official in the country regards himself as greater than the whole country, as independent of law and authority. So far as I am concerned, I have never taken a step which was a breach of that peace agreement. But what did Chêkiang do?

"In Shanghai political criminals have gathered together and plotted to destroy the Republic of China by preventing unification. These persons are to-day co-operating and supporting General Lu. The situation in Fukien was fomented by Chêkiang and when the rebellion was crushed, the rebels were given positions of honour among the Chêkiang military forces. According to the third article of the Peace Agreement, Chêkiang should have disarmed the rebel troops of Fukien when under Chêkiang.

"These rebel troops are now being used to attack Kiangsu. How can China be unified if Chêkiang and Shanghai are the scenes of constant plots against Government, if, from Chêkiang, efforts are constantly being made to make the east of China independent from the rest of the country? General Lu has broken the peace agreement by these activities, which all will agree must make more distant the day when the Republic of China shall be as great and as strong as she was in ancient times."

Full Support of Colleagues

"Marshal Chi," I asked, "in Shanghai it is said that you are acting entirely on your own account and that you are not being wholeheartedly supported by your colleagues."

Marshal Chi replied: "Anyone who has studied my career will realize that I am not impetuous. I would not take this step unless I had the authority to do so and the consent of my colleagues. I have no selfish ambitions. I am not setting out to conquer the country. This effort is designed only to establish what is right, namely the inclusion politically of Shanghai in Kiangsu as Shanghai is geographically a part of Kiangsu. My colleagues in the government and in the neighbouring provinces desire that I should take this step and I have their hearty support and co-operation. It makes very little difference what anyone says, as events will show who is speaking the truth and who is confusing the mind of the public by falsehoods.

Troops Behaviour Pledged

"Your newspaper may assure the people of Shanghai that my troops will be orderly and that once Shanghai has become a part of Kiangsu again, the smuggling of opium and arms will cease and that, in the commercial capital of the country, all efforts toward destruction of China by continued civil war will cease. Again I repeat, I love peace. I want peace. I am ready to make peace. But China must be unified and if it is necessary to unify China by war, then there must be war."

PEACE-MAKERS' EFFORTS AT HANGCHOW

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, Aug. 27.

The Guilds are closely following affairs and have sent deputies to Shanghai to talk with the Kiangsu gentry in the interests of peace. Not a few of the more nervous are seeking shelter in the C.M.S. Hospital. The exportation of money has been prohibited. Boats and launches are being commandeered by the Military. A severe thunderstorm has just come with heavy downpour of rain which we hope will damp the ardour of the rumour-spreaders, at any rate, and help to fill the water-kongs which have been empty now for many weeks.

CHIHLI PARTY'S PEACE TERMS

Late on Friday night we learnt that the Chihli party, which Marshal Chi represents offer the fllowing peace terms:—

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to be Inspector General of Chêkiang and Fukien.

All the Shanghai District, including Lunghua, Kiangnan and Woosung to be restored to Kiangsu.

All independence to be cancelled.

GEN. HO FENG-LIN AND MERCHANTS

General Ho's Explanation That War Is Forced on Him

Martial law has been declared in Chinese territory according to the "Ming-kuopao," by Col. Lu, Chief of the Woosung and Shanghai Constabulary. The following measures will be enforced:—

The holding of meetings and distribution of newspapers, etc, relating to the general situation are prohibited.

Close watch will be kept on guns, ammunition, and other dangerous weapons, and these articles are liable to be confiscated on being found.

Men will be detailed for duty at the Post Offices and telegraph offices to deal with matter relating to military movements.

Police will be authorized to enter premises and board steamers to carry out searches.

People passing territory under martial law from 5 to 11.30 p.m. will be subject to searches; all traffic will be prohibited between 11.30 at night and dawn.

General Ho Feng-lin, at his yamên at Lunghua on Wednesday afternoon, held a conference with Lunghua officials, the chairman, vice-chairman of the general and city chambers of commerce and prominent Shanghai merchants and gentry. Altogether there were some 60 people present.

General Ho explained that he had called the meeting in order to put his position before them. As they knew he had quartered his forces at Lunghua for the past 10 years, and in all that time he had always done everything in his power to keep the peace. Realizing the difficulties which were bound to occur whenever trouble of the present nature arose, and the diplomatic complications which must of neccessity ensue, he had always been patient and worked for a peaceful settlement.

General Ho then went on to explain the military position as it existed. He had received a report to the effect that over 180 railway cars had been detained at Nanking, and that soldiers were to be conveyed to Soochow as from August 27. This being so it was for him, then, to make the best arrangements he could for defence, but they could take his word for it that he would not be the aggressor. He would not fight unless attacked.

In connexion with the sensational collapse of Chinese bonds, Northern papers report that the chiefs of the civil and police administrations of the Ministry of Interior, have applied for the arrest of stock manipulators and rumour mongers who were responsible for the disrupton of the bond market. It is also alleged that some financial organizations were implicated.

SATURDAY.

THE FLIGHT FROM WOOSUNG

People Scared by Conscription at Belief in Possibility of Fighting

In spite of the stirring tales told elsewhere of the women and children being officially turned out of the Kiangnan Arsenal area, and feverish activity in the way of digging trenches and generally strengthening the defences, the position is as above stated. The women and childen are as plentiful as ever and the trenches no more in evidence than they were six months ago. There is a long trench running down one side of the Arsenal and if one looks down into it a brand new gas pipe, or water pipe, or something of that order will be seen. It never was intended for soldiers.

Excitement had to be found somewhere, and as Kiangnan and Lunghua could not produce it, Woosung was visited on Friday and it was ascertained that things certainly have been happening there. The journey down by road is as bad and dangerous as any battle, and when the war is over and a few thousand men again have no excuse for carrying rifles, it is to be hoped some of them will be put on to mend the road. The journey was lacking in incident for three-quarters of the way. Then two of the Woosung hussars hove in sight and the correspondent was able to hope that at least he would be halted and ordered to return. But no; one was too busy lighting a cigarette and the other had his hands full with a discarded griffin; and the former Shanghai owner should be thankful that he got rid of it.

Cossacks and Conscription.

A furlong more and two Cossacks with a red flag were discovered sitting just off the crown of the road. A story had been heard of 1,000 Russians being engaged by one of the rival warlords and here seemingly might be a clue to the real story. Yet again there was a disappointment. The most sensational thing the Cossacks did was to stare, but they did not even wave the red flag. Exhaustive inquiries later on failed to establish the occupation of these two Cossacks—and they had disappeared when the return trip was made. Nearing Woosung three big motor lorries were passed, all packed high with household effects and the owners thereof, and behind them two motor cars similarly burdened. So at last there was some real evidence of war.

The village did not appear to be nearly so lively as is usual and conversation with a few residents soon showed the reason for this. The villagers really do believe there is to be fighting in their territory—though if it is to be no worse than the "siege" of the forts in 1913 there will be small cause for them to worry. Already they have suffered the first shock, for conscription is being enforced by the commander of the forts, and it would be interesting to know by whose authority he has acted. Every day young men are marched off to the forts and only just before our correspondent arrived 100 had been taken in. The practice in other places appears to be to put conscripts to forced labour as baggage carriers, but it was stated that at Woosung they are put into uniform and made into soldiers straight off, many of the regulars having left for upcountry.

At the jetty a junk, which, rather curiously, was flying the Customs flag from her stern, was unloading boxes of small-arms ammunition, under guard by a squad of half-a-dozen soldiers whose rifles were piled just off the roadway and who themselves were lounging in a dry ditch quite 40 yards away. That was all that was to be seen in the village.

At the Forts.

A move then was made to the forts. It is several years since the correspondent has seen them close at hand, and certainly they have not been improved. Equally with Kiangnan and Lunghua, nothing whatever has been done beyond the walls to strengthen the defences. Wild vegetation grows very freely in that district and the country is fairly well covered with trees, so that an attacking force, if well handled, would have not the slightest difficulty in getting unseen to within certainly 100 yards of the walls, if not even nearer. The walls would be no barrier whatever to determined men. In parts an active man could vault over them, in others he could mount them with two steps, and anywhere the cracked, sun-baked mud easily could be blown away by concentrated rifle fire.

Woosung does not welcome visitors so freely as Kiangnan, but even at ordinary times one cannot pass the sentries, so that is not unusual. Perhaps it is because they have two 11-inch muzzle-loading guns inside and are frightened lest the news should be spread abroad. These venerable pieces preached a brief sermon in 1913, their crews managing by great labour to get a round off every 40 minutes during three hours. Since then the artillery has been treated with the respect antiquities deserve and not a note has been heard from them. It is known that the forts had several light but useful field-guns, but since the present scare has grown up the armament has been seriously depleted. Soldiers were seen dragging several of the guns down to the river, where they were hoisted on to sampans and sent to Shanghai. It is understood they subsequently went up the Soochow Creek, which lends support to the opinion that it is intended to fight a decisive engagement in the neighbourhood of Quinsan, and leave Shanghai in peace.

The Phantom Fleet.

There were no signs of unusual activity about the forts, the sentries lounging listlessly at their posts or gambling in the roadway outside the gates and paying no attention to passers-by. Most of the technical offices were empty and locked up. It seemed strange, too, that there was not a single naval unit in the river. Lately there has been a small cruiser watching over the three Russian ships and several torpedo-boats and nondescript naval craft have been moored near the junk anchorage. Two or three of the smaller boats have come up to Shanghai, but the rest all have gone outside, possibly to watch for those phantom fleets which for several days past have been headed for Shanghai at full speed. At any rate, there are no ships of the Navy in sight from Woosung—whether they be allied to Peking, Canton, Fukien, Tibet, Mongolia, or any other part.

The trains all are running as usual on the railway, though occasionally one may be a little late. One was due in about the time the return journey was commenced and the platform was packed from end to end with women and children, a few men, piles of baggage, for transportation to Shanghai. There is no doubt that Woosung is taking the matter very seriously—except at the forts—but unless there should be actual fighting, any one who has a mind to spend a pleasant Sunday there, if the weather he fine, should not be frightened out of the trip.

CHIHLI PARTY'S POINT OF VIEW

How Marshal Chi of Nanking Hopes to Vanquish Marshal Lu of Hangchow Without Firing a Shot

By George E. Sokolsky.

Nanking, Aug. 27.

The objective of the Kiangsu armies is Shanghai. There will be no effort toward going beyond Shanghai unless present plans change. The Kiangsu army hopes to capture this position which will have the political effect of making Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang a negligible factor in Chinese politics. Kiangsu would then sit back and wait for the ordinary processes to work themselves out.

The tide of battle, according to the best information here, depends not so much upon the actual fighting, as upon the support from other sources which the two contending generals hope to receive. The supporters of Marshal Chi insist that he has the full support of the entire Chihli Party, which means, in effect, Marshals Wu Pei-fu and Feng Yu-hsiang and Wang Chen-ping. The claim is that Fukien, Anhui and Kiangsi support them. They claim that their own men are all loyal and that Chi has their hearty co-operation. The presence in Nanking of General Chen T'iao-yuan, of Hsuchowfu, is regarded as a happy augury.

They discount altogether the possibilities of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang receiving much support from either Chang Tso-lin or Sun Yat-sen. With regard to the latter, they believe that his hands are full. The Lord of Mukden, it is believed, has sent a huge sum of money to the assistance of Chêkiang, but he will be unable to move troops or to interfere radically in the situation, because of his own complications with the Russians vis-à-vis the Chinese Eastern Railway. Should he send his armies out of Manchuria, the Russians would seize the C.E.R. to protect it against bandits, etc. This might also lead to complications with Japan and the United States, both of which have an interest in the railway. The Kiangsu military men therefore believe that it would be fruitless for Marshal Lu to hope to have the armed assistance of Marshal Chang.

They therefore believe that they can attain their objective in a very short war, perhaps without disturbing to any great extent the city of Shanghai, which they hope to win back to Kiangsu Province. They have massed approximately 20,000 troops at Quinsan and it is known that they have altogether moved 35,000 men. If these figures are correct, they already have in close proximity to Lu Yung-hsiang a force as large as his own entire army. This force, however, is not the complete roster of Kiangsu troops. There are the divisions in Nanking and Hsuchowfu, in Tsingkiangpu and Nantungchow, in the cities along the railwny and in other outlying places. These troops might be called in should it be necessary. It is also understood that armed assistance could come from the other provinces of Marshal Chi's inspectorate as well as from colleagues in the Chihli Party, should Marshal Chi request it. The Nanking and Foochow navies finally bring up the full complement of the Nanking forces. With this body, the Kiangsu generals hope to win a rather easy victory, although they admit that Lu Yung-hsiang has more money than they have and is a stubborn man, the last of the Anfu Tuchuns, fighting for a cause which has been lost everywhere else in China.

In stating these views, the writer must make the point that he is repeating the viewpoint of the adherents of the Chihli Party rather than the results of complete and mature investigations.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S ARMY CONCENTRATING

Ostensibly on Annual Field Work: Wu Pei-fu Sending Troops Down River

Shanghai, Aug. 29.

Reuter receives the following from a correspondent in the north:—Marshal Wu Pei-fu is sending native troops by boats down river and also by railway in a southerly direction.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin is concentrating his forces in the south, ostensibly for the annual field work.

Peking, Aug. 29.

The British, United States, French and Japanese Ministers today sent a Note to the Waichiaopu drawing attention to their Note of August 11, 1923, which was sent under similar circumstances, and saying that their Governments would hold the Chinese Government responsible in the event of losses by their nationals through fighting.

The British Legation has sent a separate note regarding the Shanghai Nanking Railway.—Reuter's Facific Service.

SOLDIERS STREAMING THROUGH WUSIH

Banks Refusing Payment

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wusih, Aug. 29.

The city remains quiet and orderly, but a sense of tension and apprehension naturally prevails.

Only one company of troops is stationed here, but a constant stream of trains, launches and boats convey soldiers to Soochow, where they receive further orders, also, to Quinsan and Nyishing.

Native banks refuse payment, but money can be obtained from three National Banks. Pawn shops are only paying per 1 cent.

Seven Red Cross Stations are being opened, with St. Andrew's Hospital at the head of the list: these stations are for the relief of refugees and wounded. A number of families have already moved into St. Andrew's Hospital compound, and women and children will be received to the limit of capacity. Contrary to a foolish rumour, no charge whatever is made to these refugees. Preparation for the reception of wounded goes on apace.

Christians from the more exposed parts of the city are moving into the church compound.

CHINESE RED CROSS PREPARATIONS

All Ready for the Wounded if Fighting Breaks Out

Under the efficient leadership of Drs. W. L. and W. S. New, with Dr. D. Y. Wong heading the arrangements at Hangchow, the Chinese Red Cross has been thoroughly organized to meet the needs of the situation should fighting take place. All the local hospitals along the railway line between Nanking and Shanghai are ready to receive the wounded and extra supplies and helpers are at hand. The Red Cross organization in Shanghai is organizing units and the first unit, consisting of four doctors, four nurses, and 10 stretcher bearers left for Quinsan yesterday morning. Another unit is ready and could leave at a moment's notice. First aid units have been organized at Hangchow and these can be sent out to the field of action immediately the need arises.

The Shanghai Red Cross hospitals will serve as the base organization, the Siccawei and Tientsin Road hospitals being the ones which will be used first. There are also smaller hospitals on Sinza Road and the Chinese Bund which can be used, while the Federal Hospital (not Red Cross) will probably be able to give up 100 beds if necessary. The Cholera hospitals have only about 15 patients at present, so that in an emergency they could be made available. Organization in the towns along the railroad is progressing rapidly, as in the case of Soochow, where six hospitals are co-operating, three mission and three Chinese. Should the fighting be unusually severe or prolonged the Drs. New have other tentative arrangements made.

THE WAR CLOUD

Aug. 25.

THE situation as between Chêkiang and Kiangsu calls for sobriety and abstention from everything likely to create panic. The wildest rumours are in the air and find their way into print with scant regard for their accuracy or effect. For instance, one foreign paper a few days ago gave great prominence to a report that naval vessels were steaming from Foochow to attack Woosung. A Reuter telegram to-day shows that this story, which for many reasons sounded improbable, was utterly untrue. At the same time it would be idle to pretend that feeling between Hangchow and Nanking is not acute, more so indeed than it was a year ago. The gravity of the position is increased by the fact that Sun Chuan-fang in Fukien greatly desires the Tuchunship of Chêkiang. The story of Wu Pei-fu's being enraged because the Tupan of the latter province has given shelter to two antagonists of his from Fukien is a mere pretext. The real bone of contention is, as always, that whereas Woosung, the Shanghai district, Kiangnan Arsenal and Sungkiang are geographically Kiangsu's, they are controlled by Chêkiang. And inasmuch as no Tuchun at Nanking can be expected to accept that anomaly quietly, there are those who think it would be better to settle the matter once for all by open fight, than to have a fresh scare every six months. Finally there appears no doubt that on both sides there is a good deal of moving of troops towards the likeliest strategic positions.

Against all this, it is a commonplace that what everybody expects very frequently fails to happen, and especially that the wars apparently most certain fizzle out in negotiation. In both Kiangsu and Chêkiang peacemakers have been working strenuously for several days past and the result of their efforts is seen in the manifestoes by General Lu and Marshal Chi which we published last Friday and Saturday. The tone of both leaders is undoubtedly bitter. But this stage at least has been reached, that each declares he will not attack anybody unless himself attacked. A similar stage will be recalled a year ago; which, however, did not satisfy the peace party, who redoubled their efforts and ultimately succeeded in getting the Peace Treaty signed which readers will remember. It is true that Nanking now accuses Hangchow of violating that agreement. But the flight of the Fukien generals into Chêkiang could not be called more than a technical violation. It is most unlikely that General Lu, who with foes all round him is isolated, would open hostilities. Marshal Chi is also well aware that he risks much in doing so, both materially and in prestige. There are also certain questions of internal jealousies, too complicated to detail here, which weigh against war. The greatest danger of an explosion is that rival troops at some outpost might fire on each other. In that case a general mêlée might easily ensue.

The time is certainly one when every peacemaker on both sides who can make his voice heard should do all in his power to prevent a breach. It is much to the good that, although rumours of war have been current for at least a fortnight, there has been no war yet. The stage has been reached of representation, of reflexion, almost of negotiation; and every day that can now be gained is so much more for the chances of peace. Which surely is devoutly to be desired. After eleven years of tranquillity in east China, the man who plunges the country into war will commit an unspeakable crime. Is it impossible for Marshal Chi and General Lu to adjust their differences as regards the Sungkiang and Shanghai district? The weak point of last September's peace treaty was that it left this question untouched. Yet it appears to us that a compromise is not impossible, under which, let us say, the Woosung Constabulary and forts might go to Nanking and Hanchow retain Sungkiang and Kiangnan. If Marshal Chi and General Lu could fairly come together, not only would their provincials pay them the deepest gratitude, but they themselves would find their own position greatly strengthened in dealing with internal forces that now give them no small trouble.

THE FUNDAMENTALIST CONTROVERSY

Aug. 25.

MANY are the topics discussed in our correspondence columns. Usually the interest is ephemeral, as the writers refer simply to some passing event of the day. But there is one topic, religion, which always maintains its place and is apparently of never failing interest, whether the point of discussion is the primacy of St. Peter, verbal inspiration, the approaching end of the world or any other theological question. One correspondent thinks that certain persons are paid to write these letters on religion. He makes a mistake: the letters sent in are spontaneous and free. What the impulse or motive is which dictates them it is not easy to say. It may be the love of argumentation; or the desire to express piety and religious zeal; or the determination to combat opinions which are disliked, although in many cases there may be the lurking subconscious fear that possibly such opinions are true, for few of us care to argue passionately about matters of which we are quite certain. At the present time there is a grave conflict in the United States, and to some extent in England, between the Fundamentalists and Modernists. It has spread to the Protestant missionary body in China, disturbing the harmony of at least one educational institution, leading to criticism of the preaching this summer in Kuling, and finding expression on our correspondence pages in the letters of "Jonathan Blunt" and others. The controversy is of general interest, because it is bound to affect the influence of missionaries with the Chinese, and it raises educational questions of the greatest importance.

As it may not be generally known what Fundamentalism represents, the following summary, as given in an American newspaper, of this year's programme of the World's Fundamentalist Convention at Fort Worth, Texas, should be enlightening:—

"1. The withdrawal of financial and moral support from all Church Schools that teach any theory of evolution whatsoever.

"2. The immediate revision of all textbooks that teach any theory of evolution whatsoever.

"3. Compulsory measures to force all teachers to sign annually a statement of creed which affirms a firm and steadfast faith in the Genesis account of creation, the historical fact of all Bible miracles, the Virgin Birth, the bodily resurrection, the imminent second coming of Jesus, the existence of a personal devil and a literal hell.

"4 Political and financial pressure brought to bear upon all tax-supported schools in order to eliminate both textbooks and instructors teaching any form of evolution whatsoever.

"5. The rejection of the uniform interdenominational Sunday School lessons because of their evolutionary and post-millennial tendencies.

"6. The compulsory resignation of all pastors, evangelists and Sunday School teachers who hold to any theory of evolution whatsoever.

"7. The organization of a Fundamentalist Society within each local church for the purpose of propaganda.

"8. Wherever denominational Church Schools do not fall in line with the Fundamentalist demands on Bible interpretation and elimination of the teaching of evolutionary theories, the Fundamentalists will organize, finance and give moral support to Bible schools that will give instruction in Bible and science in harmony with Fundamentalists' beliefs."

The programme is clear, definite and aggressive. To some it may seem lacking in the spirit of kindly toleration of religious differences. Perhaps this is a virtue hardly to be expected yet, for human nature changes slowly. The controversy is simply another phase of the perpetual conflict between people of opposite temperaments, the conservative and the progressive. On the side of the Fundamentalists are those who crave religious authority and the certainty which it gives; in the Bible they believe they have a complete and infallible authority for all the affairs of human life, here and hereafter, and nothing must be permitted to weaken this authority, even indirectly. Hence the Bible is not only the supreme authority in religion, but its statements concerning astronomy, geology, biology, physiology, and other subjects not strictly theological, are also to be accepted without question, and the discoveries and teachings of modern science which do not seem to be in harmony with them are to be rejected. The Modernists, speaking generally, are those who do not rely so much upon external authority as upon the light of reason and personal religious experience; they stand for intellectual and spiritual liberty, for the right to accept all proven knowledge of every kind and to re-interpret old doctrines and credal forms in the light of that knowledge. So the conflict goes on, and probably will go on, in one form or another, till the end of time.

In the present discussion, however, one or two points should be borne in mind in connexion with the Chinese. Religious controversy, especially if lacking in kindliness, will be a hindrance, not a help, to winning converts. Further, before the Fundamentalists introduce into China the educational campaign of their brethren in America, they should very carefully consider, in the light of the history of education in other lands, the wisdom of the policy in a non-Christian land of interfering with the teaching of science in the higher institutions of secular learning, or of withholding scientific teaching in mission schools, or of making the scientific teaching square with particular forms of religious belief. When a State assumes the full control or supervision of education, it should consider the educational interests of all without partiality or prejudice; no one religious body can be favoured more than others. Some day in China there will be a complete educational system regulated by the Government. When that time comes it may be hoped that the facilities for giving religious instruction will not be unduly restricted; but religious organizations which demand that scientific knowledge and secular education generally shall be taught in accordance with their own particular beliefs will not greatly help their cause.

THE CHINESE POST OFFICE

Aug. 26.

THERE are times when we say unkind things about the Chinese Post Office. On most of these occasions the Post Office has something to say for itself; it does even happen that it may have so much to say for itself that it looks as if the original charge ought never to have been made. Then relations are strained and correspondence becomes very formal indeed. This, we imagine, is a common experience, as also that on sober reflexion we must all agree that the Post Office does a most wonderful work and does it most efficiently under incredible difficulties. Bandits roam the country holding up all and sundry; civil wars spring up like dust storms, die down and are renewed; couriers are robbed and beaten, postmasters carried off for ransom; still, somehow the mails get through and year by year the business of the Post Office increases beyond belief. The report for 1923 contains a tribute to the staff which we take pleasure in reproducing:—

Acknowledgment is made of the fidelity, patience, and loyalty of the many employés whose lot during the year has been a hard one. Couriers have in some cases been killed, inland Postmasters and their staffs have been kidnapped—the fate of the Postmaster of Tsaoyang (Hupeh) is still unknown after six months—and sectional Inspectors have encountered difficulties and endured hardships of many kinds, being robbed sometimes twice over on the same journey. The Administration is singularly favoured in the quality of the services they have rendered, for it is to these services that the extraordinary integrity and security of the mails are due.

There is also a tribute "to the commanders of foreign gunboats, whose assistance and co-operation contributed most notably to the favourable transmission, in times of difficulty, of mails to and from the Upper Yangtze offices."

As already noted in these columns, the number of articles of mail matter posted during 1923 amounted to more than 473 millions, an increase of 47 million articles over the figures for the previous year. But the report says:—

This considerable increase is attributed more to the withdrawal of foreign postal agencies than to the normal increase of domestic business, seeing that the increases are generally found in the returns of districts in which foreign post offices functioned before the 31st December 1922. For instance, to the above increase Shanghai contributes 24 millions; Chihli, 7 millions; Shantung, 5 millions; Fengtien, 4½ millions; and Ki-Hei, 4½ millions. While a total increase of 19 millions has been contributed by other districts, a decrease of 14 millions, 3 millions, and half a million is noticeable in the statistics for the Kuangtung, the Eastern and Western Szechuan, and the Kuangsi Districts, respectively.

The taking over of the foreign agencies' work indeed threw an enormous burden on the C. P. O. with which, during 1922, it was certainly not ready to cope. But we gather that last year the Post Office was becoming more master of its job; and certainly when the new office in Shanghai is opened, the extra facilities for handling mail should bring a marked improvement. It is interesting to record that the railways, which formerly conveyed mail free, are now paid for their services, in view of the increasing volume of postal matter carried. This arrangement was come to, very agreeably to all concerned, we gather, at the Railway Traffic Conference held in Peking in the spring of 1923 and came into force last September. Courier lines have been extended by 2,900 miles; a special boat service into Kueichow has been established, to get round the attentions of bandits on the main launch routes; motor-cars are freely used for country service in Shansi, Kirin and Heilungkiang and there were even some weeks of aerial mail service mainly during summer between Peking and Peitaiho. The financial statement also appears healthy. The revenue for the year was $20,791,610. Working expenses amounted to $16,334,786; repayment of loans was made to the Customs of $630,804; expenditure on land, new buildings, furniture, vehicles etc. was $1,810,066; the Ministry of Communications received $1,850,000 for services rendered; and there remained a working balance to carry forward of $165,953.

The reports from different provinces contain many items of interest. Those from Kuangtung, Kuangsi and Yunnan are consistently the worst and amply reflect the blessings of so-called Constitutional Government. Thus we read:—

Almost without intermission Kuangtung remained under a cloud during the whole year owing to the incessant civil warfare, which affected trade to a much greater extent than the turmoil mentioned in the previous annual report. Postal operations have been considerably retarded as a consequence of local and provincial conditions, resulting in heavy decreases in the various categories of mail matter handled.

The unsettled condition of Kuangsi continued during 1923, with a resulting effect on postal operations, in addition to which occurred the greatest floods for the last ten years. A further drop of nearly half a million articles has to be recorded. More peaceful conditions prevail at the end of the year and, if these continue, better postal results may be expected.

Trade conditions in Yunnan have not only failed to improve in 1923 but have steadily grown worse, owing to the depreciation of the provincial currency, which was unfavourable for imports, and the dislocation of transportation facilities, due to the requisitioning of ponies for military purposes and the insecurity of all roads. This state of affairs has necessarily adversely affected postal business, and explains the 9.8 per cent. decrease in the quantity of ordinary mail matter handled in the district. This percentage includes a drop (5 per cent.) in the number of newspapers posted, which, in great part, is due to some having ceased publication and others having restricted theirs, owing to the high cost of paper.

Dog doesn't or shouln't eat dog; but the last sentence, we must say, indicates a not unmixed evil. In justice also to South China it must be added that the northwest runs it close. We get this extraordinary note on Kansu:—

The continued financial embarrassment in Kansu hinders postal expansion. As explained in last year's report, there are no subsidiary coins in circulation and dollars are scarce; the medium of sale and purchase is sycee or copper coins, the latter so poorly minted as to be depreciated. Thus it happens that the tariff charge on an ordinary domestic letter is often about one-third of a workman's daily wage. In such circumstances of depression, no great advance can be looked for.

But wherever there is any measure of public protection or sense of administration, there the C.P.O. is alert to get trade. Even of Honan, where brigandage was notoriously prevalent for several months of the year, we read that the province has not only recovered its position in regard to the figures for mail matter posted, but has shown a good increase on the previous highest figures, namely, those for the year 1921. In the latter year the total number of articles posted was 14,900,000; in 1922 it fell to 13,300,000; but in 1923 it rose to 16,800,000.

The vast province of Szechuan was divided for the first time into Eastern and Western Districts as from April 1, 1923. The records for the remaining nine months in Eastern Szechuan show that Chungking City was besieged six times, the sieges lasting one day, nine days, six days, six days, 23 days, and three days, respectively, when shops were closed and business was at a standstill; and during four out of the six occasions communication with the other side was cut off. Fighting has been going on continuously in the district, and for the nine months under review no fewer than 155 cases of losses of mails have been recorded.

For all this the parcels service was kept busy, so much so that already the head office is proving too small and a new one must be built. Curiously enough Western Szechuan suffered much less from the fighting than Eastern—one might have thought that the dislocation of the latter district would have reacted on the latter, which moreover was neither free of bandits nor fighting. But we read:—

Although the conditions in the district have seriously hampered the safe and prompt transmission of heavy mails, the parcel traffic has shown continued prosperity. This is due, in the main, to the fact that bandits appear not to interfere with the mails to the same extent as they rob the merchants; in fact, 24,816 bags of heavy mails were transported from Chungking to Chengtu via Hochow, Sze., without any loss through robbery. Another very important factor in favour of the Post Office is the assistance given to the heavy mails by the authorities, even—in some cases—throughout the fighting zones.

In like manner one recalls the unwritten law that the financing of the silk trade in this province goes on uninterfered with, no matter what political disturbance is toward. For the thousandth time one exclaims, truly China is incomprehensible. One wonders what the British Post Office would say if called on to transport large quantities of tobacco leaves, sheep skins, feather dusters, cotton piece-goods, jade and deer horns. The C.P.O. carries all these and many others in its mail bags and asks for more, which every year merchants are the readier to give it.

THE FIGHT FOR LIFE IN CHINA

Aug. 27.

An acute observer of social conditions has pointed out that one of the chief causes of industrial unrest is the realization by the workers that the possession of capital puts an immense power into the hands of a very limited group of people. In feudal days the landless man was a serf, but his condition was infinitely better than that of the masterless man who had no caste and was relegated to the ranks of the pariah. The casual worker of to-day occupies the place of the landless man in feudal times and the unemployed man is little better than the masterless man of the olden days.

The poverty-line in China being much more clearly drawn than it is in Western lands the power of wealth is more sharply accentuated and the contrast between affluence and its opposite more easily marked. To illustrate the argument that the possession of wealth, or capital, means power we have but to glance at an extreme case. There are in Shanghai a multitude of little slave children. These mites had the misfortune to be born into homes where the struggle for existence was so keen that the addition of even one mouth to feed meant a diminution of the too scanty rations available for the other inmates. We may believe that parental love asserted itself though poverty not only came in at the door but had a permanent seat at the family table. When the little one had reached the marketable age of six or seven years it was not hard for those who cater for this evil trade and coin riches from misfortune to convince the hard-pressed paterfamilias that the lot of a slave girl in a home where food was abundant was infinitely preferable to a miserable existence in a hut where sans food, sans clothes, sans everything was the chronic condition of life. And so a bargain is struck. The home is enriched by the possession of a few rarely seen dollars. The middleman—or woman—makes a handsome profit on the sale of the little chattel to someone in need of a maidservant and the transfer from a hovel to a home is completed. It is not always an entirely bad bargain for the person chiefly concerned. Though the records of the Mixed Court show that sometimes the purchasers of these children are not humane enough to be entrusted with the absolute control of the life of a dog, much less of a human being, we would like to believe that, in many cases, the little slave girl has a merciful mistress. But even so, her life, liberty and happiness are at the entire disposal of another. The possession of $20 odd has made a stranger the arbiter of her fate and the absence of even a moiety of that sum has defrauded her of the rude shelter she called home. In the best circumstances her life is a hard one and in the worst it were better had she never been born.

To turn to another and less harrowing example. There are the usual labourers, ricsha pullers, dockers and the coolies we see at work on our roads. They are not bought and sold like the little unfortunates referred to above. They are not compelled to work; they are free to take the job offered or—or what? Or go hungry is surely the only possible answer. A missionary journal states that a worker upcountry was curious to know how the wages paid by the contractor who was carrying out building operations on the compound compared with the cost of living. He found that unskilled workers were paid an average wage of $3.90 per month and the cost of living for them was $4.88. To put it in round figures, the men earned $4 per month and it cost $5 to live. The wages earned provided them with only four-fifths of the food needed to keep them comfortably alive. Figures taken from an upcountry station would not be applicable to a treaty port; but, if wages are higher here, the cost of living is also proportionately increased so that, relatively, the situation is much the same everywhere. Workers at home used to say that for them there was but a fortnight between the workshop and the workhouse. There is not even a workhouse for the Chinese worker and we dare not contemplate his fate when sickness or unemployment falls to his lot. These things, at least, partly explain the inefficiency and high cost of Chinese unskilled labour. How can you get energy and initiative from an underfed man who can think of little but the unsatisfied craving at the pit of his stomach? They also explain why Bolshevism finds China such a fruitful field for propaganda. The masses may be as unthinking as they are sometimes called, but they have an unexpressed conviction that these things ought not so to be, that there is something wrong in a State where parents must sell their children and workmen barely earn enough to keep their heads above the starvation line.

It is easier to state a case of this kind than to suggest a remedy for it. Russia faced and tried to solve the same problem with results that were more disastrous to the sufferers than the wrongs under which they suffered in the days of the Tsars. In Britain a Labour Government is attempting a solution along what is called consitutional lines, with very indifferent success. Nevertheless the outlook is by no means hopeless. For the first time in history a general agreement has been reached that man, as man, has a right to live. If, through no fault of his own, he fall down in the industrial struggle like a broken down cab-horse then, like a broken down cab-horse, he must be helped to his feet and assisted into the shafts again. There is a world movement for the amelioration of the lot of those who are born to hard work and poverty.

The effects of the movement are visible even in China. There is a general tendency for wages to rise and were it not for the accidents of flood and famine and the still more disastrous effects of the widespread brigandage which has devastated whole areas in some provinces and prevented tillage in others, were the land but left in peace to produce the crops which nature so bountifully provides in this land where the ploughman overtakes the reaper, the cost of living might soon fall below the wages earned even by the casual worker. But that, as a certain writer says, "is another story."

THE WAR OUTLOOK

Aug. 28.

The progress of yesterday's news illustrates how important it is in times like the present not to give credence to a mere rumour and allow for a considerable discount even on what appears to be authentic. The day opened with wild reports. The Hangchow railway, one heard, had been cut at Kashing and the troops from Nanking would not allow it to be mended again. (How any troops from Nanking had got across so quickly and in sufficient numbers to Kashing to command the line, nobody cared to reflect.) Meanwhile, the story went, Shanghai-Nanking Railway Station had been seized and closed up by General Ho and his troops and all rolling stock commandeered in order to push soldiers up to Quinsan as quickly as possible. Actual inquiry reduces these stories to their proper proportions. A goods train was certainly derailed at Kashing early yesterday morning, but it is by no means certain that this was not an ordinary accident and there was certainly no difficulty whatever in putting matters right. There was some trouble at the S.N.R. station due to excessive zeal on the part of an indiscreet subordinate officer and one train was kept back, but this difficulty also was disposed of before the morning was over and the running of trains was duly resumed. Last but not least comes the news from a most authoritative source that no actual outbreak is expected for a week or ten days. If this expectation is realized—and we are bound to say that others put the limit at three days—the history of similar crises reminds us that many things may happen in a week.

We are certainly not going to commit the folly of attempting prophecy, and endeavouring to create a false sense of security which may be bitterly shattered. There is no question that large bodies of troops have been and are being moved from Nanking, at an expense which would hardly appear justified unless serious business were intended. And although there will certainly be reluctance on the part of the leaders on each side to take the responsibility of firing the first shot, when the rival troops get near each other, a brawl might very easily occur which would start fighting all along the line. But against this the issues involved are very big. It is not a case of a mere freebooting expedition between the two provinces, but of whether Marshal Wu Pei-fu shall control the whole of China north of the two Kuang provinces, which would enable him to carry out his long cherished design of a grand attack on Dr. Sun Yat-sen. If he succeeded in this, and before he could move on the South, it is inevitable that Marshal Chang Tso-lin would advance from Manchuria upon Peking. We then have to consider that President Tsao Kun would not relish such a possibility and will certainly do his best to prevent it; and secondly, that Marshal Wu Pei-fu himself may not feel strong enough and rich enough for so very big a game. There remains the consideration that Dr. Sun appears to be rather deeply involved in Canton with the Merchants' Volunteers and it is just possible that they may get rid of him on their own account without anybody from the North being troubled to intervene. The only possible conclusion is that bad as the situation appears to be, it is not yet irremediable.

THE OLYMPIC GAMES

Aug. 28.

With the world as it is at present it may seem strange that the good and patriotic men of the preceding generation should have believed that the spread of commerce, the constant and apparently friendly intercourse between citizens of different States, the ameliorating influence of religion and education, and the material advantages of peace, were speedily going to usher in an era of international peace and goodwill. But religion, education and self-interest all failed to prevent the great war with its disastrous consequences. It was also hoped that if young athletes of all nations were brought together in the friendly rivalry of sports it would tend to create a better general spirit, so the Olympic Games were started. Unfortunately, it has been found that international games may serve to inflame racial animosities rather than allay them. Because of the disgraceful scenes of the international contests in France last month, it is said that the Olympic Games will be discontinued.

To good sportsmen of every nation the abandonment will be very disappointing. Yet what else can be reasonably expected? The optimists are expecting too much from poor human nature. The very powerful social instinct or group-spirit which has led to the development of the national characteristics which distinguish and separate the nations from each other, and which binds the individuals of each nation firmly together for their common interest and glory, is almost certain to manifest itself in sporting contests as in warfare. It requires long and patient education and practical training to develop in a whole nation the chivalrous spirit which will keep this instinct under control, and produce the marks of the true sportsman. Among these are the ability to win without being inordinately elated; to accept defeat without grief and mortification, and to bear no ill-will; to scorn to take an unfair advantage when there is no danger of being found out; generously to applaud the good play of the other side; to refrain from trying to weaken the morale of opponents by abuse or ridicule. We may even go further and say that the perfect sportman would rather lose than win when his opponent was not at his best; just as Alfred Lyttelton, the famous all-round amateur, when playing for the lawn tennis championship years ago, extended the interval between games so that his rival, a much older man, might regain his strength. Lyttelton was defeated. It was incidents of this kind, even on the field of battle, which made our enemies say that the English were foolish but they were gentlemen. Of course we do not mean to say that every "Tommy," or mining footballer, is a perfect and gentle knight without reproach.

How is the true spirit of sportsmanship to be developed? One way is by the assiduous cultivation of a national game which inculcates the qualities desired. It is a large and debatable question, but we venture to say that in this respect no other game quite equals cricket, which can be played by all sorts and conditions of men. Lovers of baseball will say that cricket is exasperatingly slow and unexciting. So it may be at times, therefore it is all the better adapted to teach patience, endurance and self-control. And good cricketers, whether players or onlookers, do not care to deride their opponents' manner of play, their personal appearance, and the character of their ancestors; nor do cricketers attempt to murder the umpire when he gives a decision adverse to their side. However, nearly all games have their good points, even lawn bowls with its roundabout ways, and the game of croquet which our grandmothers played and quarrelled over when they were young, and found their long skirts very useful when the ball was near a wicket in an unfavourable position. After all, the thing is to play the game, whatever it is, and play it fairly and well.

Returning to the main point, it will be a pity if international games should be abandoned. Here in the Far East the Chinese and Japanese do not love each other very much, but it will make them more friendly if they can learn to compete with each other in athletic games. In drawing up the programme, however, we suggest that all games in which there is risk of personal violence should be omitted, such as football, boxing and fencing. It was these games which caused the whole of the trouble recently in France. It requires high qualities to receive an injury without feeling resentment. A clergyman, who subsequently became a bishop, was taking boxing lessons and received a clip more severe than was intended. He was furious and started to rain in blows as hard as he could. His instructor sternly told him to put down his hands and then gave him a lesson on the necessity of self-control. The bishop used to say it was the most valuable lesson he ever received. If parsons get mad when hurt, it is not surprising that others should sometimes lose their temper. One boxer at the recent Olympic games used his teeth vigorously on the anatomy of his opponents, which reminds one of "Old Bill" biting the ear of the horse that was running neck and neck with him.

When athletes of different nationalities can compete with goodwill in peaceful games it will be time to introduce the more provocative. It is all a matter of training. So let us hope that in a modified form international sporting contests will continue.

SHANGHAI AND THE WAR IMPENDING

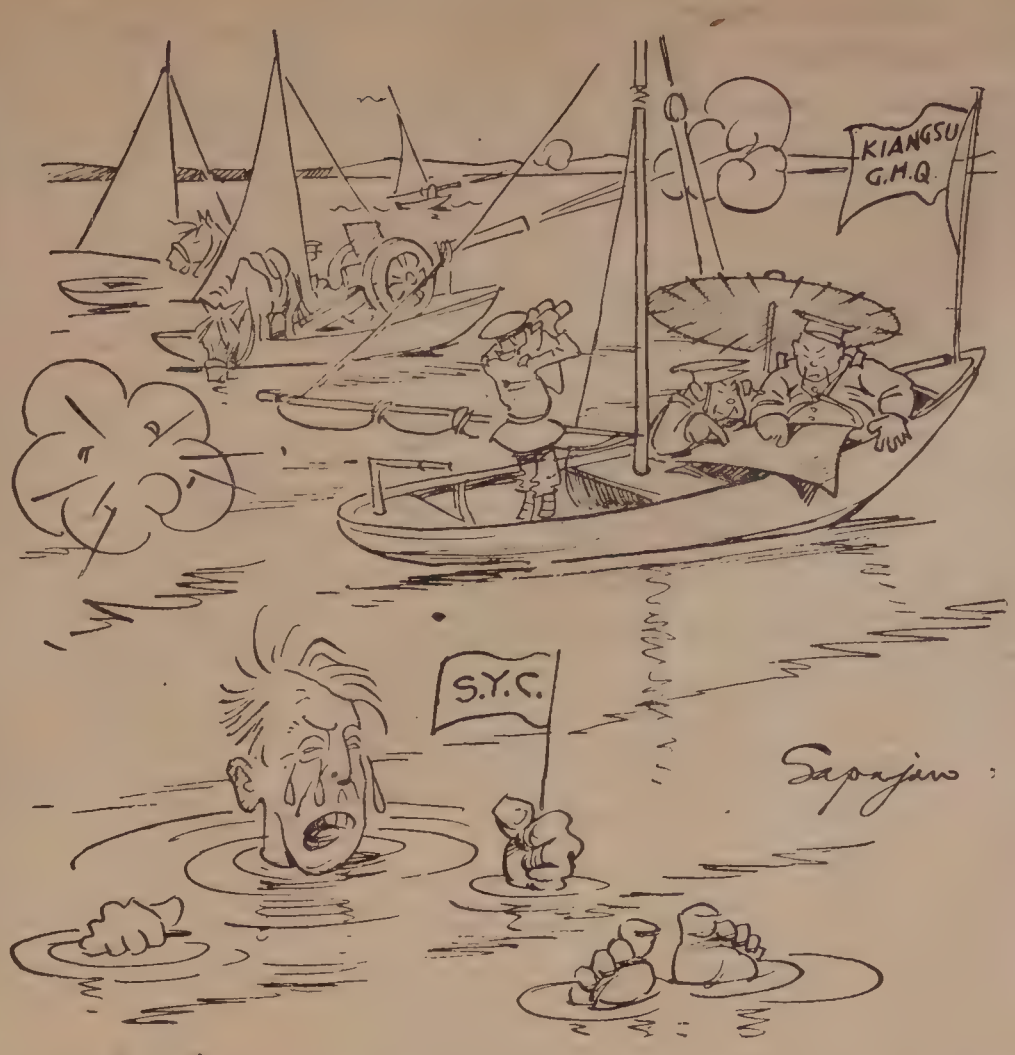
Aug. 29.

WITH the publication to-day of our special correspondent's extraordinarily interesting interview with Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan of Nanking, there can be no longer any doubt as to where matters stand between Kiangsu and Chêkiang. Marshal Chi has spoken with a frankness and sincerity which admits no question of his meaning. He has, so to speak, pushed the peace-makers out of doors and is determined on action. For upwards of ten years, he says, we have been talking of unification by peace and nothing has come of it but more disruption and disorder. "I am a man of peace. If we could unify China by peaceful methods, I should favour them. But one grows despairing as the years pass and the state of the country becomes steadily worse. The time comes when there must be action." In pursuance of this conviction Marshal Chi is concentrating an overwhelming force, which includes large numbers of Chihli troops sent to him by Marshal Wu Pei-fu, in the regions of Soochow and Quinsan. It appears that it is not his intention, as hitherto supposed, to attack Chêkiang from across the Taihu in the direction of Huchow and Kashing: in respect of these he stands strictly on the defensive. His great objective is Lunghua, the Arsenal, the whole of the Shanghai district: these, he says, are the cause of all friction and in them lies the success or failure of his plans.

It is no departure from the impartiality which we wish to preserve in the present conflict to say that there is much in what Marshal Chi states. Let us, for one moment, emphasize that in this particular quarrel, it is especially the duty of foreigners to remain neutral. The relationships of Shanghai with Marshal Chi and Marshal Lu have always been most agreeably cordial; and among the rulers of provinces in China they hold a deservedly high reputation for enlightenment and administrative ability. Therefore, the only feeling of foreigners in this unhappy crisis must be one of regret that the circumstances of China do not allow two such men to compound their differences for the benefit of the country otherwise than by force of arms. But without entering into the causes of the position, or expressing one word of comment upon them, it is without dispute an anomaly that the district of Shanghai, the jewel of Kiangsu, as Marshal Chi calls it, should be under the control of a ruler in whose domains it does not lie. Furthermore, inasmuch as such a position cannot but cause perpetual friction, there is a great deal in the contention that if the question cannot be settled by peaceful means, it had better be fought out once for all than continue to create a fresh scare every six months.

The one point of doubt is whether the question will really be fought out. Wars in China have an unfruitful habit of continuing only up to a certain point and then fizzling out in a compromise which satisfies nobody. In the present instance if Marshal Chi's campaign succeeds, and Marshal Lu, the last Anfu chieftain in Central China, is ousted from Chêkiang, it appears inevitable that a mighty clash must ensue between Marshal Wu Pei-fu and Marshal Chang Tso-lin. At present, the floods in north China are likely to prevent the latter from moving. But it is hardly believable that he would long endure the supremacy over all North and Central China of the man for whom he has so deep an animosity. Are we really about to witness a fight to a finish at last, the final "show-down" in China? If we venture to express the hope that we are, it is with full consciousness of the heavy toll which the conflict must impose on all the Chinese people. Surely it is a choice of evils, and nothing could well be worse than the continued lawlessness, brigandage, and personal suffering, which now blights every home and blocks every avenue of progress in China.

There is one aspect of what Marshal Chi says in which the foreigners of Shanghai are deeply concerned and on which they have a right to make their voices heard. Marshal Chi says, in effect, that Shanghai is a hotbed of political intrigue, which more than any other place contributes to keep China in a state of chaos. That is what the foreign community of Shanghai has long felt and the thing which it deeply resents, while at the same time it does not see how it may be prevented. It is probably no exaggeration to say that since the famous plottings of Huang Hsing, Chen Chi-mei, and Sun Yat-sen, which culminated in the Revolution of 1913, no important conspiracy or cabal has occurred in China which was not engineered from the asylum of Shanghai; and when the Kuomintang in Canton wrote to the Shanghai branch the manifesto which we published a few weeks ago, with the injunction under no conditions to make any trouble in Shanghai and emphasizing its perpetual desire to be on good terms with foreigners, the plain English of the statement was undoubtedly that if Kuomintang men made themselves obnoxious in Shanghai, they would promptly be expelled from it, and would find it most inconvenient to be deprived of such excellent shelter for the hatching of their plots. Now it may again be emphasized that Shanghai is a commercial community, founded for the purpose of commerce, and most anxious to avoid political complications. Our difficulty has been, and is, that in the present state of China we may hesitate to hand over the representatives of one Chinese political party to those of any other. So long as they behave themselves as peaceable citizens, we can no more interfere with their presence here, than with peaceful shopkeepers and ricsha coolies. If there were, however, a government which all China upheld, the situation would be greatly simplified, and we do not suppose that that government would find any reluctance on Shanghai's part to assist it in the suppression of political conspiracy. As yet such a government does not appear. Is it possible that it lies at the end of the inter-provincial conflict which now occupies all thoughts?



With the advance of armies on Shanghai the votaries of a popular pastime may possibly find their occupation gone

TRADEMARK THEFT AND PENALTIES

Aug. 30.

THE article which we published on Thursday dealing with the inadequacy of penalties available at the Mixed Court for infringement of trademarks has naturally attracted wide attention. In that article it was pointed out that whereas a wretched coolie, who yields to a sudden temptation to steal five dollars, goes to prison for a month, a man who has devoted long time and thought to counterfeiting a trademark, thereby robbing both manufacturer and public, gets off with a $100 fine, which is probably far less than his illicit profit in a single day. In ancient times counterfeiters of trademarks were executed or had their right hands cut off. We would not, certainly, advocate such savage penalties as these. But if the Trademark Bureau is to give the protection it professes, it must certainly see to it that the courts are armed with terrors for infringement greater than a mere fine.

The writer of the article makes no mistake when he prescribes imprisonment as the only cure for infringers of trademarks, as the mind, actions and character of a person who sets out to rob others of their rights and property, in this insidious way are base and bad. The infringer is no respector of persons, in that he takes advantage of both the maker of branded goods and the public, who, in these days of easy shopping facilities, place every reliance in retailers of proprietary brands, to provide the genuine article. Every manufacturer of commodities that are worth imitating finds himself sooner or later confronted with the problem of deception or mistaken identity. No sooner has a manufacturer perfected his goods and created a demand for them, than some pirate begins to scheme how he may participate in what does not belong to him, and the consumers suffer accordingly. The public must be protected at all costs against these trade parasites and the law ought to be dealt out with a strong arm to all persons who for the sake of personal gain, plots to rob others. A special injustice from the manufacturers point of view, is that the infringer usually disposes of his inferior goods at lower prices, consequently spoiling the market for both the makers of the genuine article and the respectable shopkeepers who are willing to supply the public with the correct goods.

A trade name or mark is the only thing a manufacturer has to rely upon, apart from the high quality of his goods, and the good will of the consumer, to ensure for himself and his work people a safe and regular business. It is therefore not unreasonable to ask that the law shall deal with fraud in this respect with proper severity.

A member of the American Bar has said that,

"While agreeing that infringers are known the world over as trademark pirates, their conduct is only comparable with the variety of dishonesty exemplified by the humble individual who steals doormats, or picks pockets."

"To call the modern infringer a pirate is to pay him a compliment he does not deserve: he is no such hardy ruffian: he is a sneak thief, a confidence man just as dishonest, no doubt, as a real man thief, but less admirable."

This expression of opinion no doubt fits the American pirate. But we feal fairly confident that if this lawyer had had as much experience of the Chinese pirate as some people in Shanghai have had, he might be much more eloquent and would certainly be far more severe. For the Chinese forger is the most cunning infringer of trademarks in the world. The country he operates in, and the ramified methods of conducting business between shroffs, dealers and commission agents who buy and sell to outports and interior towns, are all in his favour in successful piracy of trademarks and he takes every advantage of the fact. The remedy appears to lie in owners of trademarks in Shanghai banding together in order to bring such influence to bear as will provide the courts with adequate penalties for infringement of trademarks, something that the guilty will really fear. To fine infringers in China for piracy of trademarks, is like trying to tickle an elephant's ribs with an ostrich feather.

PEKING, Aug. 24.—General Hu Ching-yi, Commandant of the 1st Special Division, arrived in Peking this morning and will have an audience with the President to-morrow. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

LT. R. R. Lyle has been appointed to the flagship Hawkins for duty with the China Squadron for Fleet physical and recreational duties from the date of joining. Lt. Lyle was appointed a naval cadet in 1907, and reached his present rank in September, 1916. He specialized in physical training some years ago, and saw much service with destroyers during the late war.

A Peking news agency alleges that foreign lawers who practice in the Mixed Court have sent representatives to Peking to urge the Diplomatic Corps to refuse China's request to turn over the Court unless there are changes in the proposed regulations. Peking papers declare that the Court is corrupt and that foreign lawyers have refused to permit Chinese lawyers to obtain any practice, which is a libel on the Court and lawyers. Chinese lawyers are insisting on the return under the terms proposed.

IN the presence of a large gathering of officials at Government House, Hongkong, on Tuesday last, the Governor (Sir R. E. Stubbs) conferred on Police-Inspr. Mohinder Singh the title of Sirdar Sahib and on Inspr. Nawab Khan that of Khan Sahib. His Excellency bestowed the titles on behalf of the Viceroy of India. Both titles are much coveted by Indians and can be gained by military and civil servants alike. Many privileges go with them. For instance a Sirdar Sahib or a Khan Sahib can carry firearms without the usual special permit. In his own district such a man is looked upon as one of the leaders of the community. He holds the right to be asked to all official meetings held in that district, and when he goes to Court he is entitled to have a seat reserved for him.

CAPT. Layton, commander of the British squadron which arrived at Copenhagen recently, has told the story of his escape from internment at the Marine Barracks, Copenhagen, after his submarine, E 13, was sunk by the Germans in August, 1915. He gave the requisite three days' notice of withdrawing his word of honour not to attempt to escape, and on the night of October 30 went to bed early, ostensibly because of influenza. He hastily put on an old uniform of a Danish sailor while the guard was on an errand, descended from the window by the aid of a rope, and passed through the kitchen, the cook pretending not to see him. He negotiated the docks and swam the canal, and then took the ferry across the harbour to the centre of Copenhagen, where a Norwegian friend was waiting for him with civilian clothes. Capt. Layton reached Bergen and joined a British submarine 14 days after the escape.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

If Only It Were So!

"The Industrial and Labour Information," a publication issued by the International Labour Office of the League of Nations, in recording the sessions of the League's labour organization, says:

"Mr. Hsiao (Government delegate, China) said that since the Washington Conference great progress had been made in the social field in China. He referred in particular to the Decree of March 29, 1923, embodying various measures for labour regulation, and added that China intended to do all in her power to promote social progress."

Mr. Hsiao's statement will be greeted by all friends of China enthusiastically, for there is much room for progress in labour legislation in this country and for the betterment of social conditions. The regulations to which he referred are well-written and deal with the subject fully. But it would also be interesting to find instances where the regulations were made effective and where anything has been done by any agency of the Chinese Government to improve the condition of the Chinese worker. In a recent leader, we called attention to the need for the Chinese Government to do something in this field and expressed the hope that the authorities of Kiangsu and Chêkiang provinces would take steps to co-operate with the authorities of Shanghai for making effective the recommendations in the report of the Child Labour Commission of the Shanghai Municipal Council. Thus far, there are no evidences of such co-operation being forthcoming. The labourer of China is still the hewer of wood he always was, except infinitely worse, for in his village he was under the paternalistic care of a clan chief. Now nobody cares for him.

Crime as an Asset

There has been a tendency at Home in recent years for some newspapers—particularly a certain section of the Sunday press—to place the convicted murderer and the criminal before the public in such a light as to suggest that having committed a specially brutal murder or being an undoubted criminal or a wholesale swindler constitutes as much a virtue as a fault, and that the person who commits a grave offence against society far from being a villain, is something of a hero. Readers of Home newspapers have been treated, during the last few years, to the reminiscences of murderers waiting to be hanged and of convicted criminals serving their sentences, so much so that one is constrained to wonder whether possession of a criminal bent is not actually an asset, after all. A few weeks ago a man named Vaquier was condemned to death for murdering an innkeeper, with whose wife he had been maintaining an immoral liaison, by putting strychnine in his health-salts. Murder by poisoning, as the judge pointed out to Vaquier when passing sentence, is the basest and most detestable of all crimes. It invariably is accompanied by a cold, calculating, cruel cunning; is infinitely worse morally than killing a person in the heat of an argument or quarrel; and places the murderer in a cowardly, contemptible class of his own, quite beyond the pale of reasonable men and women. Yet what do we find? No sooner has Vaquier been condemned than a Sunday paper comes out with a character sketch of him, presented glaringly and in such a manner as to indicate that Vaquier, condemned for one of the most horrible of all crimes, is a much-misunderstood man, possessing most of the essential virtues. There is no mention of the detestable deed for which he was sentenced to die. The headlines to the article—"Dreamer, Humorist and Man of Affairs: Versatile Frenchman Writes in Brixton about Blue Anchor, 'I Pray for Pardon and Pardon Those Who Harm Me"—are sufficiently startling; but when the journal goes on to quote some high-sounding poetry the man has written, and tells us that he is "an alert, good-looking smart man of affairs," that "he adds to his social attractions a keen sense of homour," that "his signature is a work of art, embellished with more flourishes than Charles Dickens' own," that "no one with a commonplace mind could use a signature like that," and that "he is persevering and headstrong", we begin to wonder whether we have not made a mistake and that instead of reading about a murderer of the basest kind we are being given a pen-picture of some noble character. Truly, if there is much more of this kind of thing, the cult of murder and lesser crime would appear to have a promising field of its own, not completely unallied with some sorts of journalism.

Industrial Peace.

Especially noteworthy and significant, in these days when there is so much feeling between some of the trades unions and employers of labour at Home, was a gathering which took place at the Hotel Cecil last month, the occasion being an "industrial peace luncheon," held with a view to emphasize the excellent relations which exist between shipowners and seasmen in the United Kingdom. It may not generally be realized that the seamen—the men who actually manned and took to sea the ships without which the war could not have been prosecuted for a month—constituted one of the very few sections of British labour which did not threaten to strike or actually resort to striking in order to force demands for increased wages during those vital years of war. It would be untrue to assert that the seamen did not demand more wages, because they did, and although at times the relations between shipowners and seamen were under a heavy cloud, wise counsel on both sides, conjunctly with a realization on the part of the seamen that whatever real or imaginary grievances they had they could not shatter the very fabric of the nation by striking, always resulted in matters being adjusted without any cessation of the activities of Britain's Mercantile Marine. In this connexion the National Maritime Board, a body composed of representatives of the Board of Trade, Shipowners, masters and deck and engineer officers, and the seamen's organizations, has been of incalculable value, enabling, as it has done time and again, demands, complaints and differences to be discussed amicably and settled peacefully. At the gathering referred to above Lord Inchcape expressed the hope that the happy and successful negotiation of matters which at times had been in dispute in the shipping industry gave promise that a new spirit of conciliation and compromise between employers and employed might eventually spread. Mr. Havelock Wilson, M.P., one of the ablest and most level-headed labour leaders in the world to-day, who combines an unswerving allegiance to labour and its true ideals with an appreciation of the fact that there are two sides to every dispute, and who, wielding tremendous individual power has never yet used that power to the disorganization of industry, was in complete agreement, and made the apposite statement that "the greatest compliment that can be paid to a trade union is that it can maintain the standard of conditions of its members without involving them in unfortunate disputes." The British nation owes a great debt to its merchant navy, not only for what it did in the war, but also for what it might have done but refrained, at times subjugating personal interest to patriotism. The British seamen and the British shipowners have set and are setting, a lead which might be followed to national advantage by those concerned in other branches of industry in which disputes are frequent.

A Triangular Fight in Canton

The situation in Canton at present appears to be one of very great importance. While the strike in Shameen is over, and the servants are reported to be devoting themselves anew to their work, with an energy which shows their disgust at having for so long been made the catspaw of the Communist, the struggle between Dr. Sun Yat-sen and the Merchants' Volunteers would seem to be as acute as ever. Popular movements in China against bad government have to be estimated cautiously; for the amount of oppression with which the Chinese will put up from their rulers is really miraculous. For the moment Dr. Sun's government seems to be strong enough to hold on to the arms and ammunition which the Volunteers ordered and imported in quite orthodox style from Europe: at least, if the arms are to be given back to the Volunteers, it is apparently to be at a price fixed by the Government. This naturally will hardly satisfy the Volunteers To-day's news brings a fuller account of allegations made by Dr. Sun against Mr. Chan Lim-pak, compradore of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, and Commandant of the Volunteers, of his plotting to overthrow Dr. Sun, and unite Canton with Peking. And it is evident that Dr. Sun's agents will not rest until they have got their claws on Mr. Chan. Thus we have signs of a triangular duel in Canton. The strength of the Communist Party, antagonistic to Dr. Sun, was clearly shown during the recent strike in Shameen; now we also have the Merchants' Volunteers, who are certainly confident enough in themselves to take a very bold stand. Next to the arms question that of paper money is the most peculiar at the moment, and we hear of a strike among the native banks and exchange shops. Without exaggeration, the oppressiveness of the Military Government and its rapacity in taxation, have for a year past been growing less and less endurable. It really looks as if the worm had turned at last.

Harbour Dangers

Much has been achieved recently by the under-staffed and overworked River Police in the way of diminishing the nuisance and the danger of waste oil being pumped into the river by ships at anchor there, but they have not by any means succeeded in putting a stop to it altogether. The members of the Yacht Club—really quite nice people, who do try to be kind and well-behaved, in spite of what some people have said about them—had a race down river on Sunday morning and just after passing Pootung Point they sailed into a regular sea of oil. Three big ships were surrounded by it, but as there was a good tide running it could not be suggested that they were the offenders. Anyway, it was not a case where a person, had it been possible to bring a charge against any individual, could have said that he simply dropped a pint or two overboard, for many gallons must have been turned into the river. Coming back, the fleet met another nuisance. The Chinese for several days have been paying joss to the typhoon god and their pantomime has grown more elaborate with each succeeding day. On Sunday there was a big decorated launch towing a long string of sampans, also decorated and laden with discordant instruments and men to perform thereon. Also they had a number of flaming braziers and heaps of straw balls soaked with some inflammable compound. These balls were fired and dropped overboard at regular intervals as the launch steamed round and about the harbour, there being at times 50 or more flaming balls drifting about on the water. Add the oil to the fireballs and one does not want to say much more. There cannot be a ship's officer of any degree who does not know the dangers attendant on throwing waste oil into harbours, nor one who does not know that it is a punishable offence in any country and it might be thought more consideration would be shown for other ships and people, if not for themselves, in a harbour so inadequately policed. As for the second part of the nuisance, of course it is beyond question that the energetic pantomime achieved its purpose. That is amply proved by the fact that, although so many typhoons have menaced Shanghai, not one has hit the port. Yet we might take a chance that the god would not feel very hurt if the fireballs were left out.

"Flannelled Fools"

A never-failing trait of the average Englishman abroad is the interest he takes in the national games at Home—soccer and rugger in the winter and cricket in the summer. At the end of April we were kept in suspense right till the last League matches of the season before knowing which teams were destined for promotion and which for relegation, and an equal amount of uncertainty exists at the present time in regard to the County Cricket Championship. Last week Yorkshire, last season's champions, again went to the head of the table, and though the results of this week's matches, published in another column, contain surprises in the defeat of Yorkshire by their old opponents Surrey, and of the victory of lowly-placed Gloucestershire over Middlesex, Yorkshire's most dangerous opponents, the relative positions at the head of the table remain comparatively unchanged, with Yorkshire leading with 74.28 per cent., Middlesex second with 71.58, Lancashire third with 67.82 and Surrey fourth with 65.55. Before the season ends next week, Yorkshire have to play Hants and Sussex, both dangerous opponents and both matches in the South; Surrey have to meet Leicestershire at the Oval and Middlesex at Lord's; Lancashire have to meet Sussex and Kent; while Middlesex have only the lone game with Surrey. The combination of possibilities from these matches lends a delightful uncertainty to the Championship, and though, on form, Yorkshire should win the matches against Hants and Sussex (despite Tate and Gilligan), the glorious uncertainty of the game was never given more scope than at present. A few possibilities may be of interest: If Yorkshire win both matches the resultant percentage of 76.52 will be unassailable; if one match is won and the other lost it comes down to 72.17; while if both are lost it dwindles further to 67.83. Middlesex get a percentage of 73 if they beat Surrey, and 68 if they lose to them. If Lancashire win both their matches they get 70.40 per cent, and if Surrey win their two they get 69.00 per cent. These figures appear somewhat involved, but a careful consideration of them will show that it is possible for any one of the four counties mentioned to finish on top.

Commercializing Murder

In England during recent months there have been two sordid and disgusting murders—the one in which the man Vaquier poisoned a man with whose wife he was carrying on an immoral liaison; the second the brutal murder and subsequent dismemberment of a young woman by a married man named Mahon. We have commented already on the manner in which a section of the Sunday press at Home has made capital out of Vaquier in publishing such an account of the man and his ideals as to present him in the light of a high-minded person worthy of the regard of all and sundry. That was bad enough, but the latest pappers from England bring news of the manner in which the murder by Mahon is being commercialized in the most shamefaced way. It will be remembered by those who have read an account of the case that the murder was committed late at night in a bungalow at Crumbles, near Eastbourne, where the dismembered body was found. We now read that remarkable scenes have been taking place at the bungalow, the owner of which, a Mrs. Hutchinson, has thrown it open to the public for inspection at 1s. a head. It is stated that for this repulsive, disgusting entertainment between 500 and 1,000 persons come every day and that the number is limited only by the capacity of the bungalow for holding visitors, who wait in a long queue for admittance. A refreshment stall has been erected at the entrance, where bars of "rock" bearing the words "Crumbles Bungalow Rock" are on sale, and, with ice-cream carts in the vicinity, the whole place has the atmosphere of a fair-ground, instead of the scene of one of the most horrid murders committed in England for many years. It is possible that no harm is done in thus commercializing the place, but it shows without doubt or cavil that there are many people who delight in sordid, tragic things, untouched by that feeling known as good taste, and unimbued, it is be supposed, with that quality of humanness which most people possess and which causes them to look on repulsive things with repulsion and not consider them as a means of attraction.

Arthur Mometer

As some of our readers continue to be worried over the temperature readings taken in the Cathedral compound—some indeed would almost seem to feel it as a personal grievance that these are usually lower than Siccawei's the following facts may be of interest. Quite recently we bought a new thermometer for the box in the Cathedal compound, and before installing it we asked Siccawei Observatory to test it, which with their invariable courtesy the fathers readily did. In sending us back the thermometer they write that it has been compared with an English instrument that comes from Kew Observatory "The readings," their letter continues, "practically agree. The thermometer you send us is quite a good one, especially for an instrument of which the divisions are not engraved on the glass. The differences of four degrees shown between our readings at the Observatory and those that you have made are not at all extraordinary; the construction of thermometrical shetters demands, in fact, very special conditions which are not identical in any two cases. There can also quite easily be a real difference between the temperature in the middle of Shanghai and that at Siccawei." (Incidentally, the writer perfectly recalls that some years ago when he lived in Paris, where it can be very hot in summer, it was often three or four degrees hotter at Auteuil outside the city, than, say, on the boulevards: why it should be hotter in the country than in the midst of bricks and mustar we do not pretend to say, but so it was). After this testimonial from Siccawei, we hope the honour of our readings is vindicated.

A Bird's-eye View

It has been said that to appreciate a city, one must look upon it from a height. Certain cities, like Kobe and Hongkong, are fortunate in that their founders elected to build them around the bases of hills. Today these serve as vantage points from which the city-dweller may view in its entirety the city wherein he has his being, and the meandering tourist see what he has come to see. Until now, Shanghai has been noticeably lacking in its supply of "views;" indeed, little thought has been given as to what sort of an impression the Settlement's numerous visitors carry away with them. The activities in the streets and the prosperous appearance of The Bund may give them some idea of what we like to think of as "the importance of Shanghai", yet they must leave, as most residents remain, with the vaguest of ideas as to the physical appearance of the Settlement, seen as a whole. The "North-China Daily News" new building supplied in a measure what was lacking—a vantage point. Comparatively speaking, it is the "skyscraper" of Shanghai at present, and it is doubtful if higher buildings will be attempted. The roof of the "North-China" building provides an excellent sightseeing place and full advantage may now be taken of it. A weekly "Visitors' Day" will be arranged, but in the meantime any who desire may avail themselves of the opportunity to view the city from the roof. It is requested that application be made to the General Office.

Maxime Debetur

We consider it a public albeit an objectionable one, to draw public attention to a nauseous case which was heard in the Mixed Court yesterday. A Chinese cook in the employ of a European gentleman was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for exposing indecent pictures to a little girl, the daughter of his master, aged four and a half years. The child was between his knees and he was engaged in drawing these pictures when fortunately the master of the house appeared on the scene. The cook took up a carving knife, whereupon his master hit him under the chin and disarmed him, subsequently taking him to the nearest police station. In the course of the case it was stated that he had had similar trouble with a coolie, whom he had also thrashed and kicked out of the house. Many parents in China, particularly those new to the country, are dangerously lax in the watch they keep on their servants and children, and it is in the hope of awakening the attention of these that we mention a case which, in ordinary circumstances, we would gladly not publish.

PEKING, Aug. 19.—The Cabinet meeting this morning resolved to accept the resignation of Mr. Chen Lu as Chinese representative on the League of Nations. Fukien General's Eyes Said to Be Fixed on Kiangsi Not on Chekiang: Wu Pei-fu a Former Pupil of Lu Yung-hsiang: Nanking Expected to Await Issue in Kiangsi

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Aug. 20.

The report that Sun Chuan-fang's troops have come into collision with the Kiangsi forces strengthens the apprehension felt by the vernacular press that a war between Kiangsu and Chêkiang is brewing. For several days now the newspapers have taken a serious view of the forebodings from the two provinces, and even though the official view is not so alarmist, the shock has been registered on the money market of the capital, causing the quotations of Government bonds to fall and the exchange market to close altogether.

The Tuchunship of Kiangsi

If the development on the Kiangsi-Fukien border turns out to be as reported, the situation is following the lines which have been foreshadowed for the last six months. Even before that it was felt that the first shock-absorber would be the province of Kiangsi, whose Governor, Tsai Cheng-tsun, is now full to repletion with the ill-gotten wealth of poppy cultivation, and who has been marked down for removal by the Chihli party for several months. Some time ago, it will be recalled, Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan came to an understanding with Sun Chuan-fang whereby it was agreed that each would help the other in the attainment of his ambition. When Li Hou-chi was ejected from Fukien province, Sun had to be content with the Defence Commissionership of the Fukien-Kuangtung border, leaving Chou Yin-jen to reap the major rewards of the coup in Foochow itself. This of course was not exactly to Sun's liking, and ever since he has been nourishing a desire for a real live Tuchunship. His eyes fell on Kiangsi, where Tsai had about come to the end of his tether, and his understanding with Chi had as its objective the capturing of that satrapy.

Nanking Preparations

What was Chi's part of the bargain? The Nanking Tuchun is cleverer than most of his confrères of the Tuchunate, and his scheme is to surround Chêkiang with hostile forces so as to enmesh Lu Yung-hsiang at his own convenience. The time for action will be ripe when Sun is safely installed on the western flank, and not until then, say authoritative Chinese circles in the capital, will Chi risk a collision with the Hangchow chieftain.

Undoubtedly Nanking is quietly preparing for the trouble that seems to be impending. It is known that Marshal Chi has made requests to the Government for aeroplanes and airmen, and the writer's information is that the latter are making preparations to leave Peking at a moment's notice. But all this activity is not induced merely by the presence on Chêkiang soil of the few thousand soldiers of Tsang Chi-ping and Yang Hua-chao. That of course is a provocation not only to Chi but to Wu Pei-fu, but in itself it would not be worth bothering about. Marshal Chi would have pursued his plans for the checkmating of Chêkiang without the help of this incident, and if it had not been for the restraining influence of Wu Pei-fu would probably have applied a match to the pile many months ago.

Wu Not Too Fond of Chi.

It is in the attitude of Wu Pei-fu that observers are most interested. It is not very long ago that the Loyang General applied the brake to Nanking aspirations, principally because there was a doubt in Wu's mind about Chi's loyalty to himself. It is said in Peking that Chi has now come back to the Chihli fold, without conditions but with renewed hopes, and that Wu has restored him to his confidence and trust.

It is plain that Chi's manœuvres have the support of Wu Pei-fu. The Loyang militarist is more and more determined to get rid of Tsai Cheng-tsun, and he would like to see him replaced by Sun Chuan-fang, to whom he is indebted for his services in Fukien. And in the work of the future the goodwill of Chi is almost indispensable. In the event of Sun making a bid for the Kiangsi job—and in the light of the present demoralization of the Kiangsi troops and Tsai's satiety, he should meet with little opposition—Wu would then leave it to the Sun-Chi combination to work out their plan of co-operation in ousting Lu out of Chêkiang, without, however, losing his interest in the undertaking should the enterprise show signs of failure. The Loyang coffers are seriously depleted as a result of the Chihli party's adventures in western China; their condition disposes one to the belief that Wu would like to rest awhile before embarking on any further expedition.

Moreover, although Wu Pei-fu cannot regard Lu Yung-hsiang in any favourable light, still the fact remainst that he is the protégé or "pupil" of the Chêkiang governor. In modern China this relationship may not involve the allegiance that was formerly demanded of it, but it still remains an important factor in Chinese life. General Wu is a stickler for the customs of his country. His loyalty to the President is one example of his regard for the tie that binds them. The same tie binds him to Lu Yung-hsiang, and it will take some straining before it is severed by the spilling of blood. Not only so, but the Loyang General is himself the patron or "teacher" of many Generals in China. If he were to violate the code, hé could not hope indefinitely to maintain the respect of those of his supporters who are in the same position toward him as he is toward General Lu.

This is not intended to show that the tie will never be broken. Republican history is proof that such connexions are easily dissolved "in the interests of the country." To that end all codes seem to be subordinate, for military expediency, its other name, is as inexorable in China as it is anywhere else. But Wu's policy, now that he has come to an understanding with Chi, is to support Nanking aspirations without himself taking part in the conflict, or directly encouraging it. At the same time, should the Shanghai provinces be involved in war, the fuse of another Chihli-Fengtien fight may be ignited, and then Wu Pei-fu would have to throw the whole of his forces into the struggle, which, when it comes, will be no week-end affair. The rumblings from the southeast are certainly disquieting.

AMERICAN AMBASSADOR TO JAPAN

Appointment of Mr. Bancroft

Washington, Aug. 26.

It is expected that Mr. Edgar A. Bancroft, the well-known Chicago lawyer, will shortly be appointed American Ambassador to Japan.

It is understood that Tokyo, which has been sounded regarding the acceptability of the appointment, has decided to reply favourably.—Reuter's American Service.

CHINA AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Her Desire for a Seat on the Council

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, July 23.

It is quite clear that at the coming meeting of the League of Nations Assembly at Geneva, China will make an effort to recover her position on the Council of the League of Nations. Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires, has been recently both speaking and writing in very able fashion on the issues involved.

It is understood that the British Delegation will support, as in 1923 and 1922, the application of the geographical principle to the election of members of the Council, but it is further possible that this year there will be a specific proposal to add to the numbers of the Council, thus making it eight instead of six.

China's Point of View.

Curiously enough, the League of Nations Union does not seem to be very helpful in its attitude towards this geographical principle of allocation, since there was recently a meeting of the Association of the various Unions at Lyons, at which the Chinese Delegation put forward the following resolution. There was a good deal of opposition to this proposal, and the British League of Nations Union joined in it, but eventually the resolution was carried. It ran:—

Animated by a spirit of equity and justice, guided by a single-minded regard for Universal Peace, desiring to avoid the adoption of a policy of detachment on the part of certain great Powers towards the League of Nations, resulting solely from the non-observance of a principle recognized on several occasions by the Society itself, the Chinese Delegation to the eighth meeting of the Union of the League of Nations Associations reques the Conseil-Général of the Union as well as the Assembly itself to authorize the General Secretary of the Union to transmit in their names to the Council of the Eighth Assembly of the Society of Nations, the following Resolution:—

"The Eighth Assembly of the Union of the League of Nations Associations congratulates the Assembly of the League of Nations on having adopted unanimously in 1920, and renewed in 1921, 1922 and 1923 the following expression of opinion:—

"It is desirable that the Assembly, in the election of the 6 non-permanent members of the Council, should make its selection with due regard to dominant geographical divisions, large ethnical families, different religious traditions, different types of civilization and principal sources of wealth.

"It regrets that the fourth Assembly of the League of Nations, whilst having unanimously approved this expression of opinion, which contains a principle eminently just and equitable, took no account of it in actual practice. In view of the very justifiable aspirations of several hundred millions of Asiatics who desire to see themselves represented by a non-permanent member on the Council of the League of Nations, and in the interest of the League of Nations itself, the Eighth Assembly of the Union of the League of Nations Associations respectfully recommends the League of Nations to revert, in the near future, to a more just application of the principle of geographical distribution abovementioned.

"The Secretary General of the Union is authorized to communicate with the General Secretary of the League of Nations to ensure that this recommendation is distributed officially to all the members of the League of Nations by the General Secretariat of the League of Nations in the form of the document of the Fifth Assembly of the League of Nations."

A Question in the House.

The following question and answer bear on the subject—I take them from "Hansard" this week:—

Sir Walter de Frece, M.P., asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the fact that, at the annual meeting of the Association of the League of Nations Unions at Lyons, a proposal favouring the adoption of the geographical principle in respect of the election of non-permanent members of the Council of the League was rejected; whether the British delegation to the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva has always supported the adoption of this principle in filling the seats specified; whether this is still the policy of the British Government and will be recommended to its delegates to the coming meeting of the Assembly in September; and whether the British Government has any responsibility for the resolutions or recommendations of the British League of Nations Unions?

Mr. Ponsonby: My information, taken from the French Press, is that a resolution of the kind referred to was adopted and not rejected. The answer to the second and third parts of the question is in the affirmative, subject to the proviso that the geographical factor is only one of several to be considered. His Majesty's Government have, of course, no responsibility whatever for the actions of any League of Nations Union.

Withdrawal Advocated by M.P.'s Unless Seat on Council Is Restored

Peking, Aug. 23.

A group of members has submitted a motion in the House of Representatives demanding withdrawal of China from the League of Nations unless China is again given a seat on the Council at the forthcoming meeting of the League. The motion mentions that China's annual contribution to the expenses of the League is Gold $340,000 which is only exceeded by the contributions of Britain and France. It asserts that the League has accepted the principle of geographical representation on the Council for non-permanent members and points out that Asia is not thus represented now. The members, therefore, contend that China is entitled to re-election.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE DEADLOCK AS TO THE PREMIERSHIP

Suggested Solution: Cancellation of Dr. Koo's Appointment a First Move

Peking, Aug. 23.

The so-called neutral members of the House of Representatives, headed by Mr. Yung Tze-kuang, have worked out a scheme which they think will result in settling the deadlock regarding the appointment of Dr. W. W. Yen as Premier. Having in mind the fact that the Opposition has recently insisted upon cancellation of the appointment of Dr. Wellington Koo as Taili Premier (which would have left the Government open to the charge of unconstitutional action) as a preliminary to voting on Dr. Yen's nomination, the Neutrals propose to have this cancellation motion and the appointment of Dr. Yen placed on the agenda of the House for the same day. Then, when the House meets, the cancellation motion would come forward first and be referred to the Investigation Committee for investigation and report. The Committee would not submit its report for several days, and the vote on the appointment of Dr. Yen would be taken immediately the House referred the first motion to the committee.

The promoters of this scheme will meet representatives of the Government Party and the Opposition this afternoon. If this meeting proves satisfactory the scheme will be referred to Dr. Yen.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA'S NEGLECTED ORCHARDS

Peking University's Efforts to Improve Horticultural Development

Peking, Aug. 22.

In spite of China's ancient civilization and the high esteem with which her citizens regard fruit as an article of diet and a necessary part of every feast, the growing of fruit of high quality has been neglected, and little has been done in the way of fruit preserving.

To meet this very definite need Peking University (Yenching) is planning to do extensive work in horticultural development, particularly along pomological lines. Courses are to be given on the principles and practices of gardening as applied to fruits and vegetables, the special requirements of these crops, and propagation and pest control. Special attention will be paid to fruit growing and the care of orchard trees and small fruits, harvesting, storing, marketing and work in budding, grafting, cultivation and spraying.

Experimental work will be carried on in propagation and the introduction of new varieties, and an attempt will be made to improve the quality of many of the native fruits and vegetables.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DOMESTIC LOAN GAMBLING

Inspector-General's Statement On Healthiness of the Security

Peking, Aug. 22.

The following statement has been received from the Inspector-General of Customs:—

With reference to the recent heavy fall in the value of Consolidated Loan bonds, which is causing a panic on the bond market, the Inspector-General has been requested by the Ministry of Finance to make a statement concerning the position of the loan service in order to allay the alarm felt by the genuine investment holders.

The violent fluctuation of these bonds has been caused by the fact that while the sinking fund is controlled by the Inspector-General and is more than sufficient to meet all interest payments it is not yet quite sufficient to enable amortization to proceed according to schedule. This fact has been taken advantage of by speculators whose manipulation causes the bonds to rise and fall without any reference to their intrinsic value based on the condition of the sinking fund.

The Consolidated Loan service is in a very satisfactory position and there is no circumstance in connexion with it to justify violent bond movements either upward or downward, nor have the investment holders any present cause for alarm.

The revenue balances to date are more than sufficient to meet all interest payments at the end of the current year; funds to cover completely the redemption of the Ninth Year Loan bonds due on September 30 next are in hand, and a sum of approximately $1,400,000 is available towards the drawing of the 6 per cent. Consolidated Loan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING STOCK EXCHANGE

Monthly Settlement Fairly Satisfactory but Some Accounts Held Over

Peking, Aug. 25.

A special meeting of the Cabinet yesterday afternoon resolved against a suggestion made by one of the Cabinet Ministers to postpone the monthly settlement of the Stock Exchange till the end of the month. Consequently, the settlement went on this morning as usual. The settlement is described as very satisfactory in the circumstances, a large amount of business being concluded by persons able to meet their liabilities.

It was feared yesterday that a number of cash-shops would close down, but the Exchange came to their assistance and it is now hoped that they will pull through. A good deal of business, however, has undoubtedly been postponed on the guarantee of the Exchange. The tone of the market this afternoon was more steady.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Aug. 24.

The condition of the bonds market continues to be widely discussed in Peking. The statement issued by the Inspector-General of Customs had a considerable effect in allaying the anxiety of bona-fide investors, but the general opinion is that the warlike activities in and around Chêkiang had much more to do with the depreciation of bonds than any anxiety regarding Customs funds.—Reuter.

Exchange Closed Indefinitely.

Peking, Aug. 28.

The Peking Stock Exchange quietly ceased all business to-day and closed up indefinitely but bonds remain nominally at the previous low quotations which are finding no sellers save in exceptional cases where demand for immediate funds necessitates acceptance of the best offers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN resumes the forwarding of mail matter to Europe via Siberia this week. It requires 21 days between Tokyo and London, as against 13 days before the war, but is faster than the American route, which requires about 28 days. Mail matter to Soviet Russia will, however, still be forwarded via China and not via Siberia, pending the resumption of commercial relations between Japan and Russia.

PEKING INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE

Official Regulations to Prevent Discussions from Taking Inconvenient Turn

Peking, Aug. 20.

The Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce has telegraphed to the Civil Governors of the provinces and the Tutungs of the Administrative areas, saying that it has drafted regulations for the procedure to be followed at the Central Industrial Conference to open in Peking on September 1, concerning which the provinces and special districts have been kept informed from time to time. The regulations in question are as follows:—

1.—The Conference shall be attended by delegates representing various commercial and industrial bodies in accordance with article 5 of the regulations for the constitution of the Conference, which were circulated in June.

2.—A Chairman and two Vice-chairmen shall be appointed.

3.—The general affairs of the Conference shall be under the control of the Chairman of the Executive Committee, provision for which was made in the original regulations, Article 6.

4.—Motions must be submitted to the conference in written form, addressed to the Chairman of the Conference and counter-signed by at least five delegates, in time for inclusion in the agenda, and the date on which the motion will be taken will be determined by consultation with the Executive Committee.

5.—The Conference will deal first with questions submitted to it by the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce.

6.—The Chairman of the Conference is entitled to appoint special committees to inquire into and report upon special subjects.

7.—The Chairman of each committee shall be appointed by the Chairman of the Conference.

8.—The business conducted either at a general meeting of the conference, or a committee, shall be in accordance with, and in the order of the agenda, it being understood, however, that matters submitted at any time to the Conference by the Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture shall always take precedence.

9.—The Chairman of each committee shall be responsible for furnishing reports to the Chairman of the Conference on matters discussed or investigated by the committee. These reports shall be submitted to the conference by its Chairman.

10.—No meeting of the conference can be held unless upwards of 50 per cent. of the delegates are present, and no motion can be adopted without a majority vote.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KARAKHAN'S COURTESIES

Offer to Modify Note to U. S. But Not Enough to Satisfy Japanese Minister

Peking, Aug. 22.

It appears that M. Karakhan's proposed amendment to His Note to Mr. Yoshizawa is not wholly satisfactory to the latter and discussion in regard to the matter is still being carried on. The matter is not expected to be settled for some days. Meanwhile, M. Karakhan has not replied to the Note of the Protocol Power. Therefore, the question of the Russian Legation remains at a standstill.

Sir Ronald Macleay, the British Minister, formally called on M. Karakhan yesterday. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug 25.

I understand that M. Karakhan has promised Mr. Yoshizawa to make certain changes in his recent essay of the new diplomacy, but that these changes are not sufficient for the Japanese Minister, who has referred the affair to Tokyo.

The obnoxious Note last week overshadowed the Saghalien issue in the Russo-Japanese conversations, which have now seemingly reached a condition of stalemate.

Peking, Aug. 26.

M. Karakhan yesterday evening sent a Note to the Senior Protocol Minister, Sir Ronald Macleay, nominating a member of his staff to take over the Russian Legation. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CHINESE CHURCH AND OPIUM

Anti-Opium Sunday to Be Observed Throughout China on Sept. 28

In connexion with the National Anti-Opium Movement, the National Christian Council of China has issued a circular note to the 8,000 churches throughout China asking them to observe September 28 as Anti-Opium Sunday. Suggestions made as to ways for expressing public opinion against the opium traffic, include the following:—

1.—State what attitude the Christians have toward opium.

2.—Express the people's opinion through the pulpit. We believe that no matter how serious the opium situation is, if public opinion stands firmly against it, we can easily put a stop to the traffic.

3.—The recrudescence of opium in China was due to the fact that a great amount of narcotic drugs was used for anæsthetic purposes in treating wounded soldiers. That resulted in the increase of opium production. Since the European war these great amounts of opium have become useless and so rascals of different nations smuggled these drugs into China. Many military officers and business men were attracted to this business on account of the great profits to be made. The result has been that the planting of opium has become widespread.

4.—Opium has become an international problem. Millions of persons in Europe and America have formed the habit of using morphia. It is our duty as Christians to co-operate with the people of the different nations to do away with this international curse.

5.—The Geneva Conference of this year is to study the problem of opium cultivation and the way to diminish the amount of production to the necessary quantity needed for medicinal and scientific purposes. We, the people of China must express our attitude in support of this great cause.

6.—What shall we Christians do? (1) Enlist the co-operation of all local Christian and non-Christian organizations to support the work of the Geneva Conference; (2) Enlist all Christian and non-Christian organizations to stop the planting of opium in any local places; (3) Report the real opium situation in different places to this office and stir up public opinion to enforce the laws governing the production and transportation of opium and in this way try to make every local centre a clean place, free of opium traffic and production; (4) Enlist the co-operation of Christian and non-Christian hospitals and charity organizations to start an opium sanitorium so that we can help the smokers to free themselves of their habit.

The representatives of the Panchan Living Buddha are now living in the "Tibetan and Mongolian Affairs Bureau," Peking. Their tribute to the Chinese Government consisted of rhinoceros horns, garoowood, and valuable images of Buddha, worth in all about $50,000.

SOOCHOW'S GODDESS OF MERCY

Magnificent Rain Storm to Save Crops Obviously Due to Her Benign Power

From Our Own Correspondent.

Soochow, Aug. 23.

We sometimes hear of a million-dollar storm, or usually meaning, a loss to that amount. But the very heavy rain yesterday afternoon was certainly a tens of thousands of dollars gain to Soochow and the surrounding country, not merely to the crop, but also as a measure of public health in flushing out the city canals, which had become black and reeking with filth, and in filling the fast-dying wells. The water situation in the city was becoming quite serious, and in the country both men and beasts were pumping water almost day and night, in the attempt to save the rice crop. Rarely has it rained so hard in Soochow, as yesterday afternoon; and the rains of last night and to-day are continuing the good work.

There are thousands who believe that these rains are all due to the influence of our local Goddess of Mercey, for her power is believed to be most teh fah—effective. On Thursday she was brought into town from her temple, some 10 miles in the country, and she was given a great worship. We have a local saying: "Kiangyin robbers, Wusih thieves, Soochow Goddess of Mercy, Hangchow Buddha."

When your correspondent was a small boy, some years ago—yes, it was even before the Revolution, that summer it rained and rained, something like 40 days and 40 nights. One afternoon it rained so hard that the canals could not carry off the water fast enough, so that it flooded the streets from one to two feet. This little brass image of the Goddess of Mercy was brought into town for special worship. The Governor, Provincial Judge, Provincial Treasurer, Prefect, and the three District Magistrates (those were the days of Soochow's glory!) met the Goddess at the Chang Mên, and escorted her to a local temple, to which temple the Governor went daily in worship.

On the eighth day, as it still continued to rain, the Governor's disgust got the better of him. He ordered his "runners" to drag the Goddess from her throne, and ordered her to be dragged to a canal near by and thrown in. He himself stood on a bridge cursing her, and adding "You won't make it stop raining! Stay there in the water and drink and drink to your fill! Then see if you can't stop these rain!"

This Governor and his dynasty have passed away, but the Goddess of Mercy is still Soochow's favourite.

WUCHANG FOREIGN SETTLEMENTS

Absurd Chinese Dream of Possession: Native Press Canard

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, Aug. 23.

The Chinese in this centre are still exercising themselves over the question of the foreign concessions in Hankow. They have got into their heads the curious idea that the lease of the British Concession expires this year, and that next year it is due to be handed back to Chinese control.

Where this idea can have come from, it is not easy to guess. To begin with, the British Concession is not "leased" from the Chinese government. It was handed over, a mere mud swamp, in order to satisfy the demands of the foreign merchants that they might have somewhere to reside. The fact that it is now a dry and well-kept municipal area, with magnificent buildings upon it, and that every square fong of its surface is worth almost a fabulous sum, is due entirely to foreign enterprise and to the lavish use of foreign capital. In the second place, even if it were a leased territory, in the ordinary sense of the words, the lease could not terminate in less than 99 years, and this means that it would still have nearly 30 years to run.

Nevertheless, the native press at present is full of the prospect of having this splendid piece of territory returned to China, and of suggestions as to what shall be done with it when it has returned its rightful ownership. Perhaps the wish is father to the thought. No doubt, the recent acquisition of the former German and Russian Concessions has given them a taste for possession, and makes them clamour for more. However it may be, the Hupeh Provincial Assembly has already memorialized the Governor, requesting him to approach the Board of Foreign Affairs upon this matter, in order that there may be no delay in the carrying out of the restoration. Discussion is already going on as to what use can be made of the valuable sites hitherto occupied by foreign firms, and of the jetties that afford shipping facilities along the Bund.

A Squeeze that Failed.

By the way, the inner story of the handing over of the Russian Concession has now leaked out, and it is worth repeating for its very naïveté. It appears that Mr. Shen Tsi-liang, the (late) Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, came to meet the Municipal Council with his budget already prepared. The first item was a salary of Tls. 2,000 per month for himself, in reward for the arduous duties which he anticipated in looking after the welfare of the residents. After this came a list of salaried offices which he proposed to establish for the efficient running of the area, by which no doubt some 40 or 50 of his uncles, cousins, and various other relatives would have been put into the way of serving their country with no loss to themselves.

But the Municipal Council had also prepared a budget, and unfortunately it began at the other end of the expenditure column. It showed that the upkeep of the concession, including repair to roads, sanitation and other matters would require a certain regular expenditure. For this expenditure, the ordinary rates paid by the residents would be sufficient to provide. But for the expenditure on salaries, about which Mr. Shen was so anxious, there would be a surplus of something like Tls. 700 per month. Moreover, if the public works were not overlooked, and laid as a first charge upon the income of the concession, there would most likely be some difficulty in collecting the rates which the residents had been accustomed to pay.

No doubt this little incident explains Mr. Shen's promotion to the new post at Hsinti, and the appointment of a new Commissioner of Foreign Affairs to the Port of Hankow.

Japanese Bank's Huge Loan.

In my last letter, I mentioned the precarious condition of the Han-Yeh-Ping Iron Co. It has just been reported that the manager of the Tayeh Iron Mines, in order to make it possible to carry on, has borrowed from a Japanese bank the huge sum of $8,500,000, to be paid back in 17 years. This no doubt means that, in the course of a little more time, the whole of the valuable Tayeh iron mines will fall into Japanese ownership.

Wuchang has recently been visited by a party of students from a college in Tokyo. They made the round of the three cities, visiting the chief educational institutions and factories, and then proceeded north to Peking and Tientsin. A return visit is shortly to be made to Japan by a party of students from China. Two representatives have been selected from each of the five Government Universities in Wuchang. They will shortly go to Peking to join the party.

The number of Chinese students from Hupeh who are studying at universities in Germany is 18. A letter has just been received from them by the Education Bureau, complaining that the rise in the cost of living got them into great difficulties. The matter was laid before the Provincial Assembly, who after some discussion decided to send financial help, and to allow the sum of $10,000 per annum for expenses.

Alarming Spread of Red Literature.

It is reported that a parcel, containing Communist and revolutionary literature, has been intercepted at the Wuchang post-office by inspectors from the yamên. The parcel was sent from Chungking, and addressed to the Normal University. Mr. Cheng, the Head of the Education Bureau, has sent orders to the heads of all government schools, requesting them to look out for such manifestoes, and to prevent their circulation among students.

On the other hand, a branch of the Anti-Imperialism Society is just about to be established in Wuchang, with the full approval of the authorities. Mr. Cheng Shih, the Principal of Chung Hwa University, has arranged for a big meeting of most of the educational and political leaders of Wuchang and Hankow, and they are to discuss the setting up of a branch of this Society in Wu-Han.

This Anti-Imperialist Society originated recently among a group of Members of Parliament in Peking. Its object is to protest against the oppression of China by the imperialist powers, chief of whom no doubt are England and Japan. Branches of the society are being established in every important centre in China.

A well-known robber from the Chingchow region has just been caught in Hankow. His name is T'ang Mao-tsi, and he has been annoying the people around Chingchow for a considerable time. It is said he has accumulated considerable wealth by his depredations. The police have been on his track for some time, but had hitherto been unsuccessful in hunting him down. But recently he was traced to Hankow, where no doubt he had come to spend some of his ill-gotten gains, and was arrested in a teashop. He will be taken back to Chingchow for execution.

THE BOXER INDEMNITY

London, Aug. 24.

Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese Charge d'Affaires, opening the Chinese Students' Conference at Hoddesdon, yesterday, said that he regretted that the number of Chinese students in England did not show a tendency to increase. He hoped that when the British portion of the Boxer Indemnity was applied to new purposes the students would benefit. Mr. Chu said that the present numbers going to England were inadequate. Anglo-Chinese educational intercourse would increase good understanding and would eventually benefit the commercial relations between the two countries. The British people would do equally well to send a larger number of students to China.—Reuter.

Hongkong is hoping to raise a Scottish unit in the local Volunteers. On Friday last a meeting took place at the Taikoo Club for the purpose of securing recruits.

FRESH ANTI-FOREIGN WAVE AT WUCHANG

Menacing Tone of Local Press: Mob Emotionalism: Ominous Signs of the Times

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, Aug. 16.

In these days, even a cursory study of the native press revals an amount of anti-foreign sentiment which is surprising. This sentiment is mostly due to ignorance; but it is none the less dangerous for that. Beneath the surface of the daily intercourse of local Chinese with foreigners, there flows a deep undercurrent of resentment, for wrongs which are mostly imaginary; but no amount of argument or plain stating of the facts would be able to dispel such imaginations. How or when these feelings of discontent will burst out into action, it is impossible to foretell. But sooner or later, tragedy is bound to be the result.

To take a case in point: an article appears in a Hankow native paper, complaining that the foreigners have robbed the Chinese of the river frontage. Probably there are few Chinese of the present generation who know or care that the Hankow concession areas were originally waste marshy land, which has been reclaimed at great expense; and that the magnificent Hankow Bund, some two and a half miles in length, was constructed entirely with foreign money.

Now that the German and Russian concessions have relapsed into Chinese guardianship, crowds of Chinese may be seen any evening, walking along the river-front of these two concessions and enjoying the cool breezes. No one would grudge them this pleasure if they behaved themselves decently. But it appears that they look upon the whole of the river frontage as actually belonging to them, and believe that the foreigners have no right there at all. The article in the paper goes on to propose that a Chinese open market shall be established in the two Special Administration Districts (late German and Russian Concessions), and that a maloo (horse road) shall be constructed right through the area. If the horrors of the maloo in the native city are to be repeated in the two S.A.D.'s, this means that the filth and noise of of real China will be brought into very undesirable proximity to the residents of the remaining foreign concessions.

Another sign of the times is, that the guilds and other public bodies of Hankow, have sent a letter to the Japanese Government, asking that the Japanese Consul in Hankow shall be changed. The pretext named refers to an incident which occurred ten months ago. An employee of a Japanese jeweller was accused of theft, and sent to prison, where he committed suicide. The affair caused quite a furore at the time, and evidently it has not been forgotton, for the letter states that "this matter has not yet been settled." Probably the writers of the letter are quite unmindful of the fact that the Lincheng affair, which is now more than 18 months old, "has not yet been settled." It remains to be seen how the Japanese Government will deal with a letter which comes from a group of unofficial local bodies.

The Egregious Students.

Another storm is apparently brewing in the educational world. Last week a certain appointee came to take up his residence in the preparatory school of the Higher Normal University of Wuchang. The students who happen to be in residence during the summer vacation shut the gates and refused to admit him. He went away and collected a force of soldiers, and came back and forced his way in. The Principal of the Normal University being absent in Peking at the time, nothing further took place.

The military have been accused of interfering in another little matter. It has been the custom to select annually by examination seven or eight students from the Government schools in Wuchang, to be sent to Europe or America for study at a university. The military authorities, it is said, forbid the holding of the examination this year. The students are preparing to take action.

Cholera Deaths.

Cholera is very prevalent just now in Wuchang, as it probably is in all Chinese cities during the summer. One cause of this is the custom which the people have during the hot weather of sleeping out in the streets uncovered. A wind gets up during the night, and a chill results. Native medicine generally does the rest. It is reported that over 100 deaths from cholera occurred in Wuchang within three days during the last week.

BICYCLES POPULAR IN SHANSI

Dangers of Night-Riding: Young Man Held up and Robbed by Bogus Police

From Our Own Correspondent.

Taiku, Shansi, Aug. 18.

The towns along the motor roads in Shansi have been heavy buyers of bicycles. Many shops have bought wheels for the use of their employees, and frequently considerable sums of money are transferred from town to town by bicycle riders. This is not without an element of risk, as has been demonstrated a number of times. A few days ago, southwest of this city, a cyclist was riding along just at nightfall. He was invited to "stop and rest" by two men on the motor road, and when the cyclist dismounted he was told that they were from a neighbouring police station and must open the parcel carried at the rear of his wheel in search of "golden pills" or opium. They found in the package $130. Leaving the 30 dollars they took the one hundred and departed. Considerable interest attaches to this affair by the well-founded rumour that one of the robbers was a younger brother of a petty official near by. Though he has no office there this younger brother is living in his brother's yamên. If the rumours turn out to be true, the official is likely to lose his office.

Meeting the Eclipse

An amusing incident occurred here a few days ago in connexion with the eclipse of the moon. According to "China's Skies for August" published in your columns the eclipse occurred in the early morning hours of the 15th., that is, after midnight of the 14th. The Chinese almanacs probably stated that the eclipse was "due on the 15th." At any rate, on that night, some 16 hours after the eclipse had occurred, there was a great beating of drums, ringing of temple bells and pounding of pots, pans and kettles. The noise-makers must have concluded that their efforts were extraordinarily successful, for the "dragon" did not even attempt to swallow the moon!

KULING SPORTS

From a Correspondent.

Kuling, Aug. 19.

As the Kuling season draws to a close it seems to be the concensus of opinion that we have had the finest weather this season of many many years. Only a day and a half of rain since the first of July. No untoward event has marred the season and many people are planning to return home, having spent an unusually pleasant and restful summer.

Baseball has been the best on record, some 30 or 40 players participating and three games played regularly each week. To add to the interest special divisions have been made. The Y. M. C. A. played the "World" one game but lost. The greatest amount of interest has been aroused by the Presbyterian v. the "World" games, but after the Presbyterians won four out of five games a new alignment was made and only the Southern Presbyterian played the "World." The first game resulted in a win for the "World" but the next was won by the Southern Presbyterians by a score of 4 to 1 and they expect to win the series.

The tennis tournament is nearing the end and the singles have narrowed down to Penfield, Graham and Wayland. In doubles Wayland and Bell play the winners of the Graham - Smith — Greene - Rankin match. Close matches are assured in all the finals.

FLOOD DESOLATION IN THE NORTH

Crops Completely Ruined in Peking and Tientsin Country

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug. 23.

Mr. O. J. Todd, engineer representative of the China International Famine Relief Commission, has just returned from a week's boat trip in the flooded area south of Tientsin and Peking. Mr. Todd was accompanied by Mr. C. A. Stanley of the American Board of Missions, Tientsin, and Mr. Geo, Krainukov, a motion-picture operator of the British-American Tobacco Co. The following extracts, from Mr. Todd's reports to the Executive Committee, give evidence of the serious situation in the vast area between Tientsin and Paotingfu.

"The route taken was from Tientsin up the Shi Ho to the town of Batai, 100 li to the Southwest. From there a westerly course was taken through the Lakes into the Ta Ching Ho, which stream was followed for the most part into West Lake, the objective point being the City of An Jou (Anhsin) the county seat of An hsinhsien. In the course of this trip data was gathered regarding flood conditions as compared with those of 1917, and the statement that in West Lake region the high water of August 2 to 10 was 2 ft. higher than that of the maximum height of 1917 found general endorsement.

"On my previous trip to this city on August 1 the statement was then made that the water was up to a point 6 in. lower than the 1917 high mark. There was every indication that there had been a rise of another 2 ft. or more; while on August 1, 120 out of 150 towns of Anhsien were under water. As present the entire county is inundated, the main dike on the north of West Lake having been overtopped.

"At the City of An Jou we called on the Police Commissioner and found him superintending the housing and feeding of approximately 900 refugee women and children, whom he had brought in from the adjoining villages. Rowing out past many of these villages we found the Water to be into the houses and the people living on roof tops. Where wave action endangered the buildings the people had been removed to the city of An Jou and Shihsien.

The whole region from Paotingfu on to Tientsin and to the north of the great Wen An Wa dike is a great lake. Autumn crops are submerged almost throughout this region. Hemp, that was nearly ready to harvest and which has been covered with from 6 to 10 ft. of water, is being rescued from boats by divers who dive down and pull it out by the roots, afterwards taking it to other villages in small boats. The reed crop, which is considered valuable for mat making, roofing and fuel, has been injured to a great extent, for under ideal conditions reed should be grown with a small amount of water around the roots. To the south of the great Wen An Wa dike the region is being gradually inundated from water coming from the Putaho, 100 li to the south of Suchow. Fifty li north of Wen An Shin we found the water rising at the rate of 3in. per day, but still 3 ft. lower than in 1917, due to the fact that this northern dike has been well patrolled and has not yet broken. However, the City of Wen An Shin is surrounded by water, although crops in the northwest portion of this county are being protected and are on higher ground, so that they should be harvested with no difficulty.

Little distress was noted, due to the fact that there probably is a small food supply left over from last year and the spring wheat crop, which appears to have yeilded 50 to 100 catties per mow, was 50 per cent. of a normal crop. While this supply lasts the inundated population will get on fairly well, although there are many portions of this region that do not raise wheat and so they have been entirely depending on the autumn crop which is a total failure throughout the most of this region.

The only occupation of these people at the present time is a little shipping, fishing, and mat weaving. This furnishes employment for a comparatively small portion of the population.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

China International Famine Relief Commission's Latest Bulletin

The following report on flood conditions in Chihli and Shantung was issued by the China International Famine Relief Commission on August 18:—

Shunnyihsien.—Ten days steady rain since July 6 resulted in the Ta Pei Ho overflowing its banks. About 1,000 mu were inundated. At the same time the Tsien Kan Ho and the Tsai Chia Ho flooded the surrounding country to a depth of about five feet.

Jenkiuhsien.—Reports from here state that over 400 villages were submerged and that the people are living in the open, as all their houses are destroyed.

Pingshan.—The Fu To Ho rose rapidly, but is not yet threatening.

Huaijou.—Heavy rains have flooded the plain to the depth of four feet, about 40 villages being submerged.

Yutien.—Some 500 villages out of a total of 800 were submerged, all the crops are destroyed.

Tsanghwang.—Ten days heavy rain destroyed the greater portion of the crops, and many houses were washed away.

Shentseh.—The lower areas here were flooded and about 40,000 chien of houses were destroyed.

Yuanshih.—Steady rain since July 6 has inundated 19 villages. Several feet of sand was deposited on the young crops.

Kaoyi.—Continuous rain experienced here since the commencement of July caused the Ti Ho to break its banks, the railway being damaged and 46 villages inundated. Some eight feet of water is lying on the plain.

Kichsien.—Steady rain here since the beginning of July caused a break of 3,000 feet in the Fu river dyke, and about 130 villages were inundated.

Enhsien.—The river is reported to have overflowed at Wuhsien and inundated about 150 villages, affecting some 60,000 people.

Hengshui.—Reports another break in the Kichsien region and about 300 villages flooded.

Peikouho.—Eight feet of water is reported in this area.

Kuchow. — The neighbouring rivers overflowed on July 16 and did great damage to the houses and crops.

Kulu.—Reports that the heavy rain experienced in July broke the dykes of the Fu river and inundated about 70 villages.

Kichow.—Ten days heavy rain in July resulted in a break of 380 feet in the Sun Ho dyke, and 209 villages are reported as flooded.

Poyeh.—The dykes in this area have broken and inundated some 92 villages, all communication except by boat being cut off from the hsien.

Wukiang.—Heavy rain during July led to the overflowing of the Fu To Ho and the Fu Yang Ho, about 7 feet of water flooding the plain, and damaging more than 100 villages.

Tsai Yu Chen.—Ten days rain in the beginning of July caused the Feng Ho to rise rapidly and break its dykes outside the city for a distance of 600 feet, 70 villages being inundated and the harvest totally ruined.

"COST-PRICE RICE" FOR FLOODED AREAS

Government Measures for the Prevention of Profiteering

Peking, Aug. 22.

According to the official report of the Cabinet meeting this morning, the Ministry of Communications and the Ministry of War jointly proposed that an Associate Director of Railway Defence should be appointed, and recommended that Gen. Wang Ting-chun should be given the post. This was approved by the Cabinet.

The Ministry of Finance suggested that in addition to rice being transported to the flood areas for free distribution, grain being sent for sale at cost price by groups of merchants and gentry should be free from all taxes. The Cabinet approved and drafted four articles to govern the transportation of "cost-price rice," with a view to preventing profiteers from securing exemption for foodstuffs.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE STUDY OF TYPHOONS

Hongkong Weather Good for Swimming, But Sharks Cause Apprehension

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hongkong, Aug. 16.

The chief topic of conversation in Hongkong these days is the weather. Considering what an excellent standby that subject forms the world over, it seems hardly a matter for serious concern, but it happens that the local conditions are such as merit special attention. For weeks there has not been a day when the most weather-wise could predict what the conditions were going to be like in a couple of hours time, and with successive showers following blue skies, the patience of everybody has been sorely tried. Your correspondent has sought out several persons who can claim to be classed in the category of "oldest inhabitant," and they all agree that the conditions are unprecedented. Doubters have only to peruse the Observatory report, which shows that the rainfall to date is over 80 inches since the beginning of the year, as against an average for that period of about 60 inches.

The most remarkable feature about the weather conditions, is the immunity from typhoons which this Colony has enjoyed so far. We are within two days of the anniversary of the disaster of last August, and there has not been even a moderately-strong blow yet. This can be compared with the regular weekend typhoons of last year, covering the whole period of June to September. Nevertheless, reports of cyclones being in our vicinity are constantly received, and interested persons are able to plot them on the chart and speculate whether Hongkong is menaced. We have certainly had at least one narrow escape. In two cases typhoons have approached in zigzag fashion, and one, after passing just a degree south, changed its course, doubled on its tracks, and when southeast of us moved almost due north. It was reported to be "of great intensity," and kept everyone concerned with shipping on the alert for three days. It eventually finished up in southwest Japan, where, as was recorded at the time, it did considerable damage.

Those interested in such phenomena will perhaps have some explanation for the contrast this year's typhoons form those of 1923. Then, they nearly all had their origin far away to the southeast of the Philippines, near the Equator, and moved mostly west-north-west: this season they are chiefly forming in the China Sea, about Latitude 10 to 15, and show a decided northward tendency.

Sharks! Sharks!

The uncertain weather has confined local sport for the past two months chiefly to swimming. Never have the various public beaches here been so crowded, and it is pleasing to note how the ladies are joining in ever-increasing numbers in our chief summer recreation. However, bathers have just received a rude shock. Hongkong's supposed immunity from sharks has been discounted.

The fishing fleets which have returned from operations in the vicinity of Waglan have brought back an unusual catch—five sharks. They consist of a formidable-looking monster nearly eight feet in length, and four smaller ones about half that size. Apparently they were a mother and her offspring. The owner of the catch states that he observed a "very big fish" followed by four others, making for the line of his nets, and they were successfully caught. Their struggles were put an end to with the aid of choppers, and their turning out to be sharks both surprised and delighted the captors, who have received a good price for the big fish from one of the principal Chinese restaurants.

From Waglan to Hongkong beaches is not a far cry, so bathers will not feel very comfortable in future. Moonlight swimming will especially lose a great deal of its attraction. The appearance of sharks in our vicinity is certainly rare, so there is probably nothing to worry about, and the jelly fish should remain the principal "terror" of the local deep.

THE engagement is announced between Miss Olga Pooritz, late of Hankow, and Mr. A. Springborg, of Shanghai.

MERCHANTS' STRIKE IN KUANGTUNG

Protest Against Seizure of Arms and Circulation of Central Bank Notes

Canton, Aug. 23.

Following the suspension of business on the part of the native bankers and the rice merchants in Canton, as a protest against the Kuomintang Government of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, which is enforcing the circulation of unsecured paper money on the market, the other shops were compelled to close their doors. The rice shops had to close on account of the insistence of the mercenaries of Dr. Sun to pay for rice with worthless notes of the Central Bank, a Kuomintang agency without any capital whatever.

The present general strike in Canton has been caused by two immediate acts of the Kuomintang Government in Canton: the forcing of worthless paper money on the people, and the attempt to crush the people by first disarming the Volunteer Corps in Canton and then preventing the units throughout the province of Kuangtung from amalgamating under one command.

As far as the mercenaries are concerned—the Yunnanese, the Hunanese, and the Kuangsi-ites—they have begun to realize that if Dr. Sun should fail they will have a hard time to escape from Kuangtung, as their dialects will betray them.

Since August 22 the regular service of junks and tow-boats plying between Canton and inland towns has been interrupted, as the people of the interior are watching the Canton situation and may have to come to the rescue of the citizens of Canton in case there is a conflict between the people and the oppressive militarists.

Canton, Aug. 24.

Following the strike carried out by the merchants in Foushan, merchants in Nanhaihsien, Shuntokhsien, and Tunghuanhsien have also joined the strike as a protest against the seizure by the Canton Government of the arms and ammunition imported by the Merchants' Volunteer Corps. There are now signs of the people in the South starting a serious agitation against the Southern Government. A portion of the citizens here have put up wooden palings on the streets in order that looting by the troops belonging to the Canton Government may be avoided.

The situation here has thus become more strained than ever. The citizens of Canton are at the present time facing two problems, namely, the arms question and the question of compulsory circulation by the Central Bank of Canton of its bank-notes. They are on the point of protesting to the Goverument by resorting to a general strike.—Eastern News Agency.

Hongkong telegrams to the Chinese press report that in a circular issued by the Merchants' Volunteer Corps of Canton on August 22, it is declared that the merchants have formed the Corps entirely for self-protection, which is a right every people should enjoy; that the Government, in detaining their rifles and other arms, are depriving the merchants of the weapons with which to defend themselves; and that all people should therefore be on their guard.

Nearly All Shops Shut.

Canton, Aug. 25.

Yesterday evening all shops and stores in the City of Canton decided to strike and this morning 90 per cent. of all the houses in the City of Canton had closed their doors. The reason for the strike is a demonstration against the issue of bank-notes of the Central Bank, in addition to the question of arms.—Eastern News Agency.

Shameen, Aug. 26.

A strict censorship has been instituted in Canton. The merchants' strike is widespread over the arms deadlock. Dr. Sun Yat-sen demands $60 for each rifle in addition to the full cost previously paid to Mr. Chan Lim-pak. The Chinese banks and the larger stores have closed and the majority of business is at a standstill. Hundreds of new wooden and sandbag barricades have been erected in Saikwan, the rich business and residential district of Canton. The merchants have disregarded orders from the police to destroy the barricades and the police now threaten to refuse protection to any shop remaining closed. The situation is critical.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A FRESH SQUEEZE IN CANTON

Special Flags which Shipping Must Carry as Passport at Usual Charges

Canton, Aug. 16.

Militarists in Canton are not slow to commercialize their offices whenever there is a chance. The Bureau of River Defence in Canton, in a recent order, states that its guards are unable to distinguish an ordinary vessel from a pirate boat and that, in order to differentiate between them, the Bureau will issue a flag to each of the registered ships plying between Canton and ports inland along the principal rivers of Kuangtung province. But it is necessary for every ship to pay a fee of $50 for the flag. If the 850 larger junks, launches, and smaller steamers will all comply with the order of the Bureau, the expected income will not be inconsiderable. It is doubtful, however, if very many will comply.

Shipping business in Kuangtung has been most risky in the last two years, for pirates have had their own way and bandit troops have not hesitated to confiscate vessels under the pretext of commandeering them for military transportation service. Up to last China New Year more than 300 vessels of various sizes were taken this way in the previous 12 months by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's mercenary troops. According to a statement of the Canton Ship Owners' Guild some 42 vessels were taken by Dr. Sun's men since the beginning of this year. These include the str. Hop Wo, plying between Liuchow and Wuchow; the str. Shun Kee, running between Kongmoon and Sheklung; and the str. Lee On, connecting Fatshan and Kongmoon. Among the 42 vessels taken, 30 were steamers and 12 tow-boats.

For partial relief, and perhaps to get a little protection from the foreign gunboats in Canton waters, more than 200 vessels have gone under foreign registration during the last 12 months.

Yunnanese Expelled by Volunteers.

When pressed by Merchants Volunteers from all sides, Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Yunnanese mercenaries had to withdraw from Kaukong altogether on the night of August 7, after having terrorized the innocent inhabitants there for the last seven months. Dr. Sun's Yunnanese troops had been making so much trouble and levying so many kinds of taxes that the people of Kaukong were forced a month ago to oust them from the business section of the town, allowing them to be stationed in the outskirts only. Instead of behaving themselves, however, they caused more trouble and destroyed several villages, going as far as to demand $90,000 before they would move out. To save Kaukong, Merchants Volunteers from many cities along the West River went to the scene, and this perhaps was responsible for the hurried retreat of the mercenaries.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Strike Breaking.

Canton, Aug. 28.

The Government has taken more high-handed steps than ever before towards the strikers here, and is forcing the merchants to open their shops and stores by force of arms. The resolve of the merchants, however, is very strong and they are turning a deaf ear to repeated warnings from the Government. They have erected watch-towers on the roofs of several buildings at important points to take precautions against looting and fires. The popular feeling is entirely alienated from the Government. It appears that there is absolutely no hope of the issue being settled for the time being.—Reuter.

Later.

The troops under the command of Gen. Chen Chiung-ming in the East River district have begun to take the offensive against the Kuangtung troops. Gen. Lin Hu is, it is reported, advancing at the head of his troops in the direction of Yingteh from Onyuan. The traffic on the Canton—Hankow line, to the north of Yingteh, has been interrupted.—Eastern News Agency.

THE ARMS SEIZURE AT CANTON

Dr. Sun's Message to Merchant Volunteers: Munitions to be Returned at a Price

Eastern News Agency.

Canton, Aug. 20.

With regard to the arms question, Dr. Sun Yat-sen last night at 7 o'clock despatched his three delegates to the headquarters of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps to convey the message from the Canton Government. The gist of the message is as follows:—

"The Government intends to deliver the arms and ammunition at reasonable prices. Chen Lien-pei, Commander of the Merchants' Volunteers, who fancies himself to be a Mussolini of Italy, has ambition to organize the Fascisti of Canton by utilizing the influence of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps with a view to overthrowing the present Canton Government as well as to establishing himself as the leader of the Southern Government. There is also positive proof that he has of late sent a representative to Loyang to negotiate with Marshal Wu Pei-fu. Be that as it may, the Government has no intention to punish the members of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, with the exception of Chen Lien-pei, provided they repent of their past misconduct and pledge allegiance to the Government; otherwise they shall be severely punished."

Futhurmore, Dr. Sun's representatives told the leaders of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps that the prices at which the arms and ammunition will be delivered to the Merchants' Volunteers are to be based on the selling-prices of the Canton Arsenal and that the rifles with certificates of purchase will be delivered at $60 and those without the same at $160 per piece. The headquarters of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps has wired to its branches to the above effect and it is expected that a mass-meeting of the Merchants' Volunteers will be held to-day to discuss countermeasures.

Later.

While it is unknown as yet what attitude will be adopted by the Merchants' Volunteer Corps with regard to Dr. Sun Yat-sen's message, judging from all reports available it appears that the Merchants' Volunteers have decided not to take any drastic step for the present in view of the fact that they have no military force and arms sufficient to cope with the troops of the Government, but their headquarters at Foushan is determined, to effect connexion with Merchants' Volunteers and village corps in various places in the province and to carry out a general strike of large scope at an opportune moment in the near future with these local volunteer corps as a central figure, and with the ultimate object of causing Dr. Sun to get out of the political field. At the present time, the picked troops of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps have all been concentrated at Foushan, which is now actually in their possession. On the other hand, the Canton Government has ordered its troops to be mobilized and is making preparations for the prevention of the projected strike. Military aeroplanes are also being used by the Government to make a demonstration.

MILITARY AMBITIONS IN CANTON

Training the Young Idea: Six War Colleges Within a Small Area

Canton, Aug. 14.

Leading militarists in Canton are beginning to rival each other in the matter of preparations for future supremacy. Each is trying to rally around him as many followers as possible, especially younger men ambitious of going into a career similar to his own. There now exist in Canton and vicinity six military academies, or war colleges, conducted with public funds.

Gen. Chiang Ki-shek has a military academy at Whampoa under the auspices of the Kuomintang Reds, while Gen. Chau Chi-teh, of the Yunnanese mercenaries, is conducting a school for his own clan. Gen. Wu Te-chen, Canton Police Commissioner and concurrently Commandant of the Provincial Gendarmerie of Kuangtung, has a class for training officers, and Gen. Wu Yu-shu, of the Western Department, is conducting a war college for members of his staff and others expecting to enter the service. Both Gen. Li Tsai-hsin, of the West River Defence, and Gen. Koo Chung-hsin, of the 3rd Northern Expeditionary Force, also have schools of this nature. A total of 3,000 cadets are under training in these six schools.

The Arsenal Refitted

The Kuangtung Arsenal at Shekcheng, near Canton, is having new machinery installed, and it is expected that within 60 days all the works will be finished and operation of the plant will again be in order. The machinery was first bought by the Kuangsi militarists when in power. Messrs. J. A. Rabbitt & Company, American engineers, are putting up the machinery for the Arsenal.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A LIFE FOR THE RAIN GOD

Taoist's Pious Resolution to Be Boiled Alive: Faith Shaken by Hot Water

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mienchow, Sze., Aug. 9.

In consequence of the great drought, there have been the usual superstitious attempts to secure rain. A story that comes from Anhsien, 100 li from here, has a touch of grim humour about it.

The drought was having a disastrous effect on the district and the usual discussions were going on as to how to secure rain. At last one man said, "If 300 catties of charcoal, a new cauldron, and three buckets of water are prepared, I will sit in the cauldron and you can put fire under it and burn the charcoal till I am boiled dead. After which I can ascend up to heaven and beg the Gem Emperor to send rain to make the earth bring forth.

"All who heard this Taoist say these words believed him, and so they went and bought 300 pounds of charcoal, and put three buckets of water into the cauldron and set fire to the charcoal. They bade the Taoist sit in the cauldron and set fire to the charcoal. When the water began to scald the victim jumped up and ran away. The people all went after him and brought him back and cast him into prison for seven days. They then let him out, and dubbed him a dolt and an imposter."

All within quotation marks is a translation from the Chinese letter which was written from Anhsien, and is my authority for the story.

The event itself took place at Sangtsaoyuen, a market seven miles from Anhsien. It does not seem to have shaken the faith of the people in the efficacy of such a sacrifice. They only blame the man for misleading them. If he had had the temerity to go through with the ordeal they would undoubtedly have made a god of him. However, a day or two after they had heavy rains and hail at Anhsien.

An example of the influence of Young China up here is to be found in the phraseology which Gen. Yang Sen is using to address the masses. The other day I saw a proclamation outside Mienchuhsien entirely in Mandarin, which a school-boy in his fourth year at a primary school could have read. Its contents were an assurance that the general will do his best to put down the disorders that are distracting the province.

Under a new decree, a divorce can be had in Soviet Russia in five minutes at a cost of $1.50, provided both parties agree to the dissolution of the marriage ties. If, however, one party objects, the case must be referred to the courts, Misconduct does not constitute ground for annulment of marital ties, but desertion, religious superstition, excessive religious piety, incompatibilty of temperament and divergence in political views are held to be sufficient causes. No Russian may obtain a divorce and remarry more than three times within one year.

ALLEGED INTRIGUE IN CANTON

Leader of Merchants Volunteer Corps Charged with Plotting Against Dr. Sun

From a Chinese Correspondent.

Canton, Aug. 20.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen yesterday sent to the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps a letter, which, roughly translated, reads, in part, as follows:

"The Government acknowledges that a part of the arms smuggled by Chan Lim-pak has been bought with funds belonging to the Merchants Volunteer Corps and will direct the Civil Governor of Kuangtung to issue them to you in accordance with the laws of the Republic of China, thus disposing of the arm question.

"There are, however, two other question which the Government wishes to have the aid of the Volunteers in settling.

"From the Merchants Volunteers and others, we have learned that Chan Lim-pak has conceived a plot to overthrow the Government with the strength of the Merchants Volunteer Corps, trying to follow the example of Mussolini of Italy. This has been reported for the last month or two by the foreign press of Hongkong, Shanghai, and Tientsin. Recently Chan Lim-pak inspired a certain foreign newspaper editorially to denounce the Government and praise the Merchants Volunteers, comparing the Canton Merchants Volunteers to the Fascisti of Italy, a party of Italian reactionary capitalists opposing the government. The foreign press has mentioned the plot of Chan Lim-pak. It is understood that foreigners are participating in the plot, that it was to have taken place on August 14 the purpose being to overthrow the Government, that Chan Lim-pak was to have assumed the office of Tutuh (Military Governor-General) of Kuangtung, that the independence of Kuangtung was to be cancelled in favour of returning to the Northern Government. It is also generally understood among the Chinese and foreign public that Chan Lim-pak has communicated with General Wu Pei-fu of Loyang in the name of the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps.

"Referring to the recent celebration (meaning the amalgamation of the provincial corps August 13), many inscriptions on the scrolls of the arches have voiced such sentiments as above charged, and this is conclusive evidence that Chan Lim-pak has had no respect for the Government.

Pardon for the Repentant.

"The Government, being broad-minded, does not intend to hold the Merchants Corps responsible for the plot, except Chan Lim-pak. The members of the Corps may voluntarily withdraw from the plot and receive pardon from the Government or expose those in the plot by bringing them before the Government for action. We believe that a majority of the merchants are well-informed and supporters of republicanism and will do everything possible to eliminate the bad element from their number, as the latter are using the Merchants' name to overthrow and endanger the Government. As this involves the life and death of the Republic and the success or failure of the revolution we, the Generalissimo, must rely on the Merchants Volunteers as comrades and take them to heart. In doing this, the Government has not only the keenest regard for the welfare of the Merchants Volunteers but also the happiness and blessing of Kuangtung."

According to a Washington despatch to the "Asahi," Mr. Edgar Addison Bancroft, of Chicago, has been selected as the successor to Mr. Cyrus Woods, who recently resigned the Ambassadorship to Japan. The new Ambassador was a director of the International Harvester Company, the largest agricultural implement manufacturing company of the world, between 1907 and 1920. He has written a few books. He was born in Illinois, and is a brother of Mr. Frederick B. Bancroft, the well-known historian.

DEPERATE MEASURES IN CANTON

Government Officials Making Immediate Collection of Rent and Land Taxes and Mercenary Troops Enforcing Other Contributions: Dr. Sun's "Red Army"

Canton, Aug. 22.

Acting as if they have but a few more days to dominate Canton, the Kuomintang officials are pressing hard on the inhabitants for their contributions. The fourth monthly rent contribution in 1924 which the Canton landlord must pay is to be paid to the Police before the end of August. The military impost on land deeds inspection, at a fee of three per cent. of the property value, must be paid before August 24. The authorities are encouraging informants to report cases of landowners not paying the fee. The deeds examination office is placarding every delinquent lot or building with the sign, "This has not received an inspection certificate."

While Mr. Sun Fo is superintending the carrying out of this impost on landowners, the joint financial commission of the Yunnanese, Hunanese and Kuangsi mercenary troops is exacting another contribution from the boat population of Kuangtung. Every sampan has to pay a contribution, the minimum of which must not be less than three dollars, while the larger craft have to pay more in accordance with a schedule already published. The excuse for this latest impost is that since July the mercenary troops have not been given any regular allowance by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, and that, in the face of the enemy (Gen. Chen Chiung-ming) approaching, the people cannot afford to be defenceless, and the troops will be able to give protection, for which the people must pay.

Dr. Sun's Red Army, to be known as the "Canton Labour Corps," which will be equipped, it is said, with arms recently seized from the Canton Merchant Volunteers, has now an enrolment of more than 1,500. Many in Canton fear that the favours shown towards the working-class by the Kuomintang Government will culminate in further ill-feeling between the employers and the employees in Canton.

As a sign of non-support of the Kuomintang Government in Canton, the native bankers have refused to negotiate the banknotes of Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Central Bank; the merchants have declared the Canton newspapers partial and one-sided and unworthy of further patronage; the rice shops are holding supplies for the benefit of the Volunteer Corps in preparation for possible conflict between the people and the Kuomintang; and the ward and street committees are erecting barriers within their spheres to prevent looting by Chinese Bolshevists in the clash which many think inevitable.

Strict Censorship.

The arrival of wounded soldiers at Wongsha, Canton, in the last few days appears to point to the fact that all is not well in districts north of Canton. However, strict censorship of the press, telegrams, and mail in Canton has resulted in no news being available except official communiqués from Dr. Sun Yat-sen's press bureaux and subsidized news agencies. Since August 14 Dr. Sun has called in many outside troops, and some in Canton have advanced the theory that Gen. Chen Chiung-ming and his followers are returning to Canton from the East River districts to oust Dr. Sun and his Kuomintang party. It is not believed in well-informed circles that Gen. Chen will be able to affect the situation in Canton by so early a return.

While persons friendly to Dr. Sun are trying to dissociate him from all that has happened in the last two years by saying that he has been for some time but the tool of the selfish faction which is using the name of Kuomintang for private gain, the Cantonese people will no longer tolerate his presence in their midst. The signs of the times in Canton clearly point in the direction of his being compelled to go. Coming developments in this part of China should be exceedingly interesting in the next few months.

Public Opinion Muzzled.

The Kuomintang Party in Canton, dominated by the Chinese Bolshevists, is now desperate. The party has put it on record that the Cantonese merchants, as well as the labourers, farmers, teachers and students must join them or be liable to be dealt with. At first the teachers only of the higher schools were asked to join the Kuomintang, but now all the primary teachers have to do so or be subject to dismissal. To muzzle further public opinion, all newspapers and printing shops have been put under censorship in order, it is said, to avoid exciting attention to the coming intention of the Kuomintang to nationalize all land and buildings in Canton after August 31, on the pretext that they have not been registered again as ordered. To destroy all possible opposition, the Kuomintang Government may declare all village and town volunteer corps rebels against Dr. Sun Yat-sen and proceed to outlaw them all by giving its members a free hand in taking over control of the movement. The seizure of lawfully imported arms and the opposition by the Kuomintang to the amalgamation of the Provincial Volunteers are believed to be but preliminary steps to the subjugation of the whole Cantonese people under Kuomintang control. But Cantonese will oppose this and organization to do so is being considered and will soon be completed.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CANTON MERCHANTS AND DR. SUN

Mr. Chan Lim-pak's Denial of Any Complicity in Alleged Revolutionary Plot

Canton, Aug. 22.

Mr. Chan Lim-pak, Commandant of the Canton Merchants' Volunteer Corps, when communicated with regarding the recent charge of Dr Sun Yat-sen that he was intriguing to overthrow his Government in Canton, to become Governor himself, and cancel the independence of Kuangtung in favour of the North, —as suggested by Marshal Wu Pei-fu, with whom Dr. Sun has been accusing Mr. Chan of maintaining a connexion,—strongly denied the insinuation. He stated that he was a business man pure and simple and never had dreamed of going into politics in his life. He had taken a leading part in the Merchants' Volunteer movement simply because its object and purpose were for the self-protection of the business community. As Mr. Chan is a leading business man, having engaged in banking, silk, mining, shipping and other lines for the last 20 years, and has many interests to protect, it was natural that he should take an important part in the Volunteer movement. As to his connexion with Marshal Wu Pei-fu, he denied it flatly.

It is understood that the Canton Merchants' Volunteers will not give up their original decision to defend their property, re-asserting that they obtained permission to import arms before the consignment was seized by the very authorities which had issued the permit, that is, the Canton Government. The Volunteers consider this act of the Government dishonourable and unjust. Cantonese residents are now erecting barriers on their streets to prevent possible looting by Dr. Sun's mercenaries, who, it is said, have already received secret instructions as to what to do in case of something unfavourable happening to Dr. Sun.

Cantonese abroad are cabling home advising moderate action on the part of all, and asking Dr. Sun Yat-sen to return to their rightful owners the arms and ammunition he has seized.

Honan Troops and Bolsheviks.

Later.

Replying to the protest of the Canton merchants' against the stationing of Honanese mercenaries in the business sections of the city, Governor Liao Chung-hoi, of Kuangtung, informed a delegation of Canton business men who interviewed him on August 20, that the Government had to protect itself. If nothing unusual should happen in the next few days, the Government would be glad to withdraw the troops from the business section, it was understood.

The business men's delegation, however,, did not hesitate to make it plain to the Civil Governor that the conduct of the mercenaries had never been well regarded by the Cantonese, that their presence might easily incite disaffection among the business men and cause misunderstanding, and that it was possible and might be necessary that shops around which the troops were quartered should rather close than suffer interference by the mercenaries. Such closing, the business men hoped, the Governor would not take as a suspension of business for the purpose of opposing the Government.

The merchants are not unaware of the presence of Chinese Bolshevists in Canton. It is believed that the Kuomintang Government intends to adopt communism in Canton, and that its first step will be to organize the labourers to its support. The obstacle to the success of such a step is the merchant class, whose strength is centred in the Merchants' Volunteer Corps.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CANTON FLOODED WITH PAPER

Which Kuomintang and Soldiers Force Merchants to Take at Face Value

FROM A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

Canton, Aug. 20.

The native bankers are confronted with three series of worthless paper money forced upon them by Dr. Sun's followers.

The Department of Finance of Dr. Sun's General Headquarter has recently issued $240,000 worth of military notes with an understanding that they shall be legal tender for revenue payments after July 20. But when the Yu Shang Gambling Syndicate, from which Dr. Sun borrowed money some time ago, offered some of these notes for protection fees, they were refused.

The notes ($300,000) issued by the Kuangtung Provincial Commissioner a month ago are now worth about 30 per cent. of their face value on the Canton market, but the mercenaries and officials of Dr. Sun and members of the Kuomintang and others backed by police are demanding full exchange when tendering the notes at the counters of native bankers.

Since August 15, Dr. Sun's Central Bank has been issuing many unsecured banknotes, with a proviso that those discounting or depreciating them in any way shall be severely dealt with by the Government of Dr. Sun.

All this worthless paper money affords much room for soldiers and Kuomintang members to make trouble for the native bankers and exchange-shop keepers, and the latter have found it wise to suspend business for the time being.

Further attempt is being made in Canton to muzzle the press. In addition to newspapers being strictly censored and printers having to submit their "copy" to police before publication, the Kuomintang Government is asking Governor Liao Chung-hoi of Kuangtung, who is also chief of the division of labour of the Kuomintang, to demand for the printers' employees a rise in wages from 30 to 50 per cent. and a charter practically turning over the printing field to the labourers.

Mr. Chan Lim-pak, Commandant of the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps and Commander-in-Chief of the Provincial Movement, for whose arrest a general alarm was issued by Governor Liao Chung-hoi of Kuangtung on August 15, has been in Hongkong since August 13, it is understood. Mr. Chan has a home on Peak Road, Hongkong, where his family has been living for several years, it is said, and Mr. Chan usually spends the weekends there.

PEITAIHO TEMPLE BAY ASSOCIATION

Interesting Points from Annual Meeting: The Chinese Attempt to Cut Householders Off from Beach

The third annual meeting of the Temple Bay Association, Peitaiho, was continued in the garden of Mr. E. S. Little on Saturday, August 16. Little, president of the association, was in the chair, supported by Major Hayes Kroner, secretary.

The question of a Municipality for Peitaiho arose out of the minutes.

Status of Land.

Reference to the matter of the status of the land on which the Association roads will stand, was made, and after some discussion during which various views were offered, it was proposed by Major Kroner and seconded by Dr. Baird as follows:—

"That the Association give to each landowner on whose ground a road or patn stands, that has been constructed by the Association or maintained by them, a statement to the effect that,—

'The land of Mr.———, occupied by Road or path (with name or description thereof) of so many feet in width and length, is recognized as the property of the original owner in turn for his permission that the path or road be built and maintained by the Association' and that this statement be signed by the President and Secretary upon proper identification and certified measurements by a member of the Roads Committee, and further, that a record of such a grant of right of way be filed with the local Police."

The resolution was carried, and the president embodied it in instructions to the Road Committee that the same should be carried into effect as soon as negotiations were settled for the future construction of roads and paths in Temple Bay Area.

The Foreshore Question.

Mr. Little made a full report on this matter. He reviewed past history contained in previous minutes and reports and said the matter had advanced by three stages.—1. The decision in the Tientsin Courts against the contention of the Association for public rights, to the Beach at all times. (2) The ownership of the land to the west of the rocks (that lie just in front of Mr. Little's house) and the land to the east of the rocks is a different matter. (3) That the case is now appealed to the Supreme Court in Peking only on the grounds of the rights of the Public to use the foreshore and have access thereto, and not concerned with the ownership thereof.

Access to the Beach.

Carrying the matter through recent history, Mr. Little said a number of emergency meetings, of as many members of the Executive Committee as could be got together, were called to consider what steps could be taken to combat the attempt on the part of certain Chinese to cut off access to the Beach in the area just south of the Strand Hotel. At one of these meetings, Mr. Evans and his Chinese Assistant, Mr. Kuo, were present, in addition to Major Kroner, Mr. Barry Eastham and himself. The newspapers referred to the matter at the time as "Attempted Blackmail," for those who were attempting to cut off the Strand Hotel from the beach did demand some several hundreds of dollars from Mrs. Scholz, and only removed parts of the barbed-wire fence that had been erected, after Mrs. Scholz had paid a part of the sum demanded. He stated that he felt urged to make a representation to the Consular Body in Tientsin about the matter, and a letter was sent to the Senior Consul General with the request that suitable steps be taken by the Consular Body to bring the matter before the Local Chinese Authorities so that the rights of the Public may be maintained. This petition had reaped no immediate results, as the correspondence was returned to the Association with the regrets of the Senior Consul-General that the matter was not one which could properly be brought before the Consular Body. An additional letter was despatched on July 29, to which no reply has been received.

Mr. Little, then requested the authority of the association to take the matter, or that the Executive Committee be empowered to take the matter before the Diplomatic Body. Mr. Davis suggested that the Committee exhaust all possible channels in Tientsin before going higher up with the matter; to this Mr. Little warmly agreed.

Mr. Davis further suggested that effort be made to gain the sympathy of leading Chinese who were intimate in the councils of the Chihli Party. Some suggestion was made that the Committee go direct to the Chihli Civil Governor.

Major Kroner moved, and Mr. Harper seconded:—

"The future action of the association on the foreshore question be left to the discretion of the executive committee, who preferably with the consent of the senior consul in Tientsin may go directly to the Civil Governor, and request him to establish the principle of Public Rights to the Beach."

The motion was carried.

A Municipality Discouraged.

Mr. E. S. Little, representing the Temple Bay Association at the meeting of all Association Presidents in August, 1923, stated that the principle results of the movement looking toward a Municipality at Peitaiho were encloaked in the statement of the representative of the Kung I Hui, that "the Kung I Hui could not cooperate toward a Union at Peitaiho," and further that this "place of Peitaiho was Chinese Soil" and Foreigners had no authority to set up or attempt to set up a municipal organization. Mr. Little further stated that as a member of a sub-committee appointed by the Association Presidents to call on the Diplomatic Body in Peking, he had interviewed the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps and was very kindly informed that "the Diplomatic Body could not initiate any steps looking toward Municipal Organization at Peitaiho,, but that they could and would consider suggestions that came to them." Mr. Little said that the above outline covers the present status of the case.

Mr. Davis saw it seemed to him that a more convenient solution of the Union here would be something like a confederation, each Association having certain rights but working for the common good under one head. The matter was left to the wisdom of the Executive Committee for further action if necessary.

The annual meeting of the association for 1924 was held on August 2, Mr. Little again presiding.

The question of a Community Electric Plant was allowed to drop for the time being.

The President stated in conclusion that he felt there had been a very successful year for the Temple Bay Association, and he wished to express his thanks for the united effort of all those who made this success possible; but that he felt sure of even greater success for the ensuing year.

AFFORESTATION THE ONLY REMEDY FOR CHINA'S RECURRENT FLOODS

Interview with Mr. D. Y. Lin, the Forestry Specialist of Kiaochou

FROM OUR TSINGTAO CORRESPONDENT.

Tsingtao, July 30.

"It is impossible, as I have said on several former occasions, but I wish to repeat it again, to lay too much stress upon the enormous importance of reafforestation," said Mr. D. Y. Lin, the chief of the Agricultural and Forestry Department of the Government of Kiaochow Territory, in an interview yesterday with the writer. Mr. Lin's opinions were sought in connexion with the present flood situation in North China, and what he said was not only convincing but is deserving of widespread attention in this country. "The deterioration of the various rivers in China and specially of those in Chihli province, would never have reached its present stage if deforestation had not taken place. I say specially the rivers in Chihli province because they all take their rise in the mountains west of the Peking-Hankow line, which for a great part consist of loess, a soil which is easily carried away by the rain."

"While in Tientsin during the months of November and December 1917," said Mr. Lin, "I had the opportunity of going through the flooded sections of the city, and it was a terrible sight indeed. The boatmen who took us around through the flooded streets would point out to us the highest marks made by the flood water on the different walls, and also tell us that millions were rendered homeless, that thousands had perished, and that coffins were seen floating in the flooded area. The country which was under crop ready for the harvest was then a great inland sea with boats plying between points or islands formed by rising ground. The damage done to crops and houses, and the loss caused by stoppage of trade, interruption f railway traffic on the Peking-Hankow and Tientsin-Pukow railways ran into millions of dollars." Here, Mr. Lin emphasized the importance of systematic afforestation. So long as China pays no attention to this important question, so long will the country be not immune from floods.

Forests and Floods

Mr. Lin said that from their relation to streamflow and soil erosion, one could readily see the relation of forests to floods. On all denuded mountains, a heavy rain is generally followed by the formation of a system of gullies. These gullies begin a short distance below the divide and then form lines of least resistance to the passage of water. As these gullies or furrows extend down the slope, they join neighbouring furrows and become rapidly wider and deeper until large gullies of many feet deep are formed. Where hills are thoroughly drained by a system of gullies, the water from a storm will sweep down through them in a fraction of the time that would be required if it had to trickle down in a thin sheet or amidst vegetable obstacles. Now if the main channel is unable to discharge the influx of water as fast as it rushes down, the result is a flood.

The high rate of run-off, which is characteristic of streams arising from denuded hills and mountains, enables them to carry an enormous amount of silt and boulders of extraordinary size. The transporting power of water varies as the sixth power of its velocity, so that if the velocity of a stream is increased ten times for instance, its transporting power is increased a million times. This is why, in the case of Chihli rivers, they speak of stones and boulders of large sizes carried down to the foot of mountains, and of the enormous quantity of silt brought down to raise the beds that have already been silted up.

"The problem of flood in Chihli, therefore, is fundamentally a forest problem," continued Mr. Lin. "A systematic programme of reforestation will have to be carried out before the problem of silt, the problem of unrestrained run-off of rainfall, and the problem of reservoirs, of dikes and outlets can be permanently solved.

Mr. Lin then quoted what several authorities had to say in reference to forests and floods. Mr. J. B. Taylor, in his attempt to arouse the people in Chihli to the necessity of inaugurating a permanent Chihli Conservancy Board, suggested among other things that reforestation was the most important remedial measure that should be taken in the control of Chihli floods, and he emphasized the point by saying: "It is absolutely essential to ameliorate the rivers, especially the Hun Ho, in the mountainous collecting basin, by reforestation and by the erection of barrages. The first effect of this is to delay the waters during heavy rains and so reduce the freshets and the liability to floods. But these improvements have a much more important effect, namely the keeping back of the silt which is so injurious to rivers. Forests act as a sponge. retaining moisture and furnishing a protective coating that prevents erosion."

Three Ways of Solving Problem.

Mr. P. L. Yang, in his study of the river system in Chihli, wrote: "There are three ways of solving the flood problem in Chihli, namely: (1) reforestation: (2) erection of barrages: and (3) construction of reservoirs. But the erection of barrages and the construction of reservoirs require such an enormous expenditure of money, and besides they do not have a permanent effect. So we may safely say that reforestation is the best and the most important measure to be considered in the control of floods in Chihli province."

Dr. P. E. Licent and Mr. T. Pincione had the same thing to say, namely that the best way to eradicate the flood menace was to pay attention to reforestation.

Mr. H. Vander Veen, C.E., who has been for many years consulting engineer to the Natural Conservancy Bureau in Peking, reported as follows:—"As long as the slope of the water level is such that a current can be maintained strong enough to carry all the matter held in suspension along, no harm is done. But....the natural slope of the plain is, for several rivers, insufficient. In such a case the river is therefore forced to get rid of the soil, held in suspension, along its way, consequently its bed gets raised and on the long run the river has to find another course, which it does by bursting its dykes to find in the lower lying land the place where it can deposit its burden, which it could carry no longer and for which no more room could be found in the old bed. This is the case more or less with every river running through the plain of China.

Undergrowth as Barrier.

"The reasons why the forest is able to check surface run-off and save portions of it to the soil are, "said Mr. Lin," first, the trunks and the underbrush in the forest offer mechanical obstruction: second, the litter of the forest floor checks rapid surface drainage of the water and also acts as a sponge; and third, the network of deeply penetrated rocks, living and decayed, make the forest soil more porous and permeable; hence the water sinks into it more readily. It is evident that the ability of the forest to check surface run-off is greatest when the forest is dense and when the ground beneath it is covered with an unbroken leaf litter.

"Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that when water is precipitated from the clouds, a portion of it is prevented from reaching the ground through interception by the leaves, branches and trunks of trees. This intercepted portion varies according to the tree species and the density of the woods. According to Bavarian investigations, it averages 23 per cent. of the total rainfall. So after a rain, we often find that water continues to drop from the leaves and twigs for hours.

"It is impossible to lay too much stress upon the enormous importance of reafforestation."

PEKING, Aug. 19.—A mandate has been issued, in response to a memorial from the Minister of Finance, authorizing suspension of the administrative section of the Shanghai mint, the Ministry of Finance to carry on the work of this section. The Ministry is instructed to provide the necessary funds and proceed with the work without interuption.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOUTHWARD HO!

"East, West, Home's Best"

BY W. BRUCE LOCKHART.

It has been said that one can judge a city by its public monuments but until the time comes when we who dwell in Shanghai can proudly display a silver saxophone shining aloft on its Carrara pedestal, I fear a stranger's judgment of our town will be amiss.

Not so with Hongkong, however, for, facing the gateway of the Colony, the landing stage of Blake Pier, one finds a statue of "H.R.H. Arthur Duke of Connaught and Strathearn. Presented to the Colony by C. P. Chater, April, 1890."

This, the first statue erected here, aptly commemorates the two men who, to the present day, easily hold the "Statue Record" for the Far East: the Duke—for unveiling them, the Commoner—for presenting them!

A few steps along the Praya is Statue Square, the show place of Hongkong and in the centre we find the Victoria Memorial with the august old lady sitting on her throne holding the orb and sceptre in either hand. (Incidentally, one wonders how she can sit up there year after year without wanting to powder her nose, which she is powerless to do since both hands are occupied in balancing those emblems of her royal state.) However, this monument has been provided with a stone canopy so Queen Victoria runs no risk of having either her dress or her complexion spoiled by torrential rains or tropical sun, as, alas, both her daughter-in-law and granddaughter-in-law do!

On February 6, 1907, the Duke of Connaught returned here to unveil two statues, one of King Edward VII—"Erected and presented by Sir C.P. Chater"—and the other of the then Prince of Wales, now King George V,—"Erected and presented by J. J. Bell Irving, Esq."

King Edward is represented in his coronation robes, crowned, holding his sceptre in one hand and an orb in the other, while the tassel of State dangles gracefully penduous.

Some two and a half years later the loyal citizens deemed it appropriate to provide the late, and the present King, with their gracious Consorts, and we find that on November 25, 1909, the then Governor, Sir Frederick Lugard, unveiled two more statues, one of Queen Alexandra—"Erected and presented to the Colony by the subscribers to the Coronation Fund of 1902—and the other of Queen Mary—"Erected and presented by H. N. Mody, Esq., a Parsi Gentleman."

It seems to have taken some time, seven years to be precise, for the subscribers to the Coronation Fund of 1902 to make up their minds how to spend the money, but patience wins in the end and the statue stalwarts got their way. Personally, I cannot quite fathom the cryptic sentence—"H. N. Mody, Esq., a Parsi Gentleman."—who was responsible for presenting Queen Mary's effigy to the Colony. Does it mean that when one has reached a pinnacle of affluence which enables one to present statues of Royalty to one's fellow inhabitants the efflux of time has, willy nilly, turned one into a gentleman, or does it mean there are so few gentlemen among the Parsis that an exception to the rule is of public moment, worthy of perpetuation in the everlasting bronze?

I have not the least idea and must leave it at that—but the reflexion is prompted by a line of our famous Shanghai chanty—"The "Greeks, the Armenians and the Turks," and being told that one of Hongkong's most loyal and famous citizens is of Armenian antecedents I could not help pondering the reason for such a testimonial of social excellence, since civic excellence is all apparent in the statue, and the giver thereof!

By the way, the statue of King George is quite the best I have ever seen of a royal personage as he is represented in naval uniform and cloaked, standing alertly straining against the breeze. He looks a living, alert sailor, and has the atmosphere and flair of the commander on the bridge of his ship. Mr. Bell Irving has managed to give Hongkong a worthy monument of our King, but, and one records it with regret, both King Edward and his beautiful Consort recall memories of a certain red brick building hard by the Baker Street Underground? Queen Mary's effigy is pleasing and natural and she is not made to balance a wand with a canary perched on the tip of it as poor Queen Alexandra has to do, year after year.

War Memorials.

In the matter of its War Memorial Hongkong must be justly proud of its noble Cenotaph erected in 1919 to "The Glorious Dead" which, to me, seems in finely dignified contrast to our ninety thousand taels worth of "Winged Victory" which we put on the Shanghai Bund in 1923.

Here they laid out a beautiful grass space surrounded with granite edging and with granite pavements leading up to the Cenotaph which stands in noble simplicity, mute, majestic.

Here no coolies may profane this holy ground with unholy gabbling and expectoration. One feels that to set foot upon that plot would speedily land one in the magistrate's court on a charge of unhallowed and blatant trespass.

Yet, I think that the brightly gilded standard staffs which flank the granite Cenotaph strike incongruous somewhat. One feels they should have been fashioned from the gunmetal of Armageddon for wind and weather to place their patina upon these symbols of the Cause, as Time places its merciful patina on the heartaches of mothers and maids who yielded their men unto Moloch!

Then across the square there is a figure of Fame holding a wreath of laurel and a smaller figure of a private of the line—"In memory of men of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank."—There are the names of 42 men of the Bank who proved with their lives the aristocracy of "Wayfoong" among the money changers of the East.

"They shall grow not old as we that
Age shall not weary them nor the years condemn,
At the going down of the sun and in the morning
We will remember them."

Within the portals of the Hongkong Club one is able to sense the soul of the Colony, so it seems to me, and it is in the manner of the Club's memorial to its own members that this stands out.

There are two long bronze plaques on which have been cast the names of the imperishable Dead, and of the Living.

"MEMBERS OF THE CLUB WHO GAVE THEIR LIVES IH THE GREAT WAR 1914—1918."

Here follow the names, the rank, the regiment, the manner, the place and the date of the passing out of 24 members.

"On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the Dead"

It is a pleasing, a clubbable, and a sensible thing to have placed here a full record of the members, what they were, and where they died.

What a pity the Shanghai Club couldn't have done the same thing instead of merely enumerating the names of its members, and nought beside?

Flanking the above plaque is another one commemorating the names of 168 members of the Club who left the Colony on Active Service, 1914—1918.

T. J.

There is one other statue of a famous man to be mentioned—that of Sir Thomas Jackson, the great manager of the Hongkong Bank, and it faces the head office here.

It is a figure of much power and dignity and must prove a professional inspiration to young officers of the bank coming out who have made themselves acquainted with his banking career and the troublous times through which the great banker piloted his treasure barque into the haven of assured security.

So in Statue Square do we see an epitome of Hongkong—Royalty and those who represent them, Commoners grown affluent who. presenting effigies of Royalty to the city, secure perpetuity on the pedestals thereof; the oil of Commerce represented by a Thomas Jackson, the spirit and splendour of Youth by the names of those 24 dead banking men.

For Panjandrums of Propinquity, seeking perpetuity by pedestals, a new tone was set when the Prince of Wales visited the Colony a year or two ago. Being asked if he would graciously accord his royal permission for a statue of himself to be "erected and presented" by the local record holder, "Our Young Man" was graciously pleased to reply that the money could be much better spent in providing facilities for ex-service men, and Hongkong smiles and breathed more freely perhaps, for knowing that the era of the Effigy is past, and the era of the Man at hand.

BOLSHEVISTS IN CHINA

Mr. J.O.P. Bland on Their Pernicious Influences

Mr. J. O. P. Bland, writing from the Thatched House Club to the "Times," states: With reference to your leading article of July 19, on the subject of Bolshevists in China, may I be permitted to point out that their activities and propaganda have gone a good deal farther than those which are reflected in the Chinese - Bolshevist agreement? There is no hesitation in the methods and no ambignity in the language wherewith the Soviet and its agents are endeavouring to stir the Chinese to open hostility to the Treaty Powers, and especially to Great Britain. The facts are flagrant, and their deplorable effect upon British prestige and interests in the Far East is undoubtedly increased by our Government's extraordinary persistence in negotiating financial questions with the Soviet's delegates in London.

The attitude and purposes of the Bolshevists in China were clearly demonstrated in connexion with an unprovoked and brutal assault recently committed by a Chinese soldier upon an Englishman walking on the city wall of Peking. Referring to this outrage in a speech at the Moscow Opera House, Trotzky (while disclaiming any intention of compromising the negotiations in London) was unable to refrain from "loudly proclaiming to this Chinese soldier that Moscow's proletariats were with him, heart and soul." Now, the Chinese are not Bolshevists, and never will be, but in the face of unchallenged utterances such as this they may well be excused if they misinterpret the significance of our protracted and humiliating negotiations with Trotzky's colleagues, and act accordingly.

Another interesting commentary on Bolshevist activities is supplied by the Chinese Press. With reference to a recent disorderly outbreak by the pupils of Peiyang University, it is reported that the Minister of the Interior has sent a secret message to the Civil Governor of Chihli, informing him that the students have lately refused to work, and are busy spreading Bolshevist propaganda, such as the nationalization of women, "to the great danger of the peace and order of the country;" and requesting the Governor to take steps to have them placed under proper control.

Surely, Sir, it is inconsistent with our national dignity, not to mention our material interests, that our Government should persist any longer in this sorry farce of a friendly conference with those whose avowed object is the world-wide destruction of all things decent, honest and honourable.

LABOUR QUARRELS IN JAPAN

Proposed Introduction of an Arbitration Bill

Tokyo, Aug. 19.

Compulsory publication of the cause of any dispute, with a public hearing by properly appointed representatives of each side, assisted by officials and press representatives, is the plan proposed under the terms of a suggested Arbitration Bill for the settlement of labour quarrels.

Hitherto such disputes have been solved by an appeal to the police authorities and to the Courts, but it is now suggested that a more satisfactory method would be to make the whole matter publicly known, and let the public judge and decide the merits of the case.

It is stated that this Act will be proposed for legislation in the coming Session of the Diet.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MILITARY REFORMS IN JAPAN

Proposed Reduction in Number of Army Divisions to Provide Funds for Air Service Extension and Adoption of Modern Methods of Warfare

Tokyo, Aug 20.

For several days past leading papers have been giving prominence to what they allege are authentic reports of deliberations that have been going on in Army circles, concerning the proposed military reforms and curtailment of expenditure. Details of the scheme are for the most part lacking, because, as the papers themselves declare, nothing definite has been made public, and the schemes have still some way to go before they can be said to have been finally adopted, but the army authorities themselves are reported to have declared that it is certainly true that they are contemplating the reduction of the number of divisions in order to provide the necessary funds for the expansion of the air-service, and for the adoption of more modern methods of warfare.

The proposals outlined by the War Department have been lately laid before a meeting of Military Councillors and Field-Marshals, who after listening to the necessary explanations of the Minister and offering their criticisms have adjourned their meeting so that the subject may have further consideration before finally approved by them.

It is pointed out that the real struggle will come when the War authorities present their scheme to the Cabinet for approval, as the latter is pledged to the all-round reduction of expenses in order to lessen the public burdens, while the War Office does not propose that its reductions shall be used in any other way than for the promotion of military efficiency by the adoption of modern methods. According to the policy laid down by the Cabinet, each Department is expected to curtail expenditure to the utmost limit so that the productive capacity of the country may be increased, and the economic situation remedied.

Proposed Course of Action.

The War authorities, on the other hand, regard their proposals of such supreme importance to the State, that they intend to do their best to convince the Cabinet of the correctness of their stand. They hold that the question of army reform should be separated from, and treated as a different matter from purely administrative re-adjustments. In view of the possible clash that may occur, the Military Council now considering the proposals is expected to lay down a course of action to be followed in order that the end may be secured. Should the Cabinet be hard to convince, it is hinted that the War authorities may use their special prerogative, in that the reform plan will be separated from the ordinary expenditure of the Department, and submitted to the Throne for approval in a separate bill, after the Military Council has passed upon it.

According to those who claim to know what is going on, the proposed plan calls for a reduction of the number of divisions by four, the removal of one division from the mainland to Korea, the abolition or amalgamation of certain military schools and other institutions, and the use of the money thus saved for the adoption of new weapons and the expansion of the air-service.

One paper, the "Hochi," gives figures, which must, however, be accepted in all probability with some reserve. It says that the amount of retrenchment to be effected by the plan is about Y. 18,000,000, Y. 14,000,000 of which will be spent on the air-service, and the rest on new weapons, research into poisonous gas, a tank corps, and the improvement of scientific laboratories.

Air Service Extensions.

The air-service appropriations, says the paper, are to be apportioned to two additional aviation corps, one bombing corps, and one anti-air-craft gun corps.

It further states that the reduction in the number of divisions will be effected by decreasing the number of units in a division, and extending the regimental district covered by each division.

Officers to be discharged will, it is expected, find employment in the middle schools and colleges of the country, where they will be engaged in the military training of the students under the plan drawn up by the Military and Educational authorities for the improvement in national education.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN'S INTEREST IN ATHLETICS

Physical Training Campaign for Improvement of Nation's Physique

Tokyo, Aug. 20.

Under the auspices of the Army and Educational authorities, the first three days of November, including the birthday of the late Emperor Meiji, have been set aside for a "Physical Training" campaign throughout the country.

The programme for those three days includes athletic meetings, lectures, and movie shows, all designed to promote an interest in sport and to initiate a movement for the improvement of the nation's physique. In Tokyo the occasion will be taken of formally opening the new Public Stadium that is being built in the outer grounds of the Meiji Shrine. In celebration of the event a national athletic meeting will be staged in which leading athletes from all parts of the country are expected to participate.

It is proposed that these Physical Training days shall be observed annually, and that this initial meeting shall be taken advantage of for the formulation of regulations to govern future observances.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

INSURGENT Koreans are causing trouble on the Korean border, according to reports reaching Tokyo. Conditions are said to be chaotic. Manu inhabitants have moved to other places where they are assured of police protection. Business in many districts is at a standstill. Banks have refused to make loans. In one district the post office was robbed by a gang which took away important documents and registered mail. Authorities who pursued them were beaten back. They reported the bandits as being heavily armed.

DAILY NEWSPAPER FOR TSINGTAO

"Tsingtao Leader" Taken Over by New Company with Admirable Aims

Tsingtao, Aug. 22.

Tsingtao's first English daily newspaper will be launched here on September 1, a new company known as the "Tsingtao Times" Company having taken over the "Tsingtao Leader," now published semi-weekly. The latter will automatically go out of existence with the advent of the new paper. The new concern includes Chinese, Japanese and Americans in its directorate, and in the statement of its aims declares that it will "work for the best interests of Tsingtao by promoting international co-operation and friendship among its cosmopolitan population, by stimulating its commercial and industrial development, by supporting and advocating all measures pertaining to civic betterment, and by making Tsingtao better known to the outside world."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WE have received the report of the Chinese Post Office for 1923, an extended notice of which will appear next week. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that the number of articles of mail matter posted during the year exceeds 473½ millions. This figure represents an increase of 31½ millions on the total for 1921—the highest point hitherto reached—and of 47 millions over the aggregate for last year. The number of additional places provided with postal facilities in the course of the year was 1,733. Of this number, 290 were major establishments and 1,443 minor stations, the total number of places provided with postal facilities at the close of the year being 40,318.

RUSH OF WEDDINGS IN JAPAN

Imperial Hotel Booked Six Deep: Engagement Rings the Newest Fashion

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Aug. 16.

In the West it is the June bride; in Japan, it is the October bride. In the West spring time is ring time; in the land of the Rising Sun, autumn time is ring time.

October is the great month when young ladies here change their names at the shrine of Hymen, and marriage shrines are employing small armies of men who are working day and night putting up the necessary buildings in which weddings can be properly solemnized. The Hibiya Daijingu, just by the Imperial Hotel, one of the most favourite spots in Tokyo for joining a man and a maid for life is being feverishly restored to some semblance of what it was before the seismic fires of last September made it little less than a memory.

Notices of marriage so far given show that, this year, all previous records will be broken. The Imperial Hotel is booked for wedding receptions practically every day and night from the middle of September to the end of the fall. As many as six receptions a day will be held here, according to the management. One of the most brilliant of Japan's coming social events will be the marriage of Miss Takahashi, daughter of a former premier who abandoned his title of Viscount and descended to the rank of a commoner to fight the Kiyoura ministry which was called a Ministry of the "privileged classes." Mr. Takahashi is now Minister of Agriculture and Commerce in the Kato Cabinet which succeeded the Kiyoura ministry His daughter is to be united in wedlock to Mr. Nagura, one of Japan's coming commercial barons.

The ring in token of engagement is becoming increasingly popular in Japan, but though many married women wear the little hoop of gold, signifying that she is married, on the correct finger, the ring is not part of the temple rites. A woman here often wears a ring—a real wedding ring—long before the marriage has been solemnized.

For some time, very few Japanese maidens of marriageable age have been seen in the hotels, at dances, on the boulevards; The reason is that they are busy making their trousseaux and preparing for the marriage rush in October which is considered an ideal and lucky period in which to undertake life's greatest adventure.

Mr. Hanihara's Sister Painter.

The first Japanese woman to put the nude feminine form divine on canvas is Miss Kuwako Hanihara.

She is a sister of the Japanese ambassador to the United States, but she has achieved a great amount of publicity and fame because of the nude painting in her studio rather than because she is the sister of a brother whose "grave consequences" remark produced such a stertling aftermath.

Miss Hanihara is determined to have her attempt in oils exhibited at the annual Fine Arts exhibition to be held in the autumn, and her venture is furnishing material for absorbing conversation in art circles and amongst society people.

She found tremendous difficulty in securing one of her sex to pose for her. This is said to be because the genus mulier, at least those of passable bodily qualifications, have ever entertained a deep aversion to being made an object of careful study and scrutiny by one of their own sex. The nude feminine form divine, in Japan, has always been reserved for the masculine brush, and gossip is rife as to who posed for Miss Hanihara and poached on a jealously-guarded field of the male painter.

Miss Hanihara keeps very silent, despite the attempts to try to make her disclose the identity of her model. She has refused to permit anyone to see her painting and has declared that none shall see it till after the judges have.

Persistent reports declare that Miss Hanihara's model was herself.

Tokyo People Forgetful.

It may be the unprecedented heat, but the citizens of Tokyo are very foregetful; at the same time they seem to be very honest, too.

The Metropolitan Police have just announced that a sum of over Yen 200,000 in cash is held by them, the aggregations of various purses turned in to the police from trams, trains and other vehicles and found on various parts of the streets and parks by citizens. The Tokyo station is said to have yielded over Y.50 in cash a day. This money has come in steady and increasing streams since the mercury in the thermometer began to go up, and, while the police appreciate the honesty of the finders, they also deplore the loss of memory of the losers.

There is also a monkey, a little doggie and several pigeons which are fast becoming pets of the police officers since no one has yet come to claim them. One room in the police headquarters is chock full of handbags, umbrellas, walking sticks, fountain pens and wooden clogs.

The money and other articles have been mostly found in trams and trains, according to the police.

THE STUMBLING BLOCK IN SAGHALIEN

Deadlock Over Rival Claims in Soviet-Japanese Negotiations

Peking, August 23.

Owing to the wide difference of opinion between the Japanese and Soviet delegates over the question of rights in Saghalien, he Russo-Japanese negatiations have been brought to a deadlock.

Despite the agreement at the last meeting that the negotiations should be suspended for a few days, Mr. Yoshizawa, Japanese Minister, after careful consideration, approached M. Karakhan with a view to keeping the negotiations going without interruption. He called at the Soviet Embassy at 6 o'clock this afternoon, and made an exhaustive explanation of the question of rights in North Saghalien, in accordance with instructions from the Tokyo Government, with a view to evoking M. Karakhan's final decision.

The interview lasted three hours, but the delegates of the two countries failed to arrive at any decisive conclusion owing to the Soviet delegate's firm attitude. The Russo-Japanese discussions have thus come to such a pass that it seems almost impossible for the delegates of the two countries to settle the question of Saghalien unless some substantial concessions are volunteered by both sides. At the next meeting, which is due to take place on Tuesday next, it is expected that the Japanese and Soviet delegates will find no alternative but to continue their discussion of unsettled problems, leaving out the question of Saghalien,unless, in the meantime, some new formula for the solution of the last mentioned question can be found.—Eastern News Agency.

EMPIRE AERIAL SERVICE FOR JAPAN

Y. 21,000,000 to be Expended

Tokyo, Aug. 19.

A plan to spend Y. 21,000,000 during the next five years on aerial routes within the Empire has been formulated by the Aviation Bureau attached to the Department of Communications.

Two routes are at present proposed, one between Tokyo and Mukden, viâ Hakone, Osaka, Okayama, Hamada, Taiko, and Heijo, and the other between Etorofu in the Kurile Islands and Kagoshima, viâ Kasumigaura and Kishimoto. During the first year it is proposed to open the route between Tokyo and Hamada, calling for an initial expenditure of Y. 6,000,000, which will be used for maintenance, observatories, aviation grounds, and bounties to manufacturers and air-transport companies.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN AND THE SOVIET

Japanese Man-of-war at Kamchatka

Moscow, Aug. 26.

The "Pravda," announcing the arrival of a Japanese man-of-war at Ust-Kamchatka, says that the local authorities have requested the commander to leave the place, but the vessel remains and refuses to move. The report adds that this greatly irritates and perturbs the population of Kamchatka.—Reuter.

JAPAN EARTHQUAKE ANNIVERSARY

Great Memorial Day Projected: Interesting Review of work of Rebuilding Tokyo

Tokyo, Aug. 20.

A "Day of Remembrance" is planned by the Prefectural and Municipal authorities of Tokyo and other parts of the devastated area for the observance of the first anniversary of the great disaster on September 1. It has been provisionally fixed that the citizens should be invited to observe the day in remembrance of those who lost their lives in the earthquake and fire, and should have their attention called by a monster propaganda to the necessity of thrift and economy in their daily lives.

The central point of the observance of the anniversary will be the general call to silence at 11.58 a.m., the time at which the earthquake struck the district last year. Memorial services will be held in churches and temples, in memory of the dead.

With the approach of this anniversary, a review of conditions as they are to-day, and compared with those existing on September 1 last year, is not without interest.

Tokyo 70 Per cent. Restored.

According to this review, which has been prepared and given out by the Home Department, the city of Tokyo has been, not permanently, but temporarily, rehabilitated to the extent of nearly 70 per cent. that is to say, of the total number of houses destroyed in the early days of September nearly 200,000 have been rebuilt. In the districts of Azabu, Akasaka, Koishikawa, and Yotsuya, which were only partially devastated, all the houses have been rebuilt, while in the other districts, where the destruction was much more general, some 60 to 80 per cent. have been re-erected.

It is expected that the temporary rehabilitation of the city will be completed by the end of the year, and that with the publication of the new building regulations the permanent construction will then be started. This permanent reconstruction, says the report, is expected to take at least 10 years, but it is thought that in five years at most Tokyo will again assume the aspect it wore before the earthquake took place.

With regard to those who are still living in temples, and other public buildings, outside the public barracks, the report estimates the number at less than 10,000, and states that accommodation will be found for them all by the end of the year.

The Movies' Popularity.

The report goes on to call attention to the increase in the number of theatres and movie houses that have been erected since last autumn. Before the earthquake the number of such places was 30. Of these some 20 were destroyed. Today the total number or such places of entertainment is 42, including the 10 that were spared destruction.

Hotels and restaurants were the slowest to recover, says the review, but at present about four-fifths of the number destroyed have been rebuilt, and applications for the construction of others are being filed daily.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE LADY AVIATOR

Engaged by Chang Tso-lin as Member of his Corps

Tokio, Aug. 19.

Miss Shigeno Kibe, aged 22, daughter of Mr. Kibe, a wealthy timber-merchant of Shin Gishu, Korea, and contractor to Gen. Chang Tso-lin of Mukden, has been engaged by the famous Chinese War-lord as a member of his aviation corps.

Miss Kibe is about to graduate at the Munesato Aviation School, near Tsurumi, a suburb of Tokio, and is expected to take up her new duties soon after. Before she starts for Mukden, she will take part in an air-competition promoted by the Imperial Aviation Association.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

TOKYO, Aug. 21.—The latest reports state that the Ryufuku Maru, which was reported yesterday to be in danger of sinking owing to a storm, is taking refuge in the Goto Islands.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHINA CATTLE

Important Movement to Develop Herds and Flocks by Importing Stock from America

Peking, Aug. 21.

Reuter's Agency has received the following for publication:—

"A promising indication of the development of animal industry in North China is evidenced by the work of the department of agriculture of Peking University (Yenching). Arrangements are now being completed for the importation of pure-bred beef and dairy cattle, sheep, swine and poultry from America this autumn.

The shipment will be accompanied by Professor Bransford Bubank, who is coming to Yenching to take charge of the work in animal husbandry. Mr. Bubank is a native of the state of Texas, a graduate of the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College and has had a wide experience in ranch life and live stock development. Mr. Bubank resigned his position as agricultural secretary for the Nixon (Texas) Chamber of Commerce to accept his present post.

Foreign Blood.

The University aims to make a study of the present types of cattle found in China and Mongolia with the aim to improve by the introduction of foreign blood and scientific selection of breeding animals. The factors affecting animal disease will be considered with the development of measures for control.

A special study is to be made of the foods available for animal use and the most economical types of animal rations to be formulated. As the department develops, experimentation and investigations will be carried on relating to meats and meats' products, animal by-products, etc. Some of the courses to be offered are:—Principles of Animal Breeding, Live Stock Management, Types and Breeds of Live Stock, Feedhs and Feeding, Disease of Farm Animals, Meats and Meat Products, Market Milk, Dairy Fundamentals, and a Seminar in Animal Husbandry.

Herds of Great Value.

It has been estimated that China now has cattle valued at Mex. $1,500,000. In the provinces of Shantung alone the sheep are estimated to have a value of Tls. 35,000,000. Conservative estimates place China's pork production at $1,000,000,000 and the value of poultry and eggs produced each year doubtless exceeds $400,000,000. Chinese students are now awake to the opportunities which are open to China in her economic development..

Professor Walter E. Chamberlain, who is the Head of the Agricultural Department, reports the keen interest of students in this new subject, and application for admission to the University are being received from a wide area extending from Canton in the South, to Russia in the North. Only a limited number of students will be accepted by the Department this year and August 27 is the last day that appplication blanks may be returned."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SIR R. HO TUNG'S GOOD ADVICE TO STUDENTS

Great Opportunities for Young China to Assist Progress: A Duty to All

London, Aug. 26.

Sir Robert and Lady Ho Tung and their son and daughter were the guests of honour at a reception yesterday at Highleigh, Hertfordshire, where the annual conference of the Central Union of Chinese Students in Britain is being held.

Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires, who presided, addressed the students. He described Sir Robert Ho Tung as a great philanthropist and patriot keenly interested in the welfare of the fatherland. Lady Ho Tung had done much to increase the silk industry in China.

Sir Robert Ho Tung, in his reply, thanked the students for their kind reception and expressed admiration at their enterprise in coming so far to seek knowledge. He urged them to try and maintain the best traditions of China. Great opportunities awaited them for promoting the welfare of China as doctors, health experts and teachers, and there were also many opportunities in the development of the latent potentialities of China in mining, road-making, railway construction, inland navigation and waterworks.

Mechanical development, Sir Robert said, was still in its infancy. He concluded by exhorting the students to do all in their power to help China to maintain her position among the great nations of the world. The most important thing was to do one's duty to the country for the benefit of the human race.—Reuter.

MILITARY TRAINING FOR SCHOOLBOYS

Outcome of Japan's Army Reform Scheme: Instructors Officers on Active List

Tokyo, Aug. 28.

A definite step towards military training for the nation has been taken in the reported decision of the Departments of War and of Education to attach one or more officers to each of the Middle and Higher Schools throughout the country to supervise the military training of the students.

While so attached, these officers will remain on the Army Active List and will be paid by the Army. They will return periodically to their regiments for additional training and in this way spread general knowledge as regards defence principles, so that the ultimate result will be, it is hoped, to make it practicable to reduce the term of conscription to one year in accordance with the popular demand.

If the Cabinet approves the decision, the regulations will be enforced in April, 1925.

This proposed employment of officers is regarded as solving the question of the disposal of the 2,000 officers who were to be discharged under the military reform scheme, which has received the approval of the Supreme Military Council, and at the same time keep them on the Active List in case of emergencies.

The reform scheme, which having been finally approved is now being submitted to the Cabinet, provides for the reduction of four Divisions. This is estimated to save Y.18,500,000 approximately, of which the bulk will be devoted to the establishment during the next three years of three additional aviation corps, one tank corps and two anti-aircraft corps and of chemical and scientific research, leaving Y.1,300,000 in accordance with the general retrenchment policy laid down by the Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A Japanese news agency telegram from Dairen states that the Lungkou Bank there had a run on it by depositors on the 15th instant. The Bank is capitalized at Y. 15,400,000 and is a joint Sino-Japanese enterprise patronized by the Kuantung Government and Dairen Municipality. In view of the far-reaching effect likely to be produced on the local financial world if the bank failed, a conference was held the same day by local bankers and Japanese Government authorities, but no definite decision was reached. The bank was crowded with depositors and there was great confusion throughout the day.

An earthquake census compiled by the Central Observatory, Tokyo, gives the total number of earthquakes recorded in Japan since the great shock of September 1 last year as 4,096, of which 2,364 occurred last year, and 2,360 in the month of September. Those that were apparent to the senses without the help of a seismometer numberd 1,501, of which 1,334 took place last year. The number of shocks this year to date is 736, of which 167 were strong enough to be felt. The biggest quake next to that of January 15 occurred on August 15 last year. It is interesting to note that the yearly number of earthquakes recorded in Tokyo before the earthquake of September 1 ranged between 200 and 300, of which 25 or 30 were sufficiently strong to be felt by everyone. The number of earthquakes certainly shows signs of decreasing, although the settling down of the crust has not yet been completed.

BY AIR TO HONGKONG

Mails and Passengers: Support Promised for American Flying Man's Venture

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hongkong, Aug. 22.

An aerial mail service on the China Coast is not a new idea, but there has been little enthusiasm shown in previous years for the project. Perhaps now that public interest has been stimulated by the flights of world aviators there will be a readier ear lent to suggestions for a quick method of travel and speedy postal service. A scheme is afoot here to float a company to operate mail and passenger aeroplanes between Hongkong and Shanghai, and the capital appears to be forthcoming. The moving spirit in the project is Mr. H. W. Abbott, the daring American aviator who gave us several thrills on a reconstructed Curtis biplane, until it became hopelessly wrecked two months ago.

Seen by me to-day, Mr. Abbott said he had been promised support by certain local financial interests provided he can obtain Government permission. This he is at present negotiating for, and hopes to overcome any objections there might be. The main thing, of course, will be to come to a working arrangement with the local Post Office authorities. Abbott says he has already been told by the naval authorities that there will be no objection on their part, provided the company enter into the usual undertaking as regards restrictions on passengers taking photographs. Possibly, the military authorities will also have to be consulted in connexion with landing sites and flight over certain areas. If all local arrangements prove satisfactory, Abbott's next move will be to arrange matters at the Shanghai end.

Two Flying Boats.

I have been shown the calculations on which the scheme is based. The estimate is for a minimum capital of $100,000, with which it will be possible to purchase two flying boats at present at Macao, for $40,000 each, leaving $20,000 in hand as working capital. If surplus war machines be obtained from the United States, says Abbott, the cost will be considerably less. He has inspected the planes at Macao, and considers them quite suitable for the purpose in view. One is capable of carrying 14 passengers, inclusive of two pilots, whilst the other is capable of carrying 1,500 lb. weight of freight or mail matter. These calculations are exclusive of the fuel-carrying capacity of the machines. Each of these flying boats is able to attain a speed of 100 miles an hour, when fully loaded, consuming 50 to 60 gallons of aviation spirit an hour (obtainable on special terms at 50 cents a gallon) and two gallons an hour of lubricating oil at $1.20 a gallon. The flying distance between here and Shanghai, about 750 miles, will be covered in about eight hours.

It will be necessary to engage six expert flying men, four to pilot the machines and two to be in reserve, as well as two skilled aeroplane mechanics. It is estimated that the former will be obtainable at salaries of $800 a month, and the latter at $200. The flying boats will be expected to do 15 trips each in a month. If necessary, and public patronage makes it worth while, the fleet could be extended.

Single Fare $100

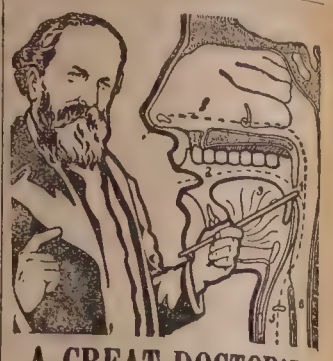
The fare proposed for passengers is put at only $100 per head, and it is hoped to average eight passengers each trip. For the freight and mail service it is proposed to charge 30 cents an ounce, which compares with the 25 cents gold charged by the U.S.A. air mails. It is expected that the weight of mail and freight each trip will average 800 lb.

The scheme certainly appears to be a very promising one, and provided public confidence in what will be an entirely new method of voyaging for this part of the world be gained, there seems no reason why it should not go ahead to early realization. But the way the public take to the proposal will be everything; and it is a big but.

Lt.-Cdr. C. R. Thompson, who will join the Titania at Hongkong, will be placed on duty with the submarines in the China Station, and of which he will have command. This appointment will have effect from September 1. Lt.-Cdr. Thompson was employed in submarine work during the late war, and commanded the L33 on the China Station in 1920, so that he is no stranger to his coming duties.

The "Silver Wolf," the official organ of the Boy Scouts Association of Hongkong, contains some interesting and instructive articles in furtherance of the policy adopted by the Scout movement of encouraging useful hobbies amongst boys. Subjects relative to the attainment of the various badges are discussed in short articles in a manner which applies especially to Scouts in Hongkong. Under the heading of the Naturalist badge such subjects as the Cone-bearing Trees of Hongkong appears, while the notes on carpenters tools discuss the relative merits of Eastern and Western tools. The treatment is good and brings up many subjects of interest to the Scout which would otherwise escape his notice. There are also various contributions in the form of serial stories.

Never has the world been so free from plague, says Dr. W. M. Willoughby, the Port of London's medical officer.



A GREAT DOCTOR'S OPINION OF PEPS

That the eminent British Physician, Dr. Gordon Stables, M.D., C.M., was a firm believer in the Peps breatheable treatment is proved by the following extract from his treatise on "Coughs and Colds":—

"All the while that these Peps tablets are dissolving on the tongue," he writes, "the sufferer is inhaling into the deepest recesses of the lungs rich balsamic fumes akin to the air of the famed pine forests of Norway and Switzerland. By the use of Peps the inflamed throat, chest and lungs receive a softening yet invigorating germ-killing bath. This speedily stops any cold or chill, cures the cough, clears the air-tubes, and removes the chest tightness and heavy breathing.

A True Breatheable Medicine

"When visiting theatres or other crowded places of assembly, people often catch dangerous colds and chills through stepping out of overheated rooms into the chilly night air. Safeguard against all such risks by taking these breatheable Peps, which also provide a pleasant and powerful means of protection against infection from fellow-travellers suffering from influenza, tonsilitis, etc. A Peps in your mouth keeps infection out." The diagram is to demonstrate the Peps direct method of dealing with trouble in the chest and bronchials.

ANTI-OPIUM MASS MEETING

Delegates Elected to Geneva Conference

Over 500 people gathered at the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, Honan Road, on Sunday, in a mass meeting called by the National Anti-Opium Association. This organization was initiated by six organizations: The National Christian Council. The National Committee of the Y.M.C.A., The National Medical Association, The General Chamber of Commerce, The Kiangsu Educational Association, and the Association for the Advancement of Education. Over 30 other organizations of national and local scope have joined in this new association, among them being such organizations as the World Chinese Student Federation, The Chinese Red Cross Association, and the Chinese Newspapers Union. Several meetings have been held, and a Board composed of 18 directors elected to head up this movement. Mr. George C. Hsu was elected chairman, and Dr. Huang Wen Pei, vice-chairman. The headquarters of the organization will be in the offices of the National Christian Council, 23 Yuen Ming Yuen Road.

Addresses stressing the practical measures which are to be taken in arousing public opinion and in support of the Conferences to be held in Geneva in November were given by the chairman, Dr. Hsu, and by Reverend K. T. Chung of the National Christian Council, Mr. Ling Yen-fu of the International Opium Association, and Dr. Wang Pei-yuan of the Chinese Red Cross. A manifesto was adopted which is to be sent to various organizations throughout China and to the military and civil governors of the different provinces. Among other things this manifesto calls attention to Anti-Opium Sunday, September 28, which is to be observed all over China by parades, demonstrations, and mass meetings to show a united opposition to opium traffic.

One of the most important accomplishments of the meeting Sunday was the selection of Chancellor Chen Yuan-pei, Dr. Wu Lian-te and Mr. T. Z. Koo to act as people's delegates at the coming conferences in Geneva in November.

Manifesto of the National Anti-Opium Association

To the Members of the Provincial and Local Educational Associations, Chambers of Commerce, Agricultural Associations, Labour Unions, Bankers' Associations, Lawyers' Associations, Newspapermen's Associations, Red Cross Societies, Christian Churches, Y.M. and Y.W.C.A.'s' and other institutions:

Fellow Countrymen!

The evil effect of the opium drug is almost too exasperating to mention. Ever since its introduction from India it has been a blight upon our civilization for more than a hundred years. It has consumed the wealth of the nation and sapped the vitality of the people. Toward the end of the Manchu dynasty the practice of opium smoking had been so prevalent and the result so terrible that the nation as a whole gradually awoke to the fact that it was a real menace. A 10 years' limit of total suppression was then proclaimed by an Imperial Edict and an opium treaty limiting the amount of the drug to be imported was also arranged. In all earnestness, the whole country was unanimous for abolition of the evil. In general, the officials were sincere in carrying out the mandate and the people were enthusiastic in cooperation. It looked for a time as if the evil was to be actually stamped out at the prescribed time limit.

Alas! with the outbreak of the European conflagration in 1914 externally the friendly Powers were too busy to curtail the opium output and control opium traffic, and internally the Central Government was so torn asunder by political divisions and internecine wars that the law of the land forbidding poppy planting and opium smoking actually became a farce. The revenues derived from the opium traffic were so enormous that few war lords could resist the temptation to replenish their war treasury in order to maintain a big army, and in some provinces only by the revenues of opium taxation could a big army be kept from insurrection. Consequently, poppy planting became an open secret and the traffic extended. Smuggling, too, is rampant in such large cities as Shanghai, Tientsin, Hankow, and other treaty ports where the big liners or river steamers ply under the flags of foreign nations. The seizures made by the maritime customs during recent years are simply inconceivable. There is flagrant evidence that rascals of every nation are attracted to opium dealing by the huge profits it promises. It is no wonder that there is every evidence of an opium recrudescence. What a marked retrogression in view of past achievements!

League of Nations' Opium Conference

The League of Nations is calling for an Opium Conference to be held at Geneva in November, this year, with a view to limiting narcotic and cocaine production and use to medical and scientific purposes. Our own country will undoubtedly be represented at the Conference and it is more than certain that some kind of an agreement will be reached at this Conference to which all participating nations will have to conform. Now for the purpose of rallying to the support of the League of Nations in its aim to secure restriction of the production and use of narcotics to legitimate uses in all countries and to assist our own government in enforcing the opium suppression throughout the land, we therefore have formed among ourselves a National Anti-Opium Association with a membership of more than 30 leading organizations representing national and local interests.

A mass meeting was held to-day in the hall of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce demonstrating our resolute will to eradicate opium. It is high time that each and every Chinese, at home or abroad, should voice a national sentiment against this evil. It is, therefore, our sincere hope that you, fellow countrymen of the provinces, will likewise rise to the situation and organize in your locality Anti-Opium societies in order that we may make a united front against poppy planting and the opium traffic.

Anti-Opium Day.

It was decided that all China should observe September 28 as a National Anti-Opium Day, on which day we urge that you will hold meetings or demonstrations with the sole view of awakening the public conscience to the seriousness of the situation and to show your firm attitude in some form of expression. It is hoped that you will send to us on or before the fifth of October, information regarding the observance of the day in your locality, together with resolutions which may have been adopted.

In conclusion, Fellow Countrymen, let us be united in this movement, for "Unity is Strength." Let us use every means within our control, whether in writing, speech-making, or what not, to create a strong public opinion, both foreign and Chinese, against poppy cultivation and opium smoking, for it is our conviction that unless foreign producing countries will cooperate with us in limiting the manufacture and thus curtail the output, we, the citizens of China alone cannot effectively deal with the question. But on the part of the Chinese, shall we not fight to the finish this traffic, until the law prohibiting the planting of the poppy and the smoking of opium, is actually enforced throughout the land. In God's strength, let us go forward!

THE CHINESE GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Yu Ya-ching Elected Chairman

After a protracted controversy over the eligibility or otherwise of Mr. Sung Han-chang, the retiring Chairman, for re-election to the chairmanship for yet another term of office, which was happily ended by Sung magnanimously announcing his determination to decline the honour, the new Committee of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, at a meeting held on Thursday afternoon, succeeded in electing from amongst themselves Mr. Yu Ya-ching as their Chairman and Mr. Fang Chiao-peh as their Vice-Chairman. Of the Committee of 35 members, 27 were present in person while the remainder voted by proxy. Thus, 35 votes were cast in each case; in the case of electing the Chairman, Mr. Yu Ya-ching polled 19 votes, Mr. Sung Han-chang 15 and Mr. Ku Hsin-yi one vote; and in the election of the Vice-Chairman, Mr. Fang Chiao-peh obtained 33 votes while Mr. Yuan Li-teng got two.

Mr. Yu Ya-ching, announced Mr. Shih Yun-chien, his proxy, was at present in Tientsin, but he would return to Shanghai in time to assume office on September 1, the day on which the retiring Committee would hand over their duties to their successors.

It will interest many foreigners to note that the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce at this premier port in China will once more be presided over by Ningpoese, as are both Mr. Yu and Mr. Fang.

MR. YU YA-CHING, who has returned to Shanghai, has written to the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, declining to accept the Chairmanship of its General Committee.

SUDDEN OUTBREAK OF VIOLENT CRIME

Traced to Recent Arms Smuggling Activities: The .32 Pistol

Three cases of murderous assault, two ending fatally, and two or three armed robberies engaged the attention of the police during the week end. An outstanding feature has been the prevalence of the .32 revolver of which so much has been heard lately in connexion with smuggling, and the fact that in one glaring instance the Chinese refused such information as they might have been able to give to the police.

Between 7.30 and 8 o'clock on Saturday evening, a well dressed Chinese was found lying dead in Gordon Road south of Sinza Road. He had been shot in the head, and a .32 revolver was found near the body. The deceased, who has not been identified, fied, was a man about 26 years of age, and it is now obvious the motive of the crime was not robbery, since he had in his pocket $25 in notes and a few silver coins, and wore a gold ring. The Chinese police constable who was on point duty at the corner of Gordon Road and Sinza Road reported that at about 5.25 he heard a sound which resembled the bursting of a ricsha tyre, and a few minutes later three Chinese passed him in ricshas, coming from the south. The constable called out to one of the ricsha men, asking what the noise was, receiving answer that a bicycle tyre had burst. Just at this moment someone from a distance behind the ricshas called for the police and upon answering, the officer found the dead man lying at the side of the road. Inspr. Gibson and a Chinese detective visited the scene in response to a telephone call, and after making inquiries had the body removed to the mortuary. An amah employed at 53 Gordon Road has informed the police that she was passing the spot about this time and heard a report, but seeing three men standing at the side of the road she concluded that they were firing off crackers.

Watchman Murdered.

Another case of murder occurred shortly after 8 o'clock on Saturday evening in the Dong Ching Li alleyway, off Yochow Road, the victim being a watchman named Wu Chao-shing. The crime took place outside a small cigarette and exchange shop, and when Inspr. Crookdake and another officer appeared on the scene to find the watchman lying on the footpath, conscious but unable to speak, they could not get a word from a number of Chinese standing by as to what had happened.

One woman did state that she heard a noise like a shot and, upon looking round, saw the watchman lying in the roadway. Being afraid, she ran into the shop and a man followed, jumped the counter and snatched up a box containing a small sum of money.

The injured man was taken to hospital and it was found that he had a knife wound in the throat and a bullet wound at the back of the neck, and these injuries resulted in his death a few hours later.

It is believed that the crime was the result of a quarrel between a former watchman and some Shantung men, the deceased watchman having sided with his predecessor.

A Woman Victim.

A Chinese woman lies in hospital in a critical condition as the result of a murderous attack on her in Macao Road near Gordon Road in the early hours of Monday. She was removed to Shantung Road hospital immediately after the discovery was made, and was found to be suffering from a three-cornered wound on the side of the head, a fractured skull, a severe wound over the right shoulder and another in the thigh, the latter appearing to be a bullet wound. A .32 revolver bullet was found near the place where the woman lay.

Armed Robberies.

About 2.30 a.m. on Monday three robbers, one armed with a long melon knife, raided the house of a mill worker in Ward Road, climbing a fence and using a boundary stone to break open the door. The inmates of the house were told to keep quiet, with the alternative of being shot, and the thieves gathered together money and clothing worth $80 and then made off into the country. The master of the house attempted to slip out to inform the police, but was promptly brought back with a blow from a wooden bolt drawn from the door. Another man contrived to get away, however, and he informed a Japanese policeman of what was happening, but when the two returned to the house they found the robbers had departed.

Four robbers, armed with the .32 pistol, walked into a shop in North Shanse Road on Saturday evening, went straight behind the counter collected $75, and promptly escaped by way of an adjacent alleyway. A shot was fired to frighten off possible pursuers, and although one of six assistants in the shop managed to get out and raise an alarm, the gang had a good start and got clear away.

In the case of the Chinese who on Sunday evening was found dead in Gordon Road, shot through the head, a verdict of murder by some person or persons unknown has been returned. Since the inquest on Monday, the police have, through their finger print department, discovered the deceased's identity. His name was Zung Ah-ngi, a man 26 years of age, and two months ago he was in custody on a charge of having been found in the New World loitering for an unlawful purpose.

THE NATIVE BANK SMASH

An Arrangement Arrived at, But Many Small Banks also Expected to Close

The excitement caused by the collapse of four Chinese banks has had a brief run, but unfortunately it left its mark on business throughout last week. It appears that the Chinese were well aware of what was coming several days before the banks actually closed, and, nervous as they always are where money is concerned, they soon worked up a state of panic. Money every year is very tight just before the autumn settlement, but the troubles of the four banks made credit harder to secure than usual. On top of all this came the Kiangsu-Chêkiang crisis and the result was that it was exceedingly difficult to find a Chinese who was prepared to do business, or whose credit was sufficiently substantial to permit of business being done with him. So throughout the week merchants had a gloomy time.

However, it is generally believed that the panic now has subsided, and with the guidance of a foreign liquidator the banks so arranged their affairs that it was possible to come to a settlement acceptable to the creditors. It cannot be said that the trouble is entirely ended, for it is the general opinion that within the next few days or weeks a great number of so-called "banks" quietly will close their doors and fade away. In print such a statement appears alarming, but the comment amongst business men does not vary in a single particular—it is always, "And a good job, too." There are hosts of these banks, who have scarcely anything in the way of capital, assets or reputation. They spring up in a night, gamble and change loans about amongst themselves, always in such a way that some time a reputable concern gets let in for the hard cash, and in general they play havoc with credit. Their failure will hurt few, but it will do good to many, hence if they fail by a day there will be little lamentation.

THE appointment of Mr. Elleder as Vice-Consul of the Soviet Government in Shanghai is announced in the Chinese papers, which state that M. Karakhan addressed a Note to the Waichiaopu to this effect over the week-end. Mr. Elleder will also be acting Consul-General pending the appointment of another official.

"Judging from the facial expression of those present, the prosperity of the association is assured," says a Chinese reporter in describing the inaugural meeting of the Shanghai Mutual Residents' Association, which gathering was held "at the Chinese Town Hall," North Szechuen Road, on Saturday. The Chairman informed those present that the object of the association is "to secure blessings for residents."—This being so, why not make it an international scheme?

CHAPEI LIGHT AND WATER CO.

Payment to Nanking; Counter Ordered by General Ho Owing to War Danger

The Military Commissioner of Sungkiang and Shanghai issued an order to the Board of Directors of the Chapei Electricity and Waterworks Co., Ltd., to the following effect, says the Chinese Press.

A petition has been sent me by the Association of Chapei Public Bodies, stating that the payment of the price for the property acquired by the said Company falls due just at the present time when the Kiangsu-Chêkiang question has reached an acute stage; that Nanking has sent a deputy to Shanghai to wait for and receive the payment; and that the money, if paid now, would not only adversely affect the financial market, but might also be devoted to military purposes, in which case, the whole province would suffer.

"As the public bodies earnestly desire peace," continues the petition, "they pray your Excellency to order the Directors of the said Company to postpone remitting the price to the Provincial Treasury pending the subsidence of the rumours, and also to authorize the Directors, in conjunction with representatives of the public bodies and the gentry of Chapei, to deposit the money in some solvent banks at Shanghai; not drawable by any side nor appliable in offsetting any government debt, etc."

I find that owing to the situation, financial stagnancy has set in in Shanghai, causing the collapse of several banks and undermining the stability of the market. If such a big payment is suddenly remitted elsewhere, trouble will surely arise. The views submitted by the said public bodies are approved. Let the Board of Directors of the said Company, in conjunction with representatives of the public bodies and the gentry, separately deposit the money in several safe and sound banks, which shall temporarily remain undrawable, and after having deposited the money in the banks, report what they have done to this yamên for reference.

THE YACHT SHANGHAI ON ANOTHER TRIP

To Be Sailed to America by Mr. F. de Witt Wells over the Old Viking Route

The little yacht Shanghai, which, flying the burgee of the Shanghai Yacht Club and manned by a Danish Corinthian crew, successfully negotiated the long voyage from the Huangpu to Denmark, now is to embark on another adventurous trip. The following appeared in the "Christian Science Monitor":—

"Copenhagen, July 12 (Special Correspondence)—The small yacht, the Shanghai famous through its adventurous trip from Shanghai right to Copenhagen, is again on the point of setting out on a long cruise. The boat has been purchased by a former New York judge, F. de Witt Wells, who had seen the exploits of the little craft and its gallant crew mentioned in the papers. He was so impressed that he at once set out for Denmark and purchased the Shanghai, which is now being thoroughly overhauled. When this has been completed Mr. de Witt Wells will proceed to Bergen on board his new yacht and will there be joined by his son and the painter-author, Mr. Rockwell. From Bergen the party will start on the homeward voyage by way of the Shetland Islands, the Faroe Islands, Iceland, and perhaps Greenland. This is the route chosen by the Norse Vikings in the distant past."

LITIGATION over the disposal of the Chapei Electricity and Waterworks is becoming farcical. The Chinese press now says that the Civil Governor of this province has received a telegram from the Administrative Court at Peking, informing him that the decision of that Court has been given, quashing his decision regarding the transference of the concern, but permitting him to dispose of the property by exercising his administrative powers during the recess of the Provincial Assembly.

WEDDING

Spencer-Scott Malden

The great number of his friends in Shanghai will be interested to learn of the wedding of the Rev. C. E. Spencer, the Settlement's "sporting parson," and as judged by the following account from a Brighton newspaper of July 26 he is equally as popular at Home as he was out here:—

Many picturesque happenings combined to make the marriage of Miss Marjorie Scott Malden and the Rev. Cyril Edward (Peter) Spencer a very interesting event at Portslade on Wednesday afternoon.

First there was the charm and simplicity of a country wedding celebrated in the quaint little village church of St. Nicolas, with ideas borrowed from the flowers for the bridesmaids' dresses. Then, as the bride and her mother have done so much for the Scout movement both at Brighton and Portslade, it was natural that Boy Scouts should be lined up at intervals in the middle aisle to form a guard of honour. The banner of the 1st Southern Cross Troop (Miss Marjorie Scott Malden's Own) was carried proudly by Troop Leader Barnes in the bridal procession.

At the reception held after the ceremony at Windlesham House, Southern Cross, by Mrs. Scott Malden (mother of the bride), there was an encampment of Scouts in the plantation, and each patrol had a wedding cake to themselves which the bride cut, in addition to her own wedding cake. The "Seals" displayed a voracious appetite for almond icing.

Gifts from China.

Magnificent Chinese embroideries were brought home as gifts to the bride and her attendants by the bridegroom, who has been sub-Dean of Shanghai; the principal cleric was an "old boy" of Windlesham House School, the Right Rev. Bishop MacFunes, Anglican Bishop in Jerusalem, whose black chauffeur created some surprise as he drove the clerical car.

Yet one more unusual circumstance was the fact that the bride, in receiving the congratulations of her many friends in the quadrangle, stood with the bridegroom upon a Babylonian tile bearing the seal of Nebuchadnezzar. This remarkable trophy was sent home to the bride during the war by a friend in Mesopotamia.

But after all, the most important and pleasing factor was the popularity of the bride, which found expression in so many ways that it may be long before Portslade has another wedding so memorable to chronicle. Miss Marjorie Scott Malden is one of the daughters of the late Rev. G. Scott Malden, of Windlesham House, Brighton, and Mrs. Scott Malden, of Southern Cross. The bridegroom, who has been appointed priest-in-charge of the Church of the Ascension, Portsmouth, is son of the late Rev. R. E. Spencer, of St. John's, Maidstone, and Mrs. Spencer, of St. Stephen's House, North End, Portsmouth.

Organ music and a choral service made the ceremony inspiring. While the nuptials were celebrated by the Bishop, other clergy taking part were the Rev. Eric Southam, of St. Mark's, Portsmouth (the bridegroom's Vicar), the Rev. A. J. Toyne, Vicar of St. Philip's, Aldrington (Chaplain of Windlesham House), and the Rev. D. F. Campbell, Vicar of Portslade. The Rev. A. H. Belcher, of Brighton, was in the chancel, and the Rev. J. C. Meyer supported the bridegroom as best man. The boys of Windlesham House filled one side of the church.

The Dresses.

The bride, who was given away by her brother, Mr. Gilbert Scott Malden, M.A., wore a draped dress of deep ivory crêpe Romain, hand embroidered in silver thread, the train from the shoulders being of silver filigree lace, underlined with chiffon. A wreath of orange blossoms held in place a misty veil of white tulle, and a sheaf of Madonna lilies was carried.

The bridesmaids looked like "Maids of the Mist," for all five of them wore veils of tulle to match their dresses, and the colours represented the shades of the sweet smelling stocks which formed their bouquets. Two bridesmaids were in cyclamen pink, two in plumbago, and one in mauve. The dresses were simply made in shot faile silk, with sash bows at the side.

The bridesmaids were Miss Joy Scott Malden and Miss Euphie Scott Malden (sisters of the bride), Miss Dorothy Spencer (sister of the bridegroom), Miss Betty Hunt, and Miss Kathleen Simmonds.

There were three pretty children, Miss Veronica Tandy (the bridegroom's tiny niece), in a blue silk frock and a silver cap, to carry the train, and two little boys, Master Peter and Master David Scott Malden (nephews of the bride), in blue and white blouse and knicker suits, to act as pages.

The reception at Windlesham House was largely attended, and many old boys were present.

The bride and bridegroom had a wonderful send-off when they left for their honeymoon. The first portion is being spent at Littleworth, and afterwards they will tour in North Wales.

BIG ARMS HAUL ON PAUL LECAT

Mausers and Ammunition Cleverly Concealed in Vessel: Steward Arrested

Another substantial discovery of contraband arms has been made on board a French mail steamer. When the Paul Lecat arrived on Wednesday last week the River Police went aboard and after a thorough search found 122 automatic pistols and 15,000 rounds of ammunition, most of the contraband being concealed behind the wainscoting in the second-class pantry and in the oil chamber of the engineers' room.

On the following day, two arrests were made by the police in the Yangtszepoo district. At about 9 o'clock in the morning a Chinese constable arrested a Japanese who resides in Baikal Road, and found that he was carrying four automatic pistols and 300 rounds of ammunition. The man was handed over to the Japan authorities.

The same night a man who gave the name of Georges Gaillard, and described himself as a steward on the Paul Lecat, was arrested in Yangtszepoo Road near Baikal Road, and was found to be carrying 254 rounds of .32 ammunition.

Another Affair in Sinza.

Other instances of trafficking in arms came to the notice of the Police on Thursday last week. A successful raid on a house in Sinza Road was conducted by Assistant Commissioner Springfield, assisted by Inspr. Hermitage and other officers, 19 Mauser pistols and 30,000 rounds of ammunition beging seized. The only occupants of the house at the time of the raid were a woman and a young girl. The two appeared at the Mixed Court yesterday and were remanded for further inquiries to be made.

A Chinese loitering in the neighbourhood of the Shanghai North station on Thursday night was placed under arrest when, upon being searched, it was found that he carried 300 rounds of pistol ammunition.

A revival of the Chinese K. K. K. was reported in the Chinese press on Monday. It is said that the Klansmen now gather over the premises of a mechanic in Haining Road, and that a false sign had been hung out to deceive detectives and inquisitive reporters.

THE Shanghai American School has won further recognition in the scholastic world. Last Friday a telegram was received from Boston University announcing the acceptance of Miss Ruth Estes, of the latest graduating class at the school, as a college student. She has been admitted upon the school's certificate, without examination, thus adding another to the list of notable institutions granting this privilege to scholars recommended by the Shanghai American School. Pomona College, California, of which Mr. C. L. Boynton, Mr. Harry Kingman, "Hudford" Taylor, and Dr. Fong F. Sec are alumni, has placed the Shanghai American School on its standard list, thus giving its students the same opportunity as the best schools in the United States. Application is being made to 65 colleges and universities in America to which the Shanghai scholars seek to be admitted, for similar privileges.

INFRINGEMENT OF TRADEMARKS

Law in Mixed Court: Urgent Need of More Severe Penalties

There must be something very seriously wrong and unjust with the law in Shanghai, which allows for a poor ignorant Chinese coolie who commits a petty theft on the spur of the moment to get a sentence of imprisonment, while educated Chinese who plot and scheme for months and months on a more daring and deliberate robbery are let off with small fines in Mexican dollars.

In the Mixed Court recently a coolie was sentenced to four months' imprisonment for stealing a $5 note from a street cobbler.

It is quite likely that the coolie had a sudden impulse to steal, simply because he saw the $5 note in the cobbler's hands.

On the same day and in the same court an educated Chinese with a perfect knowledge of the English language was tried for the infringement of a well-known English trademark.

He had been working on his scheme of infringement for months on purpose to get it to work with machine-like perfection.

He was found guilty without doubt, and his fine was $100 mex.

Trademark infringers are criminals to the same extent as coiners who make and issue counterfeit coins, and burglars known as cracksmen who watch and wait weeks before operating on banks and jewellery shops.

In fact one can put them down as members of the same fraternity, but more degenerate, because they are not only robbing the owners of the trademarks who as a rule are manufacturers who have spent years in perfecting their goods, and thousands of pounds sterling in advertising, but they also cunningly rob the public by selling inferior goods under the trademarks, and obtain more money for their articles than they are worth.

Small fines such as $100 will never stop this vile business.

So far back as the year 1544 Charles V. of Flanders issued an edict concerning trade and the textile trade, which provided that:—

> "Any master workman who makes or causes to be made any such tapestry, shall work upon one end and upon the bottom of the said tapestry a mark or symbol, and such signs as the city may require: that it may be known by the said marks of what city and of what master the said tapestry is a product."

During that period infringers were punished by cutting off the right hand.

In France in 1564 a royal edict of Charles IX placed imitators of marks in the same category as counterfeiters who were punished capitally.

This was subsequently modified later by reducing the punishment to the galleys.

In the year 1666 the drapers of Carcassonne were protected by imposing a penalty of the pillory on infringers of trademarks.

While in the Middle Ages infringers of trademarks and counterfeiters were, upon being found guilty, executed, and in other cases given the pillory and penal servitude, it is not to be expected that this same punishment could be tolerated at the present time, but it is not unreasonable to expect the courts in China to deal severely with infringers by committing them to prison, instead of letting them off lightly with small fines.

The punishment must certainly be made to fit the crime, because infringers at all times hope to escape the penalty of their wrongdoing by deliberate, cunning craft to rob and deceive the public.

In many cases the amount of the fine is less than their earnings for one day's work on the infringement of goods.

These impostors do not mind taking the risk, knowing that the penalty of a fine is so slight.

As stated above, imprisonment is the only cure for these pirates, and it is to be hoped that owners of trademarks will insist upon their property being safely guarded.

OBITUARY

Mr. Cecil Frank Harris

Very sincere regret was occasioned when it became known on Saturday that Mr. Cecil Frank Harris, a member of a well known Shanghai family, had met his death suddenly in tragic circumstances. Shortly after 6 a.m. his brother, Mr. J. E. R. Harris, with whom he resided at 64 Route des Sœurs, found him lying dead at the foot of the stairs, and from subsequent inquiries it seems that the deceased, having occasion to go downstairs during the night, slipped and fell to the bottom, breaking a wrist and becoming unconscious, the position in which he fell, with one arm covering his mouth, apparently causing death by suffocation. Dr. Bryson and Mr. G. W. King attended at the residence and, after the inquest had been opened, and adjourned until Wednesday, the body was removed to the mortuary.

The deceased, who was only 33 years of age, was a member of the staff of the Union Insurance Society of Canton and was very popular among a wide circle of friends. At one time he was a prominent member of the Shanghai Football Club. He leaves a widow and one child and for them, as well as for other members of the family, the deepest sympathy will be felt.

The Funeral.

Many friends of the deceased attended the funeral at Bubbling Well cemetery on Sunday afternoon. The Very Rev. Dean Symons conducted the service in the chapel and at the graveside, and Messrs. W. E. Smith, J. Bourke, H. P. Bourke, C. Strachan, J. Huxley, H. G. Mancell, H. Mousley and H. P. Bentley were the pall bearers. The deceased's father and mother and brother were the chief mourners, and among the many who attended to express their sympathy were Mr. C. M. Bain, Mr. C. W. Porter, Mr. R. A. E. Patterson, Mrs. How, Mrs. Widler, Mr. L. Whittaker, Mr. W. R. Parkin, Mr. R. D. Parkin, Mr. W. O. Lancaster, Mr. E. S. Pickering, Mr. M. W. Pett (representing the Shanghai Fire Brigade, of which the deceased was at one time a member), Mr. C. Reeves, Mr. and Mrs. J. Bauld, Mr. C. E. Shepherd, Inspector Johnson, Sub-Inspector McGuire.

There were many very beautiful wreaths.

COTTON GODOWN IN FLAMES

Serious Outbreak Quelled in Western District: Much Cargo Saved

Fire broke out shortly after 9.30 on Wednesday evening at the Ming Sung Cotton Weaving Mill, situated at some distance along Warren Road. On the arrival of the Brigade the upper portion of a two-storeyed godown, a building with wooden floors, in close proximity to a similar structure, was found to be in flames, the fire having already reached some parts of the godown floor.

There being no hydrants so far outside the Settlement boundary, water had to be pumped from a large water tank in the centre of the compound. Three pumps connected to a number of jets were set to work on the threatened building. One of the first jets was placed on the roof of the godown which was in immediate danger on the west and two on the mill chemical store on the east.

It was soon realized that the Brigade had only just arrived in time to save the property. As is usually the case with a cotton godown the fire took some time to deal with, although all danger of its spreading was over by midnight. Every possible precaution had to be taken, an additional safeguard being to send a monitor and an escape to the southeast corner to be used as a monitor and water tower respectively. In spite of the fact that the mill pump was kept at work supplying the tank in three hours the water dropped so low that the pump had to be shifted to a near by creek. Had the mill pump kept the hydrants properly supplied—as it was they were useless—the work of the firemen would have been much simplified.

The godown involved contained 3,000 piculs of cotton, 14,000 lb. of wool yarn, a small quantity of cotton yarn and 40 piculs of rice, the contents being insured for Tls. 50,000 and the building for Tls. 15,000. There should be considerable salvage as jets were worked well into the building as soon as the Division arrived.

The Division is still engaged in salvage operations.

VERY HARD LIFE OF A NOVELIST

Mr. P. B. Kyne Tells How he Works on Holidays Without Excuse to Leave off

A tireless human dynamo running at full speed was the impression made by Mr. Peter B. Kyne upon a representative of the "North-China Daily News" who saw him on Wednesday at the Astor House, where he is stopping while the str. Presidents Monroe was in port.

"Don't call it a holiday," he said. "My holiday hasn't begun yet. Since I left San Francisco I've written 10 syndicate articles running to about 18,000 words, done a lot of work on my new novel, written two short stories, played mahjongg and walked the deck about seven hours a day. I wrote a short story yesterday. Probably I'll get up at six to-morrow morning and write an article before breakfast. I've got to do it. Everything contracted for long ahead. I managed to get three months ahead on my syndicate stuff and now I've got to stay that far in the lead. Got to. It's a horrible sensation to have the publisher begin to bring out a novel serially when you've only completed three-quarters of it. I used to be afraid to cross the street lest a taxi would get me before I'd finished that story that was running along. I won't let them do it now.

"But one can't get out of one's obligations. I can't let my publishers down any more than I can give up my stock ranch in California that's costing me a pretty penny to maintain. I began to count up the number of people it employed when I was thinking of selling it at one time, and I realized I could never turn them all out of work. Responsibility? Yes, I had a father and mother who were fiercely independent and ever since I was six years old I have felt responsibilities, burdens that almost swamped me at times.

"I don't flatter myself that because the public will read my stuff that I'm remarkable. The public won't let any man alone who can create what they want. And writing is not the only creative art. The man who can create a well-organized hotel is an artist. But one creates something only to become a slave to it at times. Take Captain Dollar. He began with one steam schooner, and now he has a system of steamers that circle the world with their octopus tentacles. He must find food for this monster which he has created. So we bind ourselves upon the wheel and can never get off."

"I supposse I shouldn't want to drop out of writing for a year, either," admitted Mr. Kyne. "I should hate to take the chance of my public's forgetting me. Oh, yes, it would. And if I ever write one bood bad enough to lose me the respect of the book retailers—and those are the men who by skilful advertising merchandise a book and foist me upon the public, as it were—then I am done for. One has to keep on.

"Yes, it's my job and I love it. I conceive literature to be the telling of a worth-while story in the simplest possible way. I don't worry about filling it with six-cylinder words to show off an education. I haven't one to show off. I left a country school when I was 14 and have been out among men ever since. Your can't learn life in colleges and I certainly have seen life. Now, I think I know as many horse thieves as I do bank presidents."

SIR Skinner and Lady Turner with Miss Turner left on Saturday by the C.N.S. Tungchow for Weihaiwei. As already announced Miss Turner's wedding will take place there on Wednesday, September 24, at St. John the Baptist's Church, at 3.30 p.m. We are asked to state that Sir Skinner and Lady Turner will be very glad to welcome all friends who can be present both at the Church and afterwards (by the courtesy of the Officer Administering the Government and Mrs. Russell Brown) at Government House.

Silver.

The price comes yesterday at 34⅜d. ready and forward, against 34½d. ready and forward a week ago, showing a rise of ⅛d. on each delivery. In the end of last week China was reported as a seller and this week both India and the Continent have been buyers. Reuter reports the market yesterday as steady.

Bars in stock 2,622, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of Sycee and Dollars amount to Tls. 402 lakhs and $437½ lakhs, against Tls. 400½ lakhs and $434½ lakhs last week and Tls. 228 lakhs and $323½ lakhs on August 28, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation T.T. 3/2⅜d., where it remained until Tuesday morning, when it was raised to T.T. 3/3d. It was raised another ⅛d. to T.T. 3/3⅛d. on Thursday morning, at which level it still remains.

Our market was firm all yesterday, opening with sellers T.T. 3/3 13/16d. Aug., 3/3⅞d. Oct., 3/3 15/16d. November. Gold $ T.T. 74⅝ Aug./Sept., 74¾ Oct./November. We closed for the tiffin interval with the market still firm, sellers T.T. 3/3⅞d. Aug./Sept., 3/3 15/16d. Oct., 3/4d. November—Gold $ 74⅝ ready and forward.

The position of the speculators is estimated to be approximately oversold Yen 12 million and £500,000 including Gold Dollars.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on July 23, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The silver market has been fairly well sustained by bear covering and Continental orders. Fresh purchases for the Far East have not been in evidence. An improved tone seems to be apparent in the Indian bazaars, and China, notwithstanding increasing stocks, has only sold intermittently and on a small scale. A reduction in the sterling value of the U. S. dollar has conduced to a slight easement in the price of silver.

The Bengal Chamber of Commerce, so it is reported, has represented to the Government of India the advisability of dealing immediately with the currency situation, with which there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction in that country. Although in recent years steps have been taken to facilitate seasonable demands by placing a certain quantity of bills of exchange amongst the reserves of the note issue, this has not been felt to be a satisfactory way of dealing with the situation that arises when crops have to be financed, and there is a feeling that some automatic method should be brought into being by which the requirements of currency could be satisfied. Suggestions comprise an issue of Treasury Bills for the purpose, gold or sterling deposits in London against the issue of notes in India, or the acquisition of silver for mintage into rupees.

The first suggestion would appear to partake of the nature of inflation, pure and simple, the second has the advantage, possibly, however, at some loss, of being easily reversed when the stress is over, whilst the latter would mean a permanent reinforcement of the currency, though probably with a handsome profit to the State.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months delivery are respectively ⅛d. and ¼d. below those fixed a week ago.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on July 23, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 16th instant amounted to £126,448,150, as compared with £126,443,805 on the previous Wednesday. Of the moderate supplies this week, about a quarter has been taken for India; the remainder will go to the United States of America.

The Indian Commercial Intelligence Department, Calcutta, announces that India's foreign trade during June last was as follows:—

	Lakhs of rupees.
Imports, private merchandise	18,82
Exports, private merchandise including re-exports	29,61
Net imports of private treasure	4,31

The balance of trade in favour of India, including enfaced rupee paper, etc., is Rs. 3,67 lakhs, as compared with Rs. 2,50 lakhs, in May last.

The High Commissioner for Canada has received from the Dominion Department of Mines at Ottawa the following report in regard to the Quebec gold field by Dr. G. A. Young, of the Geological Survey:—

"Much interest is still being displayed in Canada, in what has come to be known as the Quebec gold field, a district situated in the Western part of the province of Quebec. In this territory, more particularly in the western part, near the Ontario boundary, a number of deposits have been proved to carry promising gold values. Development work is being pushed on various properties, and new discoveries are reported from time to time. The gold-bearing deposits, though of various types, are all, so far as known, definitely related in origin to bodies of intrusive rocks and the study and delimiting of the areas occupied by such rocks is engaging this summer the attention of four field parties of the Geological Survey of Canada. The region, though comparatively easy of access, is in general a somewhat difficult area to prospect properly, but considering that geological conditions appear to be everywhere similar and that gold-bearing deposits have been discovered here and there over an area more than 100 miles long and 20 or more miles wide, it seems not unlikely that deposits of sufficient size and of high enough gold tenor as to constitute mines will yet be found."

U.S. CHINA TRADE ACT

Notification has been received from the office of the Registrar of the American China Trade Act that, under date of July 11, the U. S. acting Secretary of Commerce, Mr. S. B. Davis, promulgated an amendment to Section 5 of the Regulations of the China Trade Act, 1922, which appear on page 12 of Trade Information Bulletin No. 74 issued by the United States Department of Commerce, October 30, 1922. Section 5 of the above referred to Regulations is amended to read in full as follows (the part in italics being the new amendment):—

Section 4 (b)—Application for certificate of incorporation of a China trade company shall contain the following information and be signed and sworn to before a notarial officer of the United States or any State, by a majority of the incorporators. All such applications originating in China shall first be submitted to the Registrar, who shall forward the same, together with his recommendation thereon, to the Secretary; upon presentation to the Secretary of an application originating in the United States, the Registrar will be advised and his recommendation obtained before action is taken. Copies of the certificate when issued are to be filed with the American Legation, Peking, and with the consular officers for the districts in which its main and branch offices or agencies in China are situated.

(1) Date of application
(2) Place of application
(3) Name and address of resident incorporator
(4) Whether application for original or extended certificate
(5) Names and addresses of incorporators
(6) Reason, if any, for failure of any incorporators to sign
(7) Nationality of each incorporator
(8) by name. In case of naturalized citizens a certificate of naturalization must accompany the application for each incorporator so naturalized.
(9) Statement as to manner and extent proposed corporation will aid in the development of markets in China for goods produced in the United States.
(10) Names and nationalities of stockholders with number of shares subscribed by each
(11) Minutes of meeting adopting article of incorporation
(12) Certificate by secretary of meeting regarding adoption of articles of incorporation signed and acknowledged by incorporators
(13) Signatures of incorporators.

The offices of the Registrar are Rooms 507 and 508 Robert Dollar Building, 3 Canton Road, Shanghai. Letters should be addressed:—Mr. Frank Rhea, Registrar, China Trade Act, P. O. Box 605, Shanghai, China.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Business Practically at a Standstill as a Consequence of the Menace of War

Aug. 30.

Business has been almost non-existent throughout the week as a direct result of the differences between the war-lords of Kiangsu and Chêkiang, experiences of the past making merchants reluctant to have stocks in their possession in any district likely to be overrun by troops. The piece goods trade has been absolutely at a standstill and, as there was no possibility of selling anything, the auction firms all cancelled their weekly sales. Very little more has been done in cotton and yarn, though the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange has remained open as a convenient place for the discussion of war possibilities. There has been no business in spot cotton. The exchange was closed yesterday, which was delivery day. The closing quotations of Thursday were:—

Yarn.—September, 164.80; October, 161.50; November, 159.40; December, 158.10; January, 157.90.

Cotton.—September, 41.70; October, 39.60; November, 38.80; December, 38.05; January, 37.70.

American Cotton.—Prices again advanced on favourable Liverpool advices, then declined when spot houses began selling, but again advanced slightly as a consequence of foreign buying. The closing quotations on Thursday were:—October, 24.81; December, 24.43; January, 24.45; March, 24.75; May, 24.90; middling spot, 26.85. On the same day the Liverpool quotations were:—Middling, October, 14.11; January, 13.89; spot, 15.40.

Sampin.—The latest Osaka quotations follow:—

	Thursday Afternoon	Yesterday Morning
September	Y.319.00	Y.323.70
October	307.10	311.80
November	297.40	300.90
December	294.30	297.40
January	293.30	295.40
February	292.20	294.50

Produce.

The only market in which there has been a spark of life is that for general export produce. Rumours of war do not appear to affect to any appreciable extent the point of view of sellers. Indeed, the probability is that they would prefer to get rid of their holdings if they could secure their own prices, rather than face the possibility of having their stocks seized or damaged by the contending armies. During the week there has been slightly more inquiry for groundnuts and sesamum seed and to a lesser extent sundry other commodities. However, very little actual business has been reported.

IMPROVED OUTLOOK IN COTTON INDUSTRY

London, Aug. 26.

The Manchester correspondent of the "Westminster Gazette" expresses the opinion that the cotton industry will probably witness a period of increased trade in the near future, owing to the promise of larger supplies from the United States. Raw cotton is now at a very attractive level from the buyers' point of view, while customers abroad are only waiting stable prices. The outlook is therefore brighter than in the past four years, and the corner has apparently been turned.—Reuter.

URGENT EXPORTS

It is notified in the Hongkong Government Gazette that, in order to facilitate the shipment of urgent orders for export, the following arrangements will come into force from September 1:—

"In cases where time does not permit of application at the Imports and Exports Office shipping companies will be allowed to accept goods for shipment if the usual export declarations marked "Urgent" are handed to them in duplicate at the time of application for the shipping order. The shipping company will retain one copy and forward the other copy to the Imports and Exports Office attached to the export manifest. This concession does not apply to dutiable cargo, or to any cargo for which any special permit to export is necessary."

THE NANYANG BROS. TOBACCO CO.

The Nanyang Bros. Tobacco Co. made a net profit of over $3,000,000 in 1923, and has distributed a dividend of 12 per cent. a reduction of 4 per cent. compared with the dividend of the previous year. The main causes for the decrease in profits were the rise in the price of tobacco leaf, depreciation of copper coins, drop in the price of cigarettes owing to keen competition, and the special cigarette tax of 20 per cent. ad valorem in some provinces, as well as the 2½ per cent. factory tax. The company has opened new offices for the purchase of tobacco leaf at Changte, Honan province, and Tsingchow, Shantung province, and has set up improved machines for tobacco-drying in its purchasing stations at Hsuchow, Honan province, Fangtze, Shantung, and Liufu, Anhui province. It is also building another factory in Hankow in addition to the five factories now under operation in Hongkong and Shanghai.

THE COMPANIES ORDINANCE

A Bill entitled an Ordinance to amend the Companies Ordinance, 1911, which it is proposed to introduce into the Hongkong Legislative Council is gazetted. The object of this Bill is to give the Registrar power to include the names of firms in the list of approved auditors and so to give legislative recognition to the common practice, which exists both in China and in England, of appointing firms as auditors.

The Registrar's discretion over the list is not affected, and in general it is not intended that he shall add any firm to the list unless all the partners in the firm are, in his opinion, themselves qualified for inclusion in the list Further, it is also intended in general that a firm shall be removed from the list if at any time it contains a partner who would not be qualified for inclusion in the list or who ought to be removed from the list.

COAL OUTPUT

The total output of the Kailan Mining Administration's mines for the week ending August 16 amounted to 82,400 tons and the sales during the same period to 74,477 tons.

The local share market has been very inactive during the past week and except for a smal turnover in sound investment stocks and shares business is at a standstill. The grave reports of serious hostilities starting any day between the Chekiang and Kiangsu Military Governors has created almost a panic in the local money market which in addition to the collapse in the market for Chinese Government Internal Loans has resulted in several of the secondary local Chinese Banks closing down and a general curtailing of credits by all the local Banks.

CORRESPONDENCE

A KENNEL CLUB FOR SHANGHAI.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It has been often proposed to start a Kennel Club at Shanghai. I believe that efforts made in this direction never proved successful as a Kennel Club on the lines proposed up to now did not offer members sufficient advantages to make them take up the project with sufficient energy. However, if a Kennel Club could be organized in conjunction with a veterinary establishment, somewhat on the lines as laid down below, I think it would offer sufficiently large advantages to members to make them join such a club; also the club would fill a long felt want. I would suggest the club be organized somewhat on the following lines:—

(1) Start a kennel club at Shanghai, members paying an annual fee of, say Tls. 10 per annum.
(2) Engage from home a qualified, young and energetic veterinary surgeon to act for the club as secretary and vet.
(3) Obtain at the outskirts of the Settlement grounds for the club, with kennels attached and where the vet could reside.
(4) The initial expenses for obtaining grounds for the club, erecting kennels, etc., could be raised by interest-bearing debentures.
(5) Charge members half the customary Shanghai fees, these fees to go to the vet; non-members to be charged full fees, half to go to the club, half to the vet.
(6) The club to issue certificates to rank the same as pedigree certificates as issued at home.
(7) The club to arrange annual dog shows.
(8) Besides attending to the clerical duties as secretary of the club, which would not be very onerous, the vet's chief attention should be directed towards studying the diseases peculiar to dogs in China, and especially at Shanghai, and to give members advice by means of lectures or otherwise as how best to prevent sickness in dogs.

These are in a general way the broad outlines on which I think a Kennel Club at Shanghai would succeed. The advantages to every one who keeps dogs at Shanghai and/or takes an interest in them are apparent. In Europe the dread disease for dogs is "distemper," and no efforts are spared to combat this disease. Although distemper also takes heavy toll in China, this disease is not nearly so fatal to our canine friends as other diseases, like worms in the heart, dysentery and malaria. I do not think a single dog in Shanghai is quite free of one or the other of these diseases; that is to say, if the dog has stayed more than a year in Shanghai. Furthermore, I hardly think I shall be contradicted in asserting that scarcely one dog out of a thousand dies in Shanghai from old age, but every dog bred and reared in Shanghai dies before it is five years old—in the majority of cases much before this age — from one of the three diseases mentioned above, leaving distemper quite out of the question. The study of these diseases, viz., worms in the heart, dysentery and malaria has only begun and hardly the fringe of this vast subject has been touched. The study of these diseases offers greater scope for scientific research than any one man can hope to exhaust in a life time. We have got an excellent foreign veterinary establishment at Shanghai and far be it from me to say anything against the same, but first of all these people are not specialists for dogs alone, they are here to fight disease in all animals; secondly, the field is so vast, as already said above, that not one man and not half-a-dozen men can hope to cope with the same. There can, therefore, be no doubt whatsoever that there is room for another vet to specialize in the diseases to which our canine friends are subject in China.

Now, as regards the financial side of the project. We may roughly divide our expenses into running expenses and the expenses incurred through the engagement of the vet. Taking the latter point first, I would say that the club guarantee the vet a certain minimum income which, coupled with free quarters at the club's premises, would not be excessive. As the vet would receive the fees as enumerated under paragraph 5 as above, if a competent person should be engaged, I am sure that this guarantee would never come into play. I consider it beyond question that the vet would make a very good living out of his job and his income would far exceed the guarantee. As regards the running expenses, I consider, speaking off-hand, a sum of, say, Tls. 10,000 would more than suffice in renting suitable quarters on a long lease, establishing kennels, etc. These initial expenses would be covered by debentures, say at 8 per cent. costing the club, say, Tls. 1,000 per year. The running expenses I estimate at Tls. 250 per month, or Tls. 3,000 per year, making a grand total of about Tls. 4,000 per year. This sum would have to be raised by yearly subscriptions. Personally I am sure it would be easy to obtain in Shanghai at least 500 members which would mean an income of Tls. 5,000 per year and unless this number of members is approximately assured I do not think it would be wise to start the club. But the advantages such a club would offer its members are so manifold that it can hardly be doubted that sufficient subscriptions could be secured. Some of the advantages would be as follows:—

(1) For the general good, as the club's secretary and vet would have the sole duty of studying the diseases to which our dogs are subject, thus rendering a real service to all dog-lovers.
(2) The members would reap the following benefits:—
  (a) Have their dogs attended to by a specialist, thus securing the best possible treatment.
  (b) Obtain this treatment at half the customary charges.
  (c) Obtain reliable information how best to prevent sickness in dogs.
  (d) Obtain pedigree certificates for the dogs bred by them, thus enhancing considerably the value of their dogs.
  (e) Be able to exhibit their dogs.

As regards (d) I wish to say how difficult it is at present to mate dogs. In the second generation it is generally impossible to say whether the mate for your dog is a thoroughbred, just because there is no pedigree. The value of young dogs is materially increased by being able to produce a pedigree. Also, by the annual exhibitions those dogs who obtain prizes are raised in value considerably on account of their off-spring which can be sold at considerably higher prices than without dog-shows and without pedigree certificates. Also, through the secretary of the club, with whom all thoroughbred dogs would be registered, it would be easy to ascertain suitable mates for the dogs of members of the club. Everybody who has tried it knows how difficult it is in vast Shanghai to find suitable mates. There are lots of dogs of almost all known breeds in Shanghai, but the difficulty is to get to know of them, to get hold of the owners and arrange the mating. It is no doubt that also in this respect the club would supply a long felt want.

These are in outline the conditions under which I think a Kennel Club at Shanghai would prove a huge success. If you, Mr. Editor, should think likewise and take up the matter in your usual energetic way, and if with the help of the necessary publicity through the medium of your valuable paper, a sufficient number of dog fanciers could be interested, all future details could be left to a committe appointed at a general meeting of all interested, to be called at some future date. Thanking you in anticipation for the space afforded and for anything you may be able to do to further the formation of a kennel club,

I am, etc.,
H. T.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—As a friend of mine said:—"there is no head or tail in either of the two letters of Mr. A. L. Hall." In fact in my letter of August 14, I should not have referred to Mr. Hall's letter at all. Says Mr. Hall:—"I have no interest whatsoever in Russia and I do not care what happens to that country or any of its inhabitants." It is apparently not worth anybody's time to discuss with Mr. Hall the questions raised by him, as he himself is not interested in them.

Then, why does he write about a subject of utmost importance to the whole world? But at this time, let us forget it and take into consideration that Mr. Hall, contradicting himself, states that he is a friend of Russia (vide the last sentence of his letter of August 18).

I will also leave apart the personal remarks about myself—about the stupidity and puerility and so on, things that are said in bad temper by a man trying to avoid plain answers. Let us discuss some of the points.

Mr. Hall's letter of August 13 would make any sensible Russian think that he has never been to Russia. Well, he has been—once in 1885 in St. Petersburg (which they have the nerve to call Leningrad, Mr. Hall, not we), and for about a year in Siberia, in 1904, with the troops during the Japanese war. We are to believe that he obtained a good knowledge of Russia out of these two visits.

Probably as much as I obtained knowledge about the Persian life, government, customs, etc., during my year's stay in Persia, to discuss with authority questions of vital importance to Persians.

As to the statements of Mr. Hall:—

1. "The evils which flourished under the Tsarist régime are notorious"—says Mr. Hall. Sounds like a pathetic outcry of an agitator from the top of a barricade.

The value of it is nil.

Read the Russian History first, Mr. Hall, and then we might be interested to talk with you about it again. The country was happier under that notorious régime, anyway.

2. Those " . . . vivid pictures of political prisoners and their journeyings and exile in Siberia somewhat about 1890." If the Government of the late Russian Emperor had been less liberal, the "Mad Dogs of the world" would be still in exile, experimenting their satanic ideals on themselves. Now they are let loose, and Mr. Hall has to trouble himself in asking:—"But who and what is going to put a huge country like Russia on her feet again, and How?"

Not only Russia, but the whole world, Mr. Hall.

This letter is already long enough and it does not seem to be of any interest to discuss the points of Mr. Hall's letter any further.

I presume that he, abstracting himself from any political argumentation, will again answer in a personal manner, using offensive language.

But before he does it, let him honestly state—is he for or against communism and the so-called dictatorship of the proletariat?

The questions embodied under the heading "New views for old" are too serious, too vital and important, to allow any amateures to exercise their eloquence.

I am, etc.,
N. Leashin.

Shanghai, Aug. 22, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Since Mr. Leashin has seen fit to attack me concerning my two letters on the above subject I make this final reply.

I notice that "a friend" of his fails to find "head or tail" in either of my two letters, which I regret, but several friends of mine have found head, tail and body in both of them so presumably they are gifted with more perspicacity than Mr. Leashin's solitary "amicus."

I absolutely deny that the question of Russia is of "the utmost importance to the whole world."

"Leave them alone and let them settle their own affairs" is what I should advocate; but, as a Britisher, when I see our own coolie Government financing a concern which frankly declares that it does not intend to pay any debts, I have a right, seeing that I shall have to pay some of this money in the form of taxes, etc., on home properties, investments, etc., to protest and to criticize the people to whom my money is to be lent on ridiculous terms. Some people will doubtless make profit out of it, but it will be dead loss to me and thousands of other Britishers in like case.

The foregoing will show Mr. Leashin, I trust, that in no way have I written in favour of the present régime in Russia. To my way of thinking it is infinitely worse than the worst days of Tsardom (say possibly in the days of Catherine).

It is possibly true that, had the late Emperor of All the Russians been as severe as his forebears, Lenin, Trotsky, etc., could never have existed and the filthy Rasputin would have rotted in merited obscurity. Mr. Leashin writes as though I were in some way responsible for letting loose these types on the Russian people, whereas my sole argument was that Tsarism was admittedly (i.e. admitted by many Russians, or else it could not have been overthrown) unsatisfactory to the populace of Russia, but that to outside observers Communism as at present practised by the Lenin, Trotsky Brigade is infinitely worse.

France went through a similar "Reign of Terror" but strong men were found and she came through the dark days.

I merely asked to put it more plainly, "Who are likely strong men and what means will they have". . . "to put a huge country like Russia on her feet again?"

This question, Mr. Leashin, is one of interest to the whole world.

If one half of the Russian people massacre the other half it is material only to themselves, but when they have finished with this gruesome diversion it is of great importance to the rest of mankind to know whether that great country is going to become a factor in world development or a sort of highway robber among the nations. That is to say "Who and what is going to put a huge country like Russia on her feet again, and how?"

It is almost dead certain that outside help will be necessary, so the question is one which affects others besides Russians—but Russians first.

"The whole world" does not come into the argument and certainly the whole world will not take part in Russian reorganization as many countries have already more than they can manage in looking after their own affairs.

For the final statement demanded of me, ignoring the previous paragraph as being a misunderstanding, I frankly am not for communism or dictatorship of the proletariat. I am frankly and uncompromisingly conservative and am utterly disgusted with the present political "bosses" of Great Britain.

I am for "King and Constitution" and to hell with the Demagogues.

I am, etc.,
A. L. Hall.

THE PRIMACY OF PETER

To The Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—"M. N." points out that the English translation does not do justice to the text "Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my church," and that the revised version has foot notes showing that "Peter and Rock have different endings, the former being Petros and the latter Petra—".

Petros is the transformation of the feminine word Petra into the masculine name Petros in order to make it applicable to Simon Bar Jonah.

It must be remembered that Christ did not speak Latin or Greek but Aramaic, a dialect of the Hebrew language, and that St. Matthew's Gospel was originally written in Hebrew (or Aramaic) and first translated into Greek and subsequently into Latin.

The Aramaic (=Hebrew) name for "Peter" "Cepha" means "Rock," and even if Christ's play upon this word is not obvious in the English translation it is fairly obvious in the Latin and Greek ones and perfectly clear in the French: "Tu es Pierre, et sur cette pierre je bâtirai mon église." The argument, which "M. N." makes so much of, thus falls to the ground.

"M. N." also states that "Protestants hold that Petra refers to Peter's confession—the revelation made to him by the Father, that Jesus is the Messiah."

All Protestant attempts to discredit this text by declaring it spurious or an interpolation have failed; no serious argument has ever been brought forward against the genuineness of it. It is a notable fact that the Protestants do not eliminate this, supposedly spurious, text from their Bibles and that they take it literally from the Catholic's.

Old Gamaliel said: "——if this council or this work be of men it will come to naught; but if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it, lest perhaps you be found even to fight against God." Acts V. 38/39.

Paul.

Shanghai, Aug. 24, 1924.

Post Scriptum: In addition to the four instances previously given in which Peter received powers, not conferred upon the other apostles, (the Rock, the keys, the universal Pastorate and the order to confirm his brethern) it may be noted that (as pointed out by Rev. C. M. Drury in his sermon which you published 18/8) Peter was the only individual whom (according to scriptures) Christ called Blessed.

This correspondence has gone far enough. It will convince neither side and may accordingly be closed.

WHY I WRITE LETTERS TO YOU

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In yesterday's interesting leader you try to analyse the motives your various correspondents may have in writing letters to you about religion.

I can only speak for myself, and will therefore try to analyse my own motives. Perhaps your article may induce others to do likewise.

I find, as you rightly suppose, that I have a fancy towards argumentation, which shows itself in a desire "to combat opinions which are disliked," but I have no "lurking subconscious fear that possibly such opinions are true."

But there are many other impulses which urge me on to write.

There is a feeling of responsibility towards my fellow men; the same kind of feeling which prompts people to warn the public against frauds or which leads them to take up cases of injustice and oppression on behalf of others. There is too an intense dislike of verbosity, insincerity and maudlin sentimentality, and especially of people who rush into print with borrowed arguments, the scope of the meaning of which they are either unable or unwilling to fathom. There is also a love of and pride in my Church, somewhat akin to a man's feelings towards his country; but whereas a man's patriotism need not lose its value through being merely sentimental, a man's religion loses much if it is not reasonable and logical. Then there is the popular belief that Catholics are forbidden to think for themselves about religious matters—that a Catholic layman is more or less of an idiot and a Catholic Priest necessarily a double-dyed rascal.

It would be unreasonable to expect a Protestant paper to bring much news and information about the Catholic Church, and its works and missionaries, here in China and elsewhere, but people who read your paper only must inevitably receive the wrong impression that the Catholic Church is a moribund institution, hardly more than a curiosity in which cranks may take an interest, but quite uninteresting to normal mortals. I blame my fellow Catholics, here, for permitting such ideas to take root amongst non-Catholics, for it seems that formerly, nobody cared about the mistakes or misstatements, often contained in occasional remarks about the Catholic Church, within your columns.

I think these remarks cover fairly well my motives for writing, and it only remains for me to thank you heartily for the very great fairness you have shown in accepting my letters.

I am, etc., Paul.

Shanghai, Aug. 25, 1924.

P. S. I am afraid that an unholy pleasure in the discomfiture of my opponents is not entirely absent.

TOO RAPID A PACE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Since my arrival in Shanghai I have noticed to my regret the pallid faces and poor physique of many of my fellow-countrywomen who have resided here several years or so.

Pondering over the causes I surmise the climate alone is not to blame. Is it then the unnatural life many of them lead! Some of my girl friends will have a cocktail or a W. and S., or several, with the next, their fingers are stained with nicotine, it matters not to them whether they get home at 9 p.m. or 6 a.m. and given sufficient encouragement they'll play bridge or jazz all night. Never for a moment does it occur to them that sleep, the greatest and most natural beautifier known, is essential to their health and looks. They all seem to be bent on a mad, mad fling—a mad race for sheer notoriety. They never for a moment think that such a life can't last beyond 25 at the most, when their looks fade and their friends gradually disappear, and hereafter, the "shelf" with its indescribable loneliness and childishness is all they have to look forward to.

The point is. Cannot our young womenfolk be urged to lead a more natural, rational life? The life, say, 97 per cent. would lead at home. Again, is their never-ending desire or craving for money and motor-cars genuine or merely bluff for the biggest fish they can hook?

Taking all into consideration, is it any wonder that the majority of our eligible bachelors prefer less swank and more womanliness? These, looks and physique, they do get from the girls especially in matrimonial demand nowadays and hereafter if there's not an abrupt change—those from the North.

I am, etc.,
A BRITISH BACHELOR OF 32.
Shanghai, Aug. 23, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The chorus of the latest song just out may be of interest to some of the girls whom a British Bachelor of 32 refers to in his letter which appears in your issue of to-day:—

You're the kind of a girl that men forget,
Just a toy to enjoy for a while;
For when men settle down they always get
An old-fashioned girl with an old-fashioned smile
And you'll soon realize you're not so wise
When the years bring you tears of regret—
When they play "Here comes the bride"
You'll stand outside
Just a girl that men forget.

I am, etc.,
ANOTHER BACHELOR.
Shanghai, Aug. 25, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It seems a pity that the too rapid pace of Shanghai Life should be made the responsibility of the "gay" womenfolk of Shanghai. Do they set the pace or are there not too many bachelors, grass-widowers and suchlike whose cocktail-drinking and cigarette-smoking amounts to excess, and who consider their girl friends "Pals" if they smoke and drink with them? Do these bachelors ever consider that their fingers covered with nicotine and their physique soaked with alcohohol have on them just as marked effect as on the girls whom they wish to look fresh and womanly.

It is inconsistent of these "gay" bachelors, who must have their good times and to whom an early night also has no appeal, to sit in judgment of the looks and physique of the girls who are largely responsible for their enjoyment. Why don't the bachelors who prefer less swank and more womanliness have the courage to show it? Why be two-faced? and give the impression—while at the party—that they admire and would encourage this drinking and smoking, and when at home (after the night before) think of all the womanly ways these girls lack. Have'nt they the courage of their opinions?

As all girls are supposed to think of very little else but how to attract the opposite sex, surely it should be made the responsibility of their men friends who enjoy their society as much as to be able to forgive and forget their cocktail-drinking and stained fingers, to set the pace and encourage the qualities they consider necessary in a woman to fulfil the demands of matrimony.

I am, etc.,
GIRL-BACHELOR OF 20.
Shanghai, Aug. 20, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—As a subscriber to your paper may I crave a small space in your correspondence column to stick up for the girl who is being constantly run down by people who are probably much worse than she is? Why should she be criticized because she's full of fun and likes to go out riding, dancing, etc?

Why not start a little correspondence about the gay bachelors and married men who send their wives away for the summer?

No Sir, let her be what she will, there's not 10 men in a hundred who would change her for the early Victorian product.

There are plenty of subjects to write about without pulling our womenfolk to pieces, and I think everyone is heartily sick of seeing this subject revived in the press about every two months.

Enclosing my card.

Shanghai, Aug. 26, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—If your correspondent "Another Bachelor" had any experience of Shanghai dances—or of the girls that frequent them—he would know that the song "A Girl that Men Forget" which he describes as "the latest song just out," lost all claim to that description over six months ago.

I would suggest, therefore, that his criticisms would be of greater interest if he confined them to subjects with which he is acquainted.

Both he and "A British Bachelor of 32" seem to forget that fondness for dancing is not as objectionable as inability to mind one's own business, and that whereas girls who dance every night harm no one but themselves, men who make public and unnecessary criticisms offend the feelings of hundreds of persons whose most serious crime is a partiality for dancing.

RULES OF THE ROAD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I much regret that number of passers-by injured or killed by the motor-cars and ricshas in Shanghai are wonderfully numerous and it is worth investigating most of such victims are almost Chinese people.

The principle of the Traffic System of Shanghai city is "Keep to the Left" and so if the persons want to cross the road to the other side they must look at Right hand First and at the centre of the road they must watch Left hand Second.

This is very important point and we can easily take note of such a thing by our simple commonsense. However, most of all Chinese people, in the case to cross the road, do not watch right and left hands of the road and they cross the road without any attention as if their attitudes are that of a sleepy fellow startled by a sudden fire at midnight, and they are so bewildered that they do not know what to do on hearing noisy horn of cars and shout of ricshamen and at last they come to meet with a sorrowful disaster.

In conclusion, I advise to the City Authorities this time it is best idea to post up at every visible places a notice written "right first and left second to cross road" and to give Chinese people a Traffic Idea patiently.

HIGH SPEED EXPOSURES

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reply to "Ambitious Beginner," Metol (Elon) is generally considered as the best developer for shadow-detail. Used with a factor of thirty it will give normal contrast but negatives will be thin and lacking in density. Formula on request, but any metol-formula will do.

"Tancol" and "Rytol" will give equally good results, used in accordance with instructions as given in the Welcome hand-book. Kodak Special developer used with a factor of 12 does just as well.

None of these developers will give chemical fog unless used too warm. Light-fog of course must be guarded against by not exposing the plate to the safe-light longer than is necessary to ascertain the factor; the rest of the time it should be kept covered in the tray. With tanks there is no danger of light-fog if care is used in loading.

Developed but unfixed plates can get light-struck so do not expose them to light until after fixing is well under way. Under-exposures must not be forced or high-lights will clog and the negative will be unprintable. Thus under, normal, and over-exposures should be all treated exactly the same and it is best to select one developer, master its use, and stick to it.

GRAMMAR TRAPS

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The real answer to "?" and his query as to the verb to be used in connexion with "there are a number of men" is that it is a foolish way of constructing a sentence. Take for instance the sentence "a number of houses is to let." That is a correct sentence grammatically, but a poor sentence "structurally." The really sensible thing to do is to put the noun that is really the subject of the sentence in its proper place. Such phrases as "a number of," "a quantity of," and so on don't really mean anything and should, therefore, be discarded. If houses are to let, why not say so? If men are required, why insert such useless words as "a number of?" A "number" might mean two or a million.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the correspondence column of your valuable paper of to-day's date I read with much interest the article by "C'est Moi." I would, however, beg to differ with him as to the correctness of "there is a number of men" but would rather believe "there are a number of men" to be correct. In justification of my statement, I quote J. C. Nesfield, the well known author of English Grammar. In his "oral exercises in English composition," paragraph 8 (e) he says:—

"Number, variety—these nouns, though singular in form, can be followed by a plural verb, when they are used in a plural sense:—

A large number of them were present (what was present? Not number, but they who made the number were present)."

The same rule surely holds good in "There are a number of men."

I am, etc.,
VOLENS DISCERE.
Shanghai, Aug. 23, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your issue of to-day "Volens Discere" quotes the authority of Mr. J. C. Nesfield for the correctness of:—

There are a number of men and he himself "begs to differ with" me (begs leave to differ from) when I state that:—

There is a number of men

is the correct rendering. Mr. J. C. Nesfield may be the author of an English Grammar but nevertheless he is wrong.

Another common error is in the phrases "Somebody else's" "Anybody else's," which should read "Somebody's else" and "Anybody's else."

In reporting proceedings at public gatherings one often reads that "There were about 300 people present." This should read "persons" not "people." "People" refers to nations "The English people," the "Japanese people," the "Chinese people," etc. It may be pedantic but "persons" is the correct form. If you require further examples please ring the bell and I'll trot 'em out for another month.

I am, etc.,
C'EST MOI.
Shanghai, Aug. 25, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"C'est Moi" has spoken, and lest "?" or any other reader should be entrapped by his didactic, incorrect statements, I should like to contribute the following.

First, with regard to the original query, I will quote Nesfield. "A Collective Noun denotes a group or collection of similar individuals, considered as one complete whole." Further, "A distinction is made between a Collective Noun and a Noun of Multitude:—

(a) A Collective Noun denotes one undivided whole; and hence the Verb following is singular.

(b) A Noun of Multitude denotes the individuals of the group; and hence the verb is plural, although the noun is singular."

Now, in the sentence under discussion, "number" is a noun of multitude; therefore, according to the rule, the correct rendering is "There are a number of men."

In difficulties of this nature a student must first settle in his own mind whether such words as "number," "none," "variety," imply plurality or not. In the two examples given by "C'est Moi," "company" and "band" are collective nouns, therefore the verbs are singular. Had "number" been used instead of these words, the verbs would have been plural. As an example of the use of "number" with a singular verb I might add "The number of men out of work is very great."

"C'est Moi" has been rather unfortunate in his choice of common errors. If he will look up the Concise Oxford Dictionary he will find that:—

(1) "different" can take either "to" or "from."

(2) "averse" can take either "to" or "from."

(3) both "storeyed" and "storied" are correct.

(4) the use of the plural of money is archaic, therefore is not of much importance.

As regards (4) the plural is mostly used in legal documents and I believe the usual spelling is "monies."

Trusting that my remarks will help "?"

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I refer to a letter in to-day's "North-China Daily News" re "Grammar Traps," from C'est Moi. I am inclined to think that "C'est Moi" is worrying himself about "traps" which are not "traps" at all.

"There are a number of men." My idea in this case is that the word "number" used in this meaning has a sufficiently plural sense that it is always used so with a plural verb—i.e. "quite a number do—anything," and "there are quite a number who think so," etc. ad infinitum.

"Begs to differ with." Personally I never use the word "beg"—I despise it. Although this is of course a matter of personal taste. As regards differing with as opposed to differing from—True, a thing generally differs from another in physical aspect. But, although my ideas differ from "C'est Moi's," I differ with him in my opinions. I think that where there is the sense of a difference of opinion, it holds the idea of mutual action, as in the case of other verbs, and becomes "with."

"Somebody else's." My opinion is that as somebody doesn't possess else, but rather somebody else possesses whatever it may be (probably very little now-a-days), the posssessive belongs on the terms as a whole, i.e. at the end of the understood-hyphenated word. Like "mother-in-law's" in the possessive, although the plural would be added to the body noun. One would certainly say "my mother-in-law's shawl," although "mothers-in-law are proverbially anathema," and even "mothers-in-law's reputations suffer under public opinion." I think the illustration used would be a parallel case, although "somebody else" isn't hyphenated. Anyway everybody says "everybody else's," and nobody says "nobody's else."

As for the use of the word people, my understanding is that the word may be used quite as readily in either the collective or the individual sense. In the collective it has a singular meaning, and may be pluralized. In the individual sense it is an alternative plural for person, without the same stilted, particularly demonstrative, quality that the term "persons" has. I advise Monsieur to look up the dictionary definition for the word "people"—it's really quite interesting.

I call on some one in authority to quote his favourite masters of English to prove it if I have misjudged "C'est Moi" in believing him to be trying to correct correct English. I grant that differences of opinion as to the alternative use of the two prepositions "with" and "from" are very frequent, and often without authority to prove that either is the more correct. But in all the other cases cited I am strongly of the opinion that my statements would offend none of the recognized authorities.

I am, etc.,
A MERE STENOGRAPHER.
Shanghai, Aug. 26, 1924.

P.S.—In re-reading "C'est Moi's" letter I find that he has himself committed a very common breach of correct construction. He says "In reporting proceedings at public gatherings one often reads that—". This is one of the most frequent of the more subtle errors. He should have said "In reporting proceedings at public gatherings the reporter often writes that—," or "In (reading) reports of proceedings at public gatherings one often sees that—". The participal phrase does not modify the "one" who is doing the reading, and the wording as Monsieur has it is unspeakably clumsy, as well as being quite incorrect.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The grammar of every language in the world states that the subject of a sentence is not preceded by a preposition.

If in the English language the words number, variety, etc., though singular are followed by a plural verb, then in the sentence "there are a number of men" the subject is "a number." This is correct both in the grammatical (perhaps in the English language alone) as well as in the logical analysis of the sentence. But in no language in the world can "men" be the subject, for not all those "men" are there.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—May I ask you who "C'est Moi" is to assume authority to differ from so well known a grammarian as J. C. Nesfield the sales of whose grammar have, I think, passed the hundred thousand mark?

If at the next convention of educationalists I touch upon the subject of Nesfield's ruling and state that "C'est Moi" in the correspondence column of the "N.C.D. News" says, It is wrong, what is the first question they will ask?

Shanghai, Aug. 27, 1924.

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your issue of to-day "Jay Pee," like your other correspondent "?" quotes Nesfield, with the addition of the "Concise Oxford Dictionary," as his authorities for disputing the correctness of "There is a number of men."

There are authorities and authorities and there are also witnesses, i.e., the liar, the damned liar and the expert witness.

What is an authority? An authority is a person who came into this world "via ports" the same as did I and "Jay Pee." This authority, like myself, has a kink in his brain, which takes him into avenues of investigation and study peculiar to that kink and in good time he is an "authority." Authorities differ from each other frequently and it is resolved into the opinion of one man against the opinion of another. Personally I flatter myself that I am able to spell correctly 95 per cent. of the contents of any English Dictionary, but I would not care to suggest that I am an authority on spelling. It is merely that the kink in my brain works in that particular groove. There is no credit attaching to me for it.

To return to the sentence "There is a number of men." It is often difficult to decide whether singular or plural verbs and nouns and pronouns should be used with a noun of multitude; moreover, the same noun which, under certain conditions, requires the singular number, under others may demand the plural. In deciding whether the former or the latter should be employed, it is necessary to consider whether the idea conveyed by such noun is that of unity, or plurality; that is to say, whether the notion of a whole or that of a number is the more prominently presented to the mind by the term used. In the sentence "There is a number of men" the idea conveyed is that of unity and therefore the singular form is correct.

In the matter of the examples "different to" instead of "different from," "averse to" instead of "averse from" I disagree entirely, as the correctness of the "from" is sticking out a mile.

"Jay Pee" states that the use of the plural "moneys" is archaic and that "monies" is mostly used in legal documents. This merely proves that the legal gentlemen still have something to learn.

The following are further examples of common errors:—

I only arrived last night
(I arrived only last night)
As soon as possible
(So soon as possible)
Between you and I
(Between you and me)
With one or two exceptions
(With few exception)
Two alternatives
(Two courses)

With regard to the last-quoted example I may mention that there can be only one alternative. You have an alternative open to you or you have two or more courses open to you.

I am, etc.,
C'EST MOI.

INSULTING QUEEN VICTORIA

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In to-day's issue of your paper there is an extraordinary screed from one Bruce Lockhart in which the following appears:—

A few steps along the Praya is Statue Square, the show place of Hongkong, and in the centre we find the Victoria Memorial with the august old lady sitting on her throne holding the orb and sceptre in either hand. (Incidentally, one wonders how she can sit up there year after year without wanting to powder her nose, which she is powerless to do since both hands are occupied in balancing those emblems of her royal state). However, this monument has been provided with a stone canopy, so Queen Victoria runs no risk of having either her dress or her complexion spoiled by torrential rains or tropical sun, as alas, both her daughter-in-law and grand-daughter-in-law do!

The effect the foregoing lines produce on the average Englishman and Englishwoman is one of profound disgust. Britons are accustomed to speak of the late Queen Victoria, of revered memory, with bated breath, and it is not a little surprising that you should suffer the columns of your paper to be disfigured by such a coarse effusion, which is nothing less than a gratuitous insult to the memory of a great ruler and to the people over whom she ruled. A time there was when the columns of the "North-China Daily News" were full of dignity and represented a high standard of journalism, but when such an ill-mannered effusion can be permitted to appear in your paper, you must indeed have fallen from your high estate. Such things are not an incentive to continued support of your paper, and you must not be surprised if British readers decide that they have no further justification for reading a paper that allows one of the greatest British Sovereigns to be referred to in ribald terms.

I am, etc.,
DISGUSTED.

Shanghai, Aug. 25, 1924.

 We are sorry our correspondent feels that an insult has been done to the memory of Queen Victoria, we do not say that the jest was of the highest order of wit, but we must confess we thought and still think it innocuous.—Ed.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—"Disgusted's" attack on W.B.L. is well deserved. The memory of the great and good should not be subject to cheap wit, lacking in refinement and "positively silly." It may be innocuous but we credit W.B.L. with a little more sense than to write such "stuff." If that is all he thought of when seeing the statue of a great Queen there must be something wrong with the man. With Victoria we associate all that is noble and great in the Empire but Mr. Lockhart thinks differently and writes of her in terms that can be applied to any frivolous girl. Apparently every Englishwoman upsets him.

Too often are names that should be sacred and respected tossed about in meaningless jokes. Recently we heard and read too much of King "Tut." The Pharaoh's name may be long and difficult to pronounce or write but in due respect to his memory a little effort could be made to do so. Some of your readers will think this attitude absurd, but it has more meaning than they dream of. Tut-ankh-amen was a great Pharaoh and Time has sanctified his name, but after lying in peace, unmentioned for centuries, he becomes the subject of cartoons and stupid witticisms. Does the 20th century hold nothing sacred? It is not superstitution, but a royal spirit is outraged by these indignities.

While on the subject, I should like to state that it is unkind and wrong to expose the mummied forms of the ancient dead to the gaze of the curious and profane. Let the historian and scientist approach them reverently, learn what they can and restore them to their hidden resting places.

It is upsetting to think of rulers like Seti and Ramses being kept in glass cases like rare specimens of snakes or stuffed birds. They were men who lived gloriously, who were honoured and worshipped by thousands, who made themselves respected and felt by the then known world and we have no right to treat them as inanimate objects. Imagine what an Egyptian of old would feel if he could visit one of our museums—it is beyond imagination. Think what we would feel if, coming a thousand years later, we should find a recent hero in a glass case in some future collection of antiquities. Our thoughts would be unspeakable.

To return to W.B.L.—really Mr. Editor you should follow our friend "Jos Mitel's" advice. His discordant "screedings" make the "beloved North-China Daily News" too lively, and not pleasingly so. When Mr. Bruce begins to vent his wrath or mirth on any subject he does not know when to stop, he overleaps all bounds of courtesy. Do try the "chokings." Perhaps "Jos Mitel" will prescribe the same for the writer of this letter but nevertheless I must say that his letters were some of the wittiest ever published in this paper. There's wit for you W.B.L.—pleasant even to the victim

During this heat we are excused many faults and so bear with me if I turn to another subject. In to-day's issue the letter by Mr. Hall contains a phrase that deserved the severest censure. What does he mean by calling the present government of the British Empire the "coolie government?" I am not interested in politics and know very little of the subject but I do object and so will many others to this insolence. Some may not like the Labour Party to be in power but that is not excuse for calling it by a term if anything degrading. A labourer is not a coolie, Mr. Hall, and it is time for this word to be banished from our vocabularies. His language is insulting to the very King and Constitution he says he upholds, for King and Constitution support the Party in power and rightly too or chaos would result. "Choking" is not strong enough for this.

CHINESE WEATHER PROPHETS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—You have often referred to the weather forecast as set down in the Chinese calendar in terms of semi-raillery as if the thing is a joke.

As a matter of fact the Chinese forecast of the weather and climatic conditions, etc., is not based on fancy, nor is it mysterious or wonderful, inasmuch as it is simply reckoned on the average happenings in north and south during the past thousands of years.

This being the case, and notwithstanding occasional upsets it is not surprising that the period of change of weather as written in the Chinese year book for weather and "Fung Shui," etc., nearly always coincides with what actually happens in so far as China is concerned.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

To The Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I am sure that many will thank you for your thoughtful article on Sunday observance, occasioned by the very interesting statement of Mr. Kingman.

That statement took the ground, I think, that the setting apart of Sunday for the cultivation of his spiritual life, seemed to him necessary for the full development of his powers of service, to which ideal he was, as a Christian, bound.

This shows an admirable spirit, which commands respect, but it is more calculated to win tolerance for a private opinion than to clarify an important question.

If it be asked, Why observe Sunday? What is the real principle of Sunday observance? I conceive that the only adequate reply is that it is a Divine Institution. That fact, once admitted, settles the question for a servant of God. It is a question of submission to authority.

It is, in short, the will and appointment of God that we should observe one day in seven, before Christ the seventh day, since Christ the first day of the week. That is our assertion and belief.

It is recorded in the Bible that the seven days' division of time is primeval, and connected with the very formation of man. The method of observing a seventh day was, however, not defined, so far as we know, before the time of Moses. But in the moral law spoken by God from heaven in the hearing of the Israelites this law found a place and was accompanied by definite directions.

At that time special emphasis was laid on the consecration of the day to God. This was to be marked by cessation from daily toils. It was described as a public acknowledgment of the authority of the Creator.

When repeating and enlarging this Law Moses laid stress also on the relief it affords for toilers, both man and beast. He urged in this connexion the recollection of the deliverance of the Israelite nation by God from their bondage in Egypt, where their toils could not have known a day of rest.

But it was not considerations like these which made the observance obligatory, the ground was still the command of God, to Whose authority, both in respect of creation and of redemption, they acknowledged themselves obedient, moved to its recognition alike by reverence and by gratitude.

The multitude of restrictions imposed by later Judaism were no part of the original commandment. There is no trace of these in the Old Testament, and our Lord set them on one side. But He asserted the fact of the Divine Institution, "The Sabbath was made for man."

The original purpose of God in this institution is stated clearly in two passages in Isaiah. He says in one that what God approves in man is "keeping His Sabbaths, choosing the things that please Him, and holding fast His covenant." The context shows that the words are prophetic of Christian times. So the Christian man reckons Sabbath-keeping as part of God's will for him.

In another passage God defines what He intends by Sabbath observance in these words—

"If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day, and call the Sabbath a delight, and the holy (day) of the Lord honourable, and shalt honour it, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words, then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord."

These passages of God's word exercise a real compulsion on the Christian man, and in responding to the expressed will of God he finds His promise true, and the day anything but "blue, cheerless, painfully pious." Rather does it become to him the means by which those "deepest and most abiding desires of man," of which you, Sir, most truly speak as always present, even when "temporarily obscured," will most surely become revived and satisfied.

I am convinced that there is crying need in our day for a firm reassertion of Divine Authority.

You say that "there was certainly never a time when nerves and restless dissatisfaction were so prevalent as now." I think the root of this is not the War, though that was a symptom and a warning, but is to be found in that very repudiation of the tradition of Divine Authority on which, we are told, all thinking men are now agreed. It is widely true that the seat of authority is being transferred in men's thoughts from God's Word written, to God expressed in man, as the phrase goes, or, where it has gone the whole length of repudiation, to man as man, and this is why there is so little peace in men's hearts or in the world.

Thinking men might do a little thinking on the result of seeking to necromancy instead of to the law of God in the kingdom of Judah long ago, as described in Isaiah 8.19-22. Or again, they might consider these words on the state of affairs in Jeremiah's time.

"Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls, but they said, we shall not walk therein. And I set watchmen over you, saying, Hearken to the sound of the trumpet; but they said We will not hearken. Therefore hear, ye nations, and know, O congregation, what is among them, Hear, O earth; behold I will bring evil upon this people, even the fruit of their thoughts, because they have not hearkened unto My words, and as for My law they have rejected it. To what purpose cometh there to Me frankincense from Sheba and the sweet cane from a far country? your burnt offerings are not acceptable, nor your sacrifices pleasing unto Me. Therefore thus saith Jehovah, I will lay stumbling blocks before this people and they shall fall one against another (Jer. 6.16-21).

Thinking men may also also think what this prophecy, unlocalized and with no note of time, may mean—

"The earth mourneth and fadeth away, the lofty people of the earth do languish. The earth also is polluted under the inhabitants thereof, because they have transgressed the laws, violated the statutes, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are found guilty." (Is. 24.4-6.)

Truly men need "plain religion," they need the knowledge of God. For this end He made the Sabbath, and gave the Bible, and formed a Church, and ordained public worship.

The Christian minister bears a heavy responsibility. It is his part to make these things effectual for the end for which they were instituted.

The most tremendous condemnation perhaps in the whole Old Testament is that which is thundered against the ministers who substituted their own ideas for the Word of God, and so ruined their nation. They may be read in Jer. 23.9-end, and Ezekiel 13, and the lamentation over their disastrous influence in Lam. 2.14. These things were written for our learning, upon whom the end, not of a single nation but of the whole world, may be coming. The signs are like those predicted of the last days, before God comes in upon the world and vindicates His authority. But whether that be so or not, the only hope of peace for individuals and the world is in a frank recognition of the claims of the Almighty.

I am, etc.,
W. S. MOULE.

KIANGSU AND CHEKIANG

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Your interesting paper has, for the last few days, given very lengthy accounts of the probability of warfare between Kiangsu and Chekiang. From to-day's news, it would seem that a fight is inevitable. May it come. Continual suspense is not good either for trade or public order. It is better for the Chinese generals to have it out once for all. The only pity is that merchants and country people will be the chief sufferers but warfare may even be better than the present uncertainty and anxiety.

It would seem as if Chinese generals were very firm believers in the old saying that "He who fights and runs away will live to fight another day." Hence, the oft recurring report that such and such a general "has fled." For the sake of the people if not for their "face," let the opposing generals, now on the eve of battle, determine that they shall either die fighting or, in case of defeat, use the silken cord or some such method of quick exit from the mess they may find themselves in.

Half measures such as mediation are of no use. Eventually it is on the commercial classes and on the peasants that the heaviest burden will fall; let them hearten themselves to endure it now, once and for all.

And may there emerge, out of the chaos and the bloody conflict, a Government capable and honest in the conduct of its business and may the victorious general modestly retire, like other great personages of old, to his farm, laying aside the worries and cares of government in all its aspects.

I am, etc.,
LUCEAT.

THE UNEMPLOYED AND FREE LIBRARIES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—The "Shade of Carnegie" whose letter appeared in the "Herald" for June 14, and who finds it difficult to believe two of my statements in reference to a municipal free library, is easily exercised. In my article on how the unemployed in Great Britain live I described the living room of an unemployed man's home and said that it boasted a bookshelf exclusively filled with books from the local free library. If my spectral critic will look up my article he will find that I enumerated five persons in the family. Each of these is entitled to, and possesses, the customary two lender's cards one entitling the holder to any class of book, and the other available only for non-fiction. These ten volumes took up the whole of the space of the small hanging bookshelf that is commonly seen in the small living room of a typical working man's home. The particular working man's home I described is in Gorton, Manchester. The library is the Manchester Free Library; a quite average one, neither better nor worse than that of any other large town. For the further information of my critic I may say that in most British homes where one or two members of the family are readers it is customary for them to use the cards the rest of the family are entitled to possess.

The other statement called to question is my assertion that "By filling in a form, any special book will be bought for him (the member of a free library) to read, subject to the approval of the librarian." It is difficult to understand why the "Shade of Carnegie" should find it so hard to believe this commonplace fact. Every decent municipal library now encourages its readers to select the books they desire to read. I enclose the printed card on which the Manchester Free Library invites its users to fill in the name of the book they wish to have purchased and its price and publisher. It has been my privilege to fill up a considerable number of these cards and on no occasion have they failed to buy the volume I asked for. If this card could be despatched to the "Shade of Carnegie" without getting burnt it might do more to convince him than anything I could say. He should, however, note that I expressly stated in my article that such additions to the library shelves were "subject to the approval of the librarian." It is probable that if the applicant asked for "The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk," "Triumphant Democracy," or "The True Story of Sweeny Todd the Demon Barber," he would be very properly disappointed.

The "Shade" concludes his attack with the statement that if all my facts are "based on the same wobbly foundation as the foregoing, I shall in future accept 'em at the selling rate of two bob to the tael." It is easy to see how I have upset this unhappy spectre. The cloudy generalizations that pass for Labour news in most newspapers to-day have an affinity for him in that they lack substance. My facts are as tangible and definite as lumps of coal. In case any reader of my articles should be unable correctly to translate into actualities such journalese as "a wage based on what the industry will bear," I, being a worker, and living among workers, do my best to show what it means to little Georgie's boots in January if his father is unable to "lift" a bit of leather belting at the works, or just how much bread and margarine will be left for mother's breakfast when the rest of the family have had their share It is the tragedy of the worker that his "leaders" almost invariably forget all these unpleasant details when they leave the mines and the workshops for Westminster.

Court Story of Rumours About a Man's Character Which Cost Him a Job

An action for damages arising out of an alleged breach of contract was hared by his Honour Judge Grain in the Suppreme Court on Thursday, Mr. J. J. Kienhuize claiming Tls. 750 from Messrs. Frazar & Co.

Mr. T. Addis appeared for plaintiff and Mr. G. H. Wright for defendants.

In opening the case, Mr. Addis said that plaintiff obtained an introduction to Frazar & Co. and on June 16 and 17 had interviews with Mr. McMichael, and on the following day a verbal agreement that plaintiff should be engaged on probation for three months, in the piece goods department, was confirmed. He was to begin at a salary of Tls. 250, and further arrangements were to be made if his services were satisfactory. Plaintiff went for a short holiday to Tsingtao and returned, as he had intimated, about the middle of the month, and when he went to report himself at defendants'office he was told they could not employ him.

Plaintiff, in his evidence, said that while he was at Tsingtao he received another offer of employment in Shanghai but refused it because of defendants' engagement. When he saw Mr. McMichael on returning to Shanghai, the latter said he had received a telegram from Home advising him not to engage further assistance then as overhead expenses should be kept down. Mr. McMichael assured him that that was the only reason why he was not being taken on, and he offered to assist witness in finding employment elsewhere. At the interviews with Mr. McMichael, witness gave him all the particulars he asked for, and there was no misrepresentation on his part. He told him he was last in the employ of Messrs. Zylstra, and this was true.

"Fictitious Claim for £150"

In answer to Mr. Wright, witness said he left Messrs. Zylstra at the end of April, and worked with Mr. S. Lord during May. So far as witness knew, Mr. Lord had nothing against his character and would have given a satisfactory reference had he been asked for it. Witness was not employed by Mr. Lord, but worked with him in carrying on the piece goods department taken over from Messrs. Zylstra. It was a partnership arrangement without formal agreement.

Witness admitted that, in respect to a claim against a Manchester firm, he wrote to Mr. Zylstra asking when he was going to receive his share of "the fictitious claim for £150."

His Honour—Does he use the word 'fictitious' in the letter?

Mr. Wright—Yes.

Witness said that he left Messrs. Zylstra before the claim was settled. He produced a letter from Mr. Lord in which the latter pointed out that the business was too small for two foreigners and he concluded by expressing his best thanks to witness.

Mr. Max Steiner gave evidence that he would have employed plaintiff but for the fact that Kienhuize had already been engaged by Messrs. Frazar.

Some Nasty Rumours.

Mr. Wright, for the defence, contended that the contract was voidable because there had been misrepresentation by plaintiff. He deliberately witheld the information that he had been employed by Mr. Lord when particulars of his experience were asked for.

Mr. E. H. McMichael gave evidence as to his interviews with plaintiff, who told him he was out of a job in consequence of Messrs. Zylstra having closed down their piece goods department. He said nothing whatever about his employment by Mr. Lord. Later, witness heard some nasty rumours about plaintiff and, desiring further information as to his past, sent for him, again and again he said nothing about Mr. Lord. Following this, witness saw Mr. Lord, whose report on plaintiff was unfavourable, to such an extent that witness felt he could not give him a position of trust When plaintiff returned from Tsingtao, and witness told him he had changed his mind about engaging him, he gave reasons which were not strictly correct, wishing to save bother and not to draw Mr. Lord into the matter. Being sorry to have to do this, he did say he would try and help him in getting another position.

Began to Distrust Plaintiff.

Mr. S. Lord gave evidence that he purchased the piece goods department of Messrs. Zylstra & Co. and employed plaintiff, who had been their manager and knew all about the business. In two weeks he began to distrust plaintiff, for one reason because he tried to take an assortment book, and discontinued his services. Had Mr. McMichael applied to witness for a character, he could not have given plaintiff a good one.

Addressing the Court for defendants, Mr. Wright contended there had clearly been misrepresentation by plaintiff in witholding the information that he had been employed by Mr. Lord, and counsel suggested that this was witheld because plaintiff knew Mr. Lord would not give him such a character as was would result in the contract with defendants being made. In these circumstances, it was open to defendants to set the contract aside, and this could be done whenever there was representation, fraudulent or innocent, which was misleading.

Mr. Addis laid stress on the fact that plaintiff had answered all the questions put to him at the time of his engagement, and he was not bound to give away his character good or bad. The position was different from that of an insurance policy contract, where it was necessary that all material facts should be disclosed.

No Breach of Contract.

His Honour, in giving judgment, said it was clear that there had been the offer and aceptance of a contract, and equally clear that plaintiff had been employed by Mr. Lord. This conccealment, or omission, was material, because Mr. McMichael had said that had he known he would have applied to Mr. Lord for a character, and Mr. Lord had said he culd not have given plaintiff a good recommendation. There having been this misrepresentation, the contract was voidable and therefore there could be no breach of it. Judgment must be for defendants, with costs.

"KNEW HER AS HIS SWEETHEART"

Accused's Statement in Wounding Case: Chinese Girl a Drill Instructor

The Indian watchman charged with having wounded a Chinese girl named Tsang Wong-sz with intent to do grievous bodily harm appeared again before Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court last Friday, and was committed for trial.

The complainant, who stated that she was a teacher of drill at a school in the French Concession, told a story of being spoken to by the accused while she was proceeding along Thibet Road on Wednesday morning last. He asked her to accompany him to the Yih Ping Shan hotel and upon her refusing he first threatened her, bit her on the arm when she raised her hands to protect herself, and then drew a knife and almost cut off her right ear. Afterwards the accused went witn her to Louza Police station.

In cross-examination by Mr. J. G. Priestwood, who appeared to defend, witness said she did not know whether the Indian was drunk or sober. She did not know him and, so far as she knew, had never spoken to him before, though she might have done so at Ewo mill where there were a number of Indians. He spoke to her in Chinese, swore at her when she refused to accompany him, then pinned her to the wall and drew the knife.

Counsel produced a photograph, a portrait of complainant, with the accused standing by, and witness, admitting that it was her portrait, "taken in a dancing position," denied that the accused was there when the portrait was taken.

Police Sgt. Evans, who was on duty at Louza station when complainant and the accused appeared, said he at once had the girl sent off to hospital. The interpreter was called, but before a question could be put to accused he said, "Yes, I cut off her ear," and so saying, he produced a Chinese razor which was blood stained. He was cautioned, and went on to say that he had known complainant as a sweetheart for two years. On Wednesday morning he met her in Thibet Road and they walked together towards Peking Road, presently stopping to "have a few words." The girl said that she had pawned all the jewellery he had given her, and she produced the pawntickets. "I'll teach you a lesson not to do a Sikh down again," accused said, then drawing out the razor and cutting the girl's ear.

In answer to Mr. Priestwood, witness said there was nothing peculiar about the accused. He was not in a state of nervous excitement, and was quite sober.

Mr. Priestwood suggested that the court might deal summarily with the case as being one of unlawful wounding.

The Magistrate replied that he had the power to do this if he considered that a fine of £20 or three months' imprisonment would be sufficient to meet the case, but he thought it would not in the event of the case being proved before a jury.

Accused reserved his defence and was committed for trial, bail being refused.

INDIAN DEPORTEE'S RETURN

Story of Seditious Activity during the War: To Be Sent Back to India

An echo of Indian sedition in Shanghai during the war was heard in H. M. Police Court on Wednesday when Mit Singh appeared before Mr. G. W. King charged with returning to China after having been deported in September, 1916.

Accused said he understood he was permitted to return after three years.

The Magistrate—Who told you that? An order for deportation is a permanent order. There is no "close time."

Court records were produced proving the order against defendant, and Capt. Barrett gave evidence that Mit was one of 20 men arrested for gambling in the Concession, and was one of eight men then deported. He returned to Shanghai from Canton in July.

Mr. A. G. Mossop, instructed by the Consul-General, said this was the first instance of a person being charged under the Order in Council for returning from deportation. The British authorities in China regarded such return as a very serious matter, but as this was the first case he was instructed not to press for such a term of imprisonment as might be under the Order. He would simply ask for an order for re-deporation. The history of the accused showed that he had engaged in sedition during war time.

Accused produced papers to show that he had received official permission to visit Hongkong, Canton and Shanghai, and said he told an official at Canton that he had been deported from Shanghai. He had not obtained permission to leave India. It was open to anyone to come as far as Singapore without such permission.

The Magistrate pointed out that the only valid permission was that given by the Secretary of State, and as accused had not this authority, he must make an order for his re-deportation.

MR. HARRIS'S DEATH

The Inquest: Coroner's Sympathy for Deceased's Relatives

Mr. G. W. King conducted an inquiry at H. M. Consulate on Wednesday into the circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Cecil Frank Harris, at 64 Route des Sœurs on the morning of the 23rd instant.

Dr. A. C. Bryson said he was called to the house by telephone at 6 o'clock on the morning of the 23rd and found deceased lying at the foot of the stairs with the face buried in the crook of his elbow. There was a cut over the left eye, the wrist was broken and the indications pointed to death from suffocation. What probably happened was that deceased was mounting the stairs in the dark, when he slipped on a step which was partly broken. He fell, striking his head and stunning himself; his head must have fallen as it was found, the nose and mouth being stopped by the elbow, and suffocation setting in. The deceased had been dead probably about four hours.

Evidence of finding the body was given by the chauffeur, who sleeps on the premises. He called the house-boy, who in turn roused the deceased man's brother.

Det. Sub-Inspr. Hunter, who made inquiries on behalf of the police, said he had the body removed to the Public Mortuary. He was convinced the deceased met with his death accidentally.

The Coroner, recording a verdict that deceased died through suffocation, the result of an accidental fall, expressed his sympathy with the relatives and the widow.

ESTATE TRUSTEES

Judge Thinks They Should Be Companies Not Individuals

At the U. S. Court on Monday, Judge Purdy heard a motion by Mr. Franklin, administrator of the estate of the late Susan May Forrest, to discharge the administrator upon the presentation of his itemized accounts and the taking over of the estate by the trustee, the latter to be appointed by the Court.

Judge Purdy examined the accounts in detail, and as in his opinion the estate was comparatively simple of settlement, with the exception that the fact of domicile had to be established, set the administrator-attorney's fee as five per cent. of the funds handled to date instead of the maximum 10 per cent., stating that proper claims for remuneration for further activity on the part of administrator would receive consideration later.

"Boost" for Trust Companies

With regard to appointing an administrator, the Judge expressed his opinion that the office should be a continuing trust, not to be terminated by the death of an individual, but to be held until discharged by the conditions of the will—in other words, that a trust company was preferable to any individual. In his (the learned judge's) opinion such a company was better equipped to discharge these duties efficiently and economically, than any individual. The Judge said that as it was the desire of the Court that all properties handled through its machinery should be administered for the greatest benefit of the beneficiaries, he would ask Mr. Franklin to communicate with the beneficiary, stating that the Court had under consideration the appointment of a trustee, and deemed the matter of such importance that it desired to know her wishes in the matter, expressed after counsel from her best legal or business advisers. Mr. Franklin was permitted by the Court to send the beneficiary Tls. 5,000 at this time, this being the greater part of the accumulated income to date.

DRINK AND DOMESTIC UNHAPPINESS

Ex-Bluejacket Driven to Fraud: Lenient Sentence by U. S. Court

Carl S. Baker (39), an ex-bluejacket, was indicted at the U. S. Court yesterday for false pretences. The information stated that on August 4 defendant represented himself to Mr. Sabelstrom, manager of the Scandinavian Brewery Co., as the advertising solicitor of the Army and Navy Journal, and obtained $30 from him for the insertion of an advertisement. It was later found out that he had appropriated the money for his own uses. Upon another occasion, defendant posed as a solicitor of funds for the American Red Cross and thereby obtained $5 from Peter Tchakalian, pocketing the contribution for himself.

The defendant, who pleaded "Guilty but with extenuating circumstances," stated that these offences were committed under the influence of liquor. He cited his previous good record of 20 years in the U.S. Navy, and said that his present condition was due to worry over domestic unhappiness which had completely unnerved him. He came to Shanghai with the idea of finding work as a musician, as he had had large musical experience and training, but was unable to secure a position. He had purchased a return passage to Seattle for September 4, but not being able to find work in the interim was led, while under the influence of drink, to obtaining money in this way. He volunteered to return the money.

Mr. Rodger, the Acting District Attorney, said that the complaining witnesses were not anxious to press the case, and called the attention of the Court to the Baker's naval record, showing that his conduct had been exemplary for 20 years.

Major Holcomb, who appeared for the defendant, also referred to his useful service to the government, to the fact that this was his first offence. The sum involved was a small one, said Major Holcomb, which the defendant wished to repay.

Defendant's "Serviceable" Life.

Judge Purdy, in passing sentence, said that the Court took into consideration what the defendant had said on his own behalf and believed it to be a case for leniency. The defendent, who was only 39 years of age, had led a very serviceable life and there was no reason why he should let domestic difficulties blot out his future usefulness to his mother and his country.

"You ought to brace up," said the Judge to defendant, "~~and the~~ Court will give you an opportunity to do so. The sentence will give you chance to get back home. I sentence you to imprisonment in the American gaol for one week."

A WITNESS'S FOUL LANGUAGE

Prosecutor's Curses Lead to a Fine of $5 for Contempt of Court

The unruly tongue of the complaining witness in an asault case heard at the U. S. Commissioner's Court last Friday led to his being fined G.$5 for contempt.

The witness, J. R. Montgomery, stated that while walking along Broadway near the Astor House on Thursday evening at about 8.30 o'clock the defendant, E R. Tindall (described as chief engineer of the str. Wheatland Montaua) was blocking the way and as witness passed him Tindall, quite without provocation struck him several times, cutting his head and raising a bump thereon. He therefore had Tindall arrested and after being charged at Hongkew police-station with assault, defendant was committed to the U. S. Gaol.

In telling his story witness swore, for which the Commissioner (Mr. Lurton) reproved him, whereupon witness said he thought the Court "ought not to be so disagreable about it." He had "nothing more to say to the Court, but would take the matter to a higher tribunal." On being warned he subsided.

After a second witness for the Government, Mr. Hamilton, had given evidence that he was present at the time the attack by defendant upon Mr. Montgomery, Montgomery was recalled for re-examination and it was again necessary to warn him as to his behaviour in Court. He apologized but was soon off again. "I want justice," he insisted.

Mr. Lurton—That is what the Court is here for.

Defendant said that while he was standing on the footpath in Broadway near the Astor House, Mr. Montgomery passed him, and he (witness) accidentally jostled against him. With that Mr. Montgomery used such foul epithets that defendant replied to the insult with a blow.

The Commissioner said that he believed the defendant to be telling the truth and that he was influenced to that belief by the demeanour of the complaining witness, showing that his use of such language was very lax. He said that the defendant had technically over-stepped the bounds of the law in striking the complaining witness, but he had certain justification as any decent man was bound to resent the use of such language. Defendant's initial offence was evidently accidental, and even if he were in the wrong civilized language might have been used to reprove him. Mr. Lurton said the Court would not countenance the use of such indecent and obnoxious language, and would give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and dismiss the charge against him.

The complaining witness expressed much indignation at which Mr. Lurton said, "I warn you for the last time to be quiet," but as Montgomery continued the Commissioner declared his action in contempt of Court and fined him G.$5.

"I won't pay it," replied the complaining witness with vehemence.

"See that the fine is paid before you leave this Court" said Mr. Lurton. The fine was paid.

A QUARREL WHILE SHAVING

Avenue Joffre Man's Differences with His Wife: A Fine for Bad Language

A sequel to domestic differences in an Avenue Joffre family was heard at the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Wednesday, when Clifford C. Elrod, tax collector, appeared before Mr. Lurton upon charges of drunkenness and using vile and obscene language.

Defendant's wife said that when he was shaving in their home at 312 Avenue Joffre, he began to abuse her, used obscene language, threatened to cut her throat and pulled her about by the hair.

The husband denied this, and said that while he was shaving his wife began to abuse him, so that he said, "What are you trying to do? Make me cut my throat?" and at that she threw back her head and told him to cut her throat.

Catherine, the 12 year-old daughter of Mrs. Elrod by her previous husband, was called and corroborated her mother's evidence.

"I find you guilty of using vile and obscene language in the presence of women," said the Commissioner addressing defendant. "I dismiss the charge of drunkenness as it has not been proved. The testimony given here of your conduct is very reprehensible, especially in the presence of a little girl like Catherine, a child of tender age in whose presence even a stranger is charged with the highest degree of care for the language he uses. While not your daughter, you are more or less a guardian over her and over her conduct. The language which it is charged you used is bad enough if spoken in the presence of men, but especially inexcusable in these circumstances. For this reason I am inclined to give you the full penalty. If this matter were just between you and your wife I might leave it for you to settle yourselves; but a third party enters into it, and the third party being a child of tender age, the law must protect the child. For this reason I give you the extreme penalty which the law imposese for an infraction of this kind, a fine of G.$25 and the costs of this action. I charge you and warn you to be more careful of your conduct in the presence of this little child.

INSP. DUNNE AND CHINESE PRESS

Summonses Against Chinese Journalists: Publishing Alleged Untrue Report

Comments in the Chinese press on the circumstances attending the death of a coolie employed at Louza police station led to the appearance of four newspaper men in the Mixed Court on Monday. Zung Poo-lai and Lee Tsung-wo ("Shanghai Journal of Commerce"), T. C. Deh and L. Chen ("Eastern Times"), and Hsu Chien-piang, alias Jabin Hsu ("Shanghai Tribune"), were summoned for having circulated certain rumours injuring the credit of Thomas Dunne, to wit, the publishing of an untrue report.

Mr. E. T. Maitland appeared to prosecute and defendants were represented by Mr. A. M. Preston, Mr. H. D. Rodger and M. Premet.

Mr. Preston explained the absence of T. C. Deh by producing a medical certificate stating that he was unwell, but the Assessor (Mr. Whitamore) said that only a certificate by the court medical officer would be accepted.

Mr. Preston then applied for an adjournment, saying that the summons was only served on Friday evening and counsel had not had time to prepare their cases.

The acting Registrar (Inspector Wheeler) informed the court that he had received a letter from M. Premet on behalf of Deh and two other defendants from which it appeared that the court's jurisdiction would be objected to, and intimating that the defendants would not appear that morning.

Mr. Preston—They are all here except Mr. Deh, and jurisdiction will be pleaded.

Defendants' names were then called out and they were ordered to step into the dock, but objected. It was submitted that they ought to be allowed to stand outside the dock, at least until the question of jurisdiction had been decided, and Mr. Rodger pointed out that the defendants were all of them Chinese business men of substance and of the highest type.

The objection was over-ruled, and the defendants went into the dock.

A remand was then asked for and granted, the court ordering that a special date be fixed for the hearing and that defendants enter into a personal bond for their appearance.

MERCHANT OFFICER'S DAMAGES

Vinogradoff's Claim of $16,000 on China Merchants Still Under Consideration

The case in which A. M. Vinogradoff was awarded the sum of $16,000 in the Mixed Court, compensation against the China Merchants S.N. Co. for serious injuries sustained through falling from an unsafe ladder in the hold of the company's steamer Haining, on board of which he was employed, has not yet run its course.

Messrs. R. E. S. Gregson and Ziar, on behalf of the defendants, made application to Mr. Ivanow, Russian Assessor, and Magistrate Yui for the judgment to be set aside, or a stay of execution granted. On behalf of the plaintiff Messrs. C. S. Franklin and Fishman opposed the application, and applied for prompt execution of the judgment. After some argument the Court adjourned and will consider its decision.

The defendants contend that the judgment in which plaintiff was awarded damages distinctly absolved the China Merchants S.N. Co., from all damage, and that being the case they failed to see why they should be ordered to pay over $16,000 damages. Plaintiff, on the other hand, pointed out that the judgment also stated quite definitely that no application for a re-hearing of the case would be considered.

ARMS SMUGGLERS IN SOOCHOW CREEK

Escape of Gun-runner Leads to Important Seizure of Contraband

A Chinese police constable on duty at Thibet Road Bridge in the early hours of Wednesday observed a fellow-countryman sauntering along with a sack slung across his shoulder, and he made it his business to inquire what the sack contained.

By way of answer, the stranger dropped his burden and ran, and a glance into the sack disclosing that it contained arms and ammunition, the policeman likewise abandoned it for the moment and gave chase. He was outdistanced, however, and returned to gather up his prize and in due course present it to the officer in charge at Louza station. Here it was found that the sack contained 10 Mauser .32 pistols, and 1,100 rounds, and eight 7.65 Mauser pistols with 800 rounds.

Det.-Sgts. Tinkler and Papp were at once sent out to investigate, and their inquiries took them aboard a sand barge lying up Thibet Road Bridge. They found one 7.65 Mauser pistol on board, and on the strength of this discovery arrested the laodah and three coolies and charged them with being concerned in smuggling fire arms and ammunition.

The four men were brought up at the Mixed Court on Wednesday and formally remanded.

Det.-Sgt. Papp, giving evidence of arrest, stated that accused told him the boats came from Woosung.

A WANDERING WIFE

And How Her Errancy Brought Three Men Into Mixed Court Two to Stay in Gaol

It is doubtful whether the erring wife who deserted her coolie husband in Hangchow realized at the time what far-reaching results her action would have, inasmuch as it led to the appearance of three men, none of whom she had probably ever seen, in the Mixed Court at Shanghai on Wednesday; two were charged with assault by the third. The latter, according to his own story, was walking peacefully along the road on Tuesday when the first accused stopped him and hurled at his head the accusation that he was living with another man's wife. He blushed (at least one hopes he did) and vociferously denied it. His accuser pondered, and then suggested that the balance of doubt which existed in his mind might be weighted with a little superfluous silver. Unhappily the party of the second instance failed to see matters in quite the same light and blows were struck. The second accused was called in by the first accused and they committed a joint assault on the third man, the battle finally being interrupted by an interfering policeman.—The first accused told the Court that the Hangchow husband had deputed him to find his wife, a task which, he explained pathetically, had cost him a considerable amount of money. The Court was duly sympathetic and offered, nay pressed upon him, free board and lodging for three months, firmly declining any refusal. The second accused, lacking the other's gift of eloquence probably, was sent to prison for one month.

THE Hotel Parisien were fined $5 by Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court on Monday for failing to have affixed to one of their motor-lorries a weight plate on the left-hand side, in accordance with the new regulation. The case was proved by P. C. Carney. Defendants failed to put in an appearance.

AN armed robbery occurred at an exchange shop at 323 North Szechuen Road shortly after 8 o'clock on Wednesday evening. Seven men entered the shop, four armed with revolvers, and intimidated the occupants. They stole the sum of $4 and then made good their escape, a constable arriving on the scene just too late.

A fine of $100 or 21 days' imprisonment was imposed by the Mixed Court last Friday upon the proprietor of the China Supply Co., of 11 Shantung Road, for counterfeiting the "Beehive" trademark. In defence, it was claimed that labels bearing the "Beehive" trademark used on inferior wool and purchased by the complainant, Messrs. Paton & Baldwin, from defendant firm were not on the wool when it left the firm, but were placed thereon by a sub-agent or broker.

"I have inspected almost all courts in the civilized world," says Judge Takaishi of the Supreme Court of Kuantung. "I did not find much difference between Japan and any continental country of Europe in this respect. But I was surprised at a new feature in the British and American courts, contrary to my anticipation that there would be too much formality." Judge Takaishi was particularly convinced with the simple manner in which a British justice dealt with law cases, by intimate conversation with a lawyer in charge. There was, however, inviolable dignity maintained by the justice, he observes. "It is a curious contrast between Japan and Germany," Judge Takaishi further remarks, "that while Japan is trying to adopt the complicated system of the jury, Germany is simplifying her judicial system to such an extent as to dispense with everything she considers superfluous, even Public Procurators."

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Mixed Court Report for July.

Ricsha Strike.—In connexion with the ricsha strike 39 persons were charged with intimidating coolies or damaging ricshas which continued to ply for hire. According to the evidence of the Police the trouble was caused by a number of ricsha owners who resented the enforcement by the Police of the regulations regarding the condition of the ricshas, which in many instances were below the standard required; the sentences passed ranged from 2 days' to 4 months' imprisonment.

Registration in Foreign Consulates:—On July 14, Dzung Tshung Kyi (陳椿記) was arrested on a warrant in Foreign Civil Case No. 5929 and brought before the Court to plead to jurisdiction; defendant claimed to be a Portuguese born in Macao, where he said he had lived until 15 years of age. Counsel for plaintiff alleged that defendant was a well known Shanghai man, that he was born at Ningpo, that he had appeared before this Court on previous occasions as a Chinese citizen and that he was not registered in the Portuguese Consulate prior to the cause of action. The defendant was unable to understand a single word of Cantonese when placed in the witness box, and as a result the Court decided to release the defendant on bond and directed counsel to take up the question of nationality with the Consular Body but, as the case was afterwards withdrawn, no further action was taken in the matter.

Foreign Civil Cases — Indian money lenders, apparently dissatisfied with the decision given by Court in many cases, that defendant should pay off his debt by small monthly instalments, have engaged counsel to appear for them when suing for quite small amounts such as $40. The Court has then ordered petitions to be filed and if this practice increases it may be necessary to appoint a special Court with an extra Assessor to deal with British Civil Cases.

113 petitions were filed during the month, an increase of 41, leaving 39 cases on the hearing list, which is a decrease of 14 on last month's figures; of these, 10 cases only are awaiting a first hearing.

Chinese Civil Cases:—A decision which has aroused some controversy was given in the case of A. M. Vinogradoff v. the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company tried before Messrs. Ivanow and Tsang, and later by Magistrate Yui. Plaintiff claimed Tls. 45,000 for injuries sustained as the result of a fall from a wooden ladder on board the s.s. Shin Ming on which he was employed as 2nd Officer.

The Court in giving judgment said that the plaintiff in the capacity of 2nd officer should know whether the ladder was safe or not and it was partly through his own negligence that he had fallen down and sustained injuries for which no blame could be attached to defendants, but in view of the fact that the fall occurred while plaintiff was carrying out his duties and that he had been permanently injured he should be paid $16,000 which amount would include his salary and medical expenses.

The Court considered it necessary to give an opinion that the case could not be considered as a precedent and further that the judgment was final and that the Court would not consider any application for rehearing.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury. S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

League Matches Uninteresting: S.C.C. "A" Team Win: Gunners and Recs. Draw

Results:—

S.C.C. "A" 190; S.C.C. "B" 72
An S.C.C. Team 101; Police 46

Chief interest in Saturday's cricket was centred in the two League games, between the Shanghai Recreation Club and the Machine Gunners on the S.C.C. ground, and between the S.C.C. "A" and "B" teams on the ground of the S.R.C. In neither case was expectation justified, for the Recs.-Gunners' match was spoiled by overcaution and the other game was too one-sided to be of any real interest.

South Africa Easily Defeated by Kent: Centuries by Woolley and Hardinge

Aug. 23.

The match between the South Africans and Kent opened to-day in fine weather. The wicket was good.

Kent had scored 385 for five wickets when rain fell and stumps were drawn just before 6 o'clock.

Woolley, who made 176, is the first to complete 2,000 runs this season. His innings lasted 160 minutes and included four sixes and 15 fours. Hardinge knocked up 118 in 220 minutes. His score also included 15 fours.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 25.

The match between the South Africans and Kent was resumed to-day and resulted in a win for Kent by an innings and 89 runs.

The weather was fine and the wicket good. Kent brought their score from 385 for five to 418 for six and then declared. Woolley contributed 176, Hardinge 118, and Knott 63.

The South Africans made 135 (Wright taking 5 for 39) and, following on, scored 194. Freeman took 6 for 68.

Scores:—Kent 418 (for 6 wickets declared); South Africans 135 and 194.—Reuter.

Somerset v. South Africans

Taunton, Aug. 27.

The match between the South Africans and Somerset opened here to-day in fine weather. The wicket was easy.

Somerset scored 208, McBryan contributing 59 and Blanckenberg taking 6 wickets for 76.

The Africans had scored 140 for 4 when stumps were drawn, Catterall being 78 not out.—Reuter.

County Championship Results

London, Aug. 22.

Owing to intermittent heavy rain throughout the matches, only one was completed.

At Lord's, Kent beat Middlesex on the first innings.

Middlesex scored 133 (Wright taking 6 for 38) and 334, Dalas knocking up a century, and Hendren 79. Kent made 165, Woolley contributing 95, and 3 for 0.

At Nottingham, Notts defeated Northamptonshire on the first innings.

Northamptonshire made 242 and 49 for 3. Notts declared at 249 for 9.

Sussex scored 148 and 153. Surrey made 358, Shepherd registering 111 and Sandham 71.

Essex had scored 29 for 1 wicket when the game was abandoned.

At Manchester, the match between Lancashire and Gloucestershire was also drawn.

Lancashire had scored 26 for 0 wicket when rain intervened.

There was no play at Cardiff in the match between Glamorgan and Somerset.

At Harrogate, the match between Yorkshire and Hampshire resulted in a draw.

Yorkshire declared at 291 for 2 (Oldroyo scoring 122 and Leyland a century). Hampshire made 137 for 7.

London, Aug. 26.

At Leicester, Sussex beat Leicestershire by an innings and 95 runs. Leicestershire scored 113 and 45 (A. E. R. Gilligan taking 6 for 24). Sussex made 253, Bowley contributing 74.

At Bristol, Gloucestershire defeated Middlesex by 61 runs. Gloucestershire made 31 (Haig taking 6 for 11 and Durston the other 4 for 18), but declared at 294 for 9 in their second. Hammond scored 174 not out. Middlesex got 74 (Parker taking 7 for 30) and 190 (Parker again accounting for 7, for 101). Parker performed the hat-trick in each innings, making the fifth hat-trick in first-class cricket this season.

At Nottingham, Notts beat Warwickshire by an innings and 56 runs. Warwickshire scored 130 and 137. Notts declared at 323 for 5 (Whysall 137).

The match between Lancashire and Hampshire at Manchester resulted in a draw. Lancashire had made 79 for 0 wicket when the match had to be abandoned owing to rain.

At the Oval, Surrey defeated Yorkshire by 109 runs. Surrey scored 209 (Kilner taking 5 for 58) and 202 (Kilner again taking 5 wickets, for 95). Yorkshire made 100 (Sadler taking 5 for 29 and Fender 3 for 7) and 202 (Sadler again accounting for 5, for 42, while Fender took the other 5 for 45).

At Leyton, the match between Essex and Northamptonshire was drawn. Northamptonshire made 351 (Douglas taking 5 for 73). Essex had scored 328 for 6 (Freeman 120) when stumps were drawn.

FRENCH DEBATE ON LONDON PACT

Uneasiness in Chamber and Senate on Security of Hold on German Armaments

Paris, Aug. 22.

The Chamber of Deputies to-day began the debate on M. Herriot's statement.

Although there is no doubt that the Premier will obtain a substantial majority, there is the prospect of a series of long speeches in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate and thus the discussion will probably not end before the middle of next week at the earliest.

Later.

At the resumption of the debate, M. Herriot stated that Mr. MacDonald's letter regarding the evacuation of the Ruhr was handed to him in London before the pact was concluded, before Mr. MacDonald's speech and before the Ruhr question was settled.

M. Herriot pointed out that the Germans and the French submitted their own points of view on the Ruhr question and Mr. MacDonald quite rightly submitted the British point of view, therefore it was unjust to interpret Mr. MacDonald's action as a wrongful proceeding or a disavowal of the agreements reached in London.

Aug. 23.

In the course of the debate in the Chamber of Deputies on M. Herriot's statement, the Socialist, M. Blum, expressed the opinion that the Conference marked the condemnation of the occupation of the Ruhr and the bankruptcy of Poincarism. He declared that the Premier had brought back peace with honour.

M. Briand thought that the real danger lay in the cessation of control over the armaments of Germany. He regarded the renewal of contact with Germany as a guarantee of peace on which he congratulated M. Herriot.

General Nollet, in reply to a deputy who feared the possibility of the evacuation of the Rhineland, said that control over the Essen factories would continue after the evacuation of the Ruhr and would only be abandoned after the Control Commissions had surrendered their powers.

The sitting adjourned at 2.15 this morning for a few hours only.

Later.

On the resumption of the debate in the Chamber of Deputies, M. Herriot, intervening,—asked the Chamber to take into account the attitude of Britain, who had largely opposed execution of the Dawes plan owing to fear of unemployment.

Replying to a Deputy later, M. Herriot said that it was not exact to say that the French Government had undertaken to communicate to the British Government all details of commercial negotiations between France and Germany. M. Herriot explained that the principles of such a commercial agreement had been agreed upon in London and he had so informed the British Government.

General Nollet remarked that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald had undertaken that, if Germany by a certain time had not satisfied the Commission of Control under the Dawes scheme, Britain would join France and her Allies in compelling Germany to carry out the Treaty of Versailles.

M. Herriot said that an agreement between Germany and the Allies was indispensable in order to avoid economic conflict.

The sitting then adjourned.

Aug. 24.

The Chamber of Deputies, after an all-night sitting, passed a vote of confidence in the Government by 336 votes to 204.

The House adjourned at five this morning until to-morrow afternoon. —Reuter.

Chamber's Vote of Confidence.

Paris, Aug. 24.

The motion of confidence in the Government passed by the Chamber of Deputies this morning congratulates the Government "on securing recognition of the principle of arbitration in the London Agreement, thereby enabling the negotiators to arrive at a practical and peaceful solution of the reparations problem in a wide spirit of international co-operation and concord." The Chamber trusts that the Government will "pursue in the course of the coming conference on inter-Allied debts and also at the League of Nations the working of justice and peace which must assure simultaneously the security of France and the restoration of Europe."

French Duty on German Imports

Paris, Aug. 25.

M. Herriot announced in the Chamber of Deputies to-day that a plan for subjecting German imports into France to a levy of 26 per cent. similar to the British levy was under consideration. A German merchant would receive 74 per cent. of the price from the French importer and the remainder from the Agent for Reparations.—Reuter.

M. Poincare's Objection to Premature Abandonment of German Pledges

Paris, Aug. 26.

The Senate to-day approved the London Conference decisions by 204 votes to 40.

M. Poincaré's contribution to the discussion in the Senate on the London reparations agreement was largely devoted to a defence of his previous police. He declared that France accepted the Dawes scheme because it conduced to re-establishment of the inter-Allied Entente and was more advantageous than the Bonar Law scheme.

The ex-Premier admitted that the Dawes scheme allowed for an increase of the German debt, left the Reparations Commission free to establish defaults, and commercialized the German debt, but he objected to the abandonment of pledges before the promises were carried out.

M. Poincaré spoke for two hours before opening fire on M. Herriot's work in London. He then bitterly denounced the military evacuation of the Ruhr, which, he declared, ought not to be effected until the Dawes bonds had been marketed. M. Poincaré declared that another disadvantage of the evacuation was the reaction on inter-Allied debts. He explained that his idea had been to exchange certain annuities and the Ruhr pledge for an abatement of the inter-Allied debts.

As regards the question of security, the ex-Premier said that if France had the Spithead fleet in the Ruhr she would be much easier in mind, but as things were it was impossible to admit evacuation of Cologne next January

In conclusion, M. Poincaré asserted that the structure built in London rested on shifting sand in relying on German good faith.

A Verbal Duel.

When M. Heriot rose to reply to M. Poincaré, the latter constantly interrupted. The proceedings developed into a keen, contentious verbal duel, between the protagonists of the two policies.

The Premier said in conclusion that grave problems remained to be settled. He would not make rash promises, but asked the House to choose between isolated action and inter-Allied co-operation.

The motion, which was carried, expressed confidence in the Government to pursue execution of the London Agreement and to obtain the necessary guarantee of security and a satisfactory settlement of inter-Allied debts.—Reuter.

FEELING RUNS HIGH IN GERMANY

Industry and Commerce for London Agreement but Politicians Divided

Berlin, Aug. 22.

A meeting of executives of several big industralists' and merchants' associations to-day passed a resolution by 100 votes to 3 recommending the adoption of the London Agreement.

There were stormy scenes at the re-assembly of the Reichstag to-day. A Communist demanded immediate discussion of the Communist motions as being "more important than the Government declaration on the surrender of the German people to international capital," and also immediate dissolution and a plebiscite on the Dawes report.

Herr Marx was prevented from beginning his statement on the London conference by prolonged Communist shrieks of "Amnesty to political prisoners." The President was ultimately obliged to adjourn the sitting and suspend the Communist, Herr Schwarz, for 20 sittings.

Herr Schwarz was still in his seat at the resumption of the sitting, which the President again adjourned till to-morrow, saying that the standing orders did not authorize forcible removal of a deputy.

Tribute to Mr. MacDonald.

Aug. 23.

Herr Marx read his statement on the London Conference to-day in the Reichstag which an uproar prevented him from delivering yesterday, the Communist Deputy, Herr Schwarz, who was the main cause of the disturbance, having been excluded. The Chancellor was frequently interrupted by the ironical laughter of the Nationalists.

Herr Marx paid a tribute to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's impartiality at the London Conference. He said that the decisions of the Conference would undoubtedly seriously burden Germany but they marked progress as compared with the present state of affairs. The Chancellor said that the Government did not consider the settlement as final, but would do its utmost to effect a speedy evacuation of the Ruhr and the other sanction areas. In conclusion Herr Marx declared that the Reichstag was confronted with a terrible responsibility. Its decision would either be a blessing or a curse to Germany.

Foreign Minister's Fighting Speech.

Dr. Stresemann, in a fighting speech, strongly criticized the action of the Nationalists, and declared that regarding the forthcoming commercial negotiations between France and Germany no sort of secret agreement existed.

The evacuation of Offenburg and Appenweier, the Foreign Minister went on to say, constituted a great success for the German Delegation, and vouched for M. Herriot's character. He did not believe that London was the final goal, but it might prove the beginning of a movement resulting in the collaboration of all nations.

The speech was received with loud cheers by the Socialists and the centre, and with hisses by the Communists and extreme Nationalists.—Reuter.

Probability of Dawes Bills Being Passed

Berlin, Aug. 24.

As a result of the statements of the members of the German Delegation to the London Conference in the Reichstag, a swing of opinion among the moderate section of the German National Party is noticeable. There is now a prospect of the Dawes Bills finding the necessary majority in the Reichstag this week and of the London Protocol being signed on Thursday.—Reuter.

The Reichstag Debate

Berlin, Aug. 25.

The Reichstag to-day began the debate on the Pact of London. Herr Hergt, on behalf of the German National Party, declared that the Party disapproved of the Pact and would therefore oppose all Bills connected with it.—Reuter.

Three Communists Suspended for Disorderly Conduct: Forcibly Ejected

Berlin, Aug. 27.

It is officially announced that the Reichstag will be dissolved in the event of rejection of the London Pact, which, however, will be signed in any case by the Government on August 30.

Later.

A free fight occurred this morning in the Reichstag between the Communists and the Democrats. One of the latter was struck in the face by a Communist and this led to a general mêlée. A tremendous uproar ensued in which the public joined.

The President tried in vain to restore order, but finally left the House and suspended the sitting for a short time.

Later.

There was an exciting sequel to this morning's disturbance in the Reichstag. At the resumption of the sitting the President, Herr Wallraff, ordered the suspension of three Communists. The latter declined to depart and Herr Wallraff dramatically ordered the clearance of the public galleries while the recalcitrant members were forcibly ejected. Twenty-five detectives trooped into the Chamber and were greeted with ironical laughter and the singing of the International by the Communists. The culprits finally departed peaceably.

Later.

The second reading of the Dawes Bills was passed to-day. The decisive reading has been postponed till August 29, when very close voting is clearly foreshadowed.

Aug. 28.

The bill ratifying the Pact of London passed the second reading in the Reichstag by 248 votes to 175. The various bills carrying out the Dawes plan, except the Railways Bill, passed their second readings by similar majorities.

The extreme Nationalists and Communists alone are opposing the Railways Bill, involving an amendment to the Constitution. It requires a two-thirds majority, which it failed to obtain.

The decisive division is expected to-day or to-morrow when the Reichstag will vote on the eight Dawes bills together with a covering bill authorizing signature of the London Agreement, as the whole two-thirds majority will then be required.—Reuter.

British Army on the Rhine.

Cologne, Aug. 27.

It is announced that the War Office has ordered the suspension of all new works performed by the Royal Engineers in connexion with military requirements, except emergency repairs.—Reuter.

Pact to Be Signed To-morrow.

London, Aug. 28.

According to present arrangements the Pact of London will be signed at the Foreign Office at noon on Saturday. Sir Eyre Crowe will sign on behalf of Britain, while the Allies and Germany will be represented by their respective Ambassadors and Ministers.

It is understood that the German Government has signified its intention of signing even if the Reichstag fails to pass the legislation involved by the necessary two-thirds majority.—Reuter.

Germany's Revival

Tokyo, Aug. 26.

Interviewed by press representatives, Dr. Solf, German Ambassador to Japan, who returned to his post here yesterday from his country, where he has been for some time past on furlough, stated, in part:—

"The revival of Germany is wonderfully striking. Though I am not in a position to remark on the London Conference, it may be safely said that the Dawes plan is not only desirable as a relief-measure for Germany, but also a thing which is capable of leading the whole of Europe to a new hope."—Eastern News Agency.

TREATY OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

Important Reservations by the French Government: Security Before Disarmament

Paris, Aug. 26.

The Government has issued an official statement on its views with regard to the Treaty of Mutual Assistance, which will be discussed at the forthcoming Assembly of the League of Nations. It says that, while desirous of following the traditional policy of France to support the League, the French Government is willing to approve the Pact only so far as it may be consistent with her desire to ensure her security and the reduction of armaments, but the Government will not consent in any circumstances to participate in a conference for reduction of armaments without a preliminary guarantee of security.

In any case, the question of reduction of French armaments might be more suitably discussed by the French Parliament. The statement justifies the Treaties entered into by France for her own security and makes a number of suggestions for improving the terms of the Treaty.—Reuter.

U. S. AND REPARATIONS COMMISSION

Permanent Agent-General

London, Aug. 26.

It is stated that the Reparations Commission is inviting Mr. Seymour Lewis, a New York lawyer, to accept the appointment of permanent Agent-General of the Reparations Commission. Mr. Lewis was formerly Under-Secretary of the Treasury in Washington during the Administrations of President Wilson and President Harding. Meanwhile Mr. Owen Young is acting as Agent-General, and hopes to have the office machinery working within three months.—Reuter.

Pres. Coolidge's Views That They Must Await Settlement of Reparations Problem

Plymouth, Vt., Aug. 22.

It is intimated that President Coolidge considers that inquiries of foreign nations with regard to war debts due to America should await the complete settlement of the reparations problem.—Reuter's American Service.

General Pershing's Advocacy of Part Cancellation

Washington, Aug. 24.

General Pershing, in a speech at Denver, said that part of the American loans to the Allies should be cancelled because the Allies were holding the Boche back while America, after entering the war, was preparing.—Reuter's American Service.

Funding of Poland's War Debts

Warsaw, Aug. 26.

The Premier has instructed the Minister at Washington to conclude the funding of the Polish debt amounting to £25,000,000.

It has also been decided to commence negotiations shortly for funding the debt to Great Britain.—Reuter.

THE LABOUR-SOVIET AGREEMENT

Looked Upon in Moscow as a Basis for Future Foreign Relations

Moscow, Aug. 21.

The plenary session of the Moscow Soviet to-day unanimously passed a resolution thanking the Delegation to London for their efforts with regard to the Anglo-Soviet Agreement and instructing the Government in future negotiations never to agree to terms which place a new burden of taxation on the workers of Soviet Russia.

M. Rakovsky, in a speech, contended that the Agreement did not infringe the laws of the Soviet with regard to nationalization and annulment of debts, while Soviet Russia had only to pay claims which were recognized as advantageous to itself or for which social justice demanded compensation. He predicted ratification of the Treaty because otherwise property-owners and bond-holders would get nothing.

M. Chicherin, who was greeted by the whole audience rising and shouting "Long live our Red diplomacy," described the Treaty as the basis of future relations with other foreign countries. He said that it would help to consolidate the international situation of the Soviet whilst affirming the principles of the Bolshevik revolution.

Miss Susan Lawrence, M.P., received an ovation when she greeted the Moscow Soviet on behalf of British Labour. She said that the Agreement was welcomed enthusiastically and urged the two peoples to work closely together.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 24.

The Grand Duke Cyril, heir-presumptive to the Russian throne, has issued a protest against the Anglo-Russian Treaty, and warned subscribers that the loan will not be recognized in the event of Imperial restoration.—Reuter.

RUSSIA'S CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION

Injuries and Losses Owing to "Foreign Intervention"

Moscow, Aug. 27.

Interviewed with regard to claims of Russians for compensation for personal injury or loss of property as a result of "foreign intervention" in Russia, M. Chicherin emphasized the importance of such claims in any future negotiations of the Soviet Government with Great Britain and other foreign Powers which participated in the intervention and are responsible for its consequences.—Reuter.

SOVIET INSULTS TO BRITAIN

Charge d'Affaires in Moscow Set About by Spies and Practically a Prisoner

London, Aug. 22.

There is considerable discussion in London with regard to the reported humiliating treatment of Mr. R. M. Hodgson, the British Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow. It is learned in well informed circles that the report that Mr. Hodgson is practically a prisoner is incorrect, but that spies infest the British Mission, rendering it very difficult for Russians to have any continuous relations with the Mission.

The attention of M. Rakovsky has been called to this matter and it is hoped that he will make a representation in this connexion to Moscow which will lead to an improvement of conditions.—Reuter.

AN INSURRECTION IN AFGHANISTAN

A Pretender to the Throne: Soviet Treachery Towards Great Britain

London, Aug. 21.

Reuter's Agency learns that a Ghilzai tribe under a pretender to the Afghan throne is operating in Khost and has captured Altimur, a minor pass leading to India. The Amir is returning to Kabul.

Russian newspapers during the past fortnight have been full of anti-British propaganda asserting that British agents formented the insurection in Afghanistan.

According to Reuter's correspondent at Riga, the "Izvestia," the Soviet official organ, appeals to British workers for their support against "British Oriental aggression" and alleges that the insurrection in Afghanistan is a blow directed against the Soviet.—Reuter.

Fanatical Mullahs Backed by Soviet

London, Aug. 22.

Connexion between Moscow propaganda and the outbreak of revolutionary activities in Afghanistan has been clearly established, says the Political Observer of the "Daily Telegraph," who adds that it is remarkable that in their desire to harm the British Empire, the Bolsheviks are ready to support the most reactionary elements in Oriental countries.

The Persian Monarchists, the writer goes on, were supported by the Soviet envoy in Teheran in their successful offensive against the Democrats and Republicans simply for the reason that the latter's sympathies were pro-British.

The present outbreak in Afghanistan is led by fanatical mullahs, who resent the clearly-expressed tendency of the Amir's Government to dissociate secular affairs from religious influences. These fanatics, according to the writer, are supported with advice and money by the Soviet Agent in Kabul and propagandists beyond the Bokhara border.—Reuter.

Simla, Aug. 22.

In response to a request from Kabul, two British æroplanes from Peshawar with an Afghan officer on board, have been sent to Kabul with a view to purchase by the Amir's Government.—Reuter.

Situation Improving In Spite of Bolshevik Efforts to Embroil Britain

Peshawar, Aug. 22.

Improvement is reported in the situation at Khost. The Afghan rebels are still in possession of Altimur Pass, but have been driven off the main Kabul-Ghazni road.

It is pointed out here that the Bolshevik assertion that the British are supporting the rebels can only be credited by those who are not aware of the close Anglo-Afghan relations.—Reuter.

SWARAJIST OBSTRUCTION IN BENGAL

Ministers' Salaries Rejected in Legislative Council by Small Majority

Calcutta, Aug. 26.

The Bengal Legislative Council has again rejected the Ministers' salaries by 68 votes to 66.

The Swarajists rejected Ministers' salaries in the Legislative Council on March 24. Lord Lytton, the Governor of Bengal, then proposed again to submit the votes to the Legislative Council in July, but the Swarajists obtained an injunction of the High Court to disallow the motion, after which Lord Olivier, the Secretary of State for India, sanctioned the amendment of the rules governing the procedure of the Legislative Assembly and Provincial Legislatures, whereby estimates could be re-submitted to the Legislatures.

It was recently intimated officially that in the event of the rejection of Ministers' salaries, the Administration would be carried on without Ministers.—Reuter.

Resignation of Ministers: The Governor Assuming Charge of their Departments

Calcutta, Aug. 27.

The President of the Legislative Council to-day announced the prorogation of the Council sine die, The Swarajists greeted the announcement with prolonged cheering.

A communiqué explains that the prorogation is the logical consequence of yesterday's proceedings, when the Legislative Council again rejected the Minister's salaries.

Lord Lytton, the Governor of Bengal, will henceforth assume charge of the transferred departments, the Ministers of which have resigned.

The communiqué adds that until the Constitution is restored the Council will only be summoned when it is required to transact Government business.—Reuter.

ROUND-THE-WORLD AIR FLIGHTS

American Aviators Arrive in Greenland: Italians Meet with Misfortune

Reykjavik, Aug. 21.

The American world-fliers, Captain Smith and Lieut. Nelson, and the Italian world-flier, Signor Locatelli, departed for Greenland to-day in splendid weather. Captain Smith left at 7.08, Lieut. Nelson at 7.10 and Signor Locatelli at 7.21 in the morning. When they passed the convoy warship Richmond, 80 minutes later, Signor Locatelli was five miles ahead.—Reuter.

Halifax, Nova Scotia, Aug. 21.

According to wireless received from Frederiksdal, Greenland, the American aviators, Captain Smith and Lieutenant Nelson, arrived this evening. The message does not mention Signor Locatelli.—Reuter.

Severe Battle with Dense Fog

New York, Aug. 22.

The American airmen battled with a dense fog during the last miles of their journey to Greenland. They landed under very dangerous conditions. Captain Smith accomplished the 800-mile flight in 9 hours 55 minutes.

Signor Locatelli is still missing. Two American men-of-war which are on the spot have been ordered to search east of Cape Farewell.

Aug. 23.

Lieutenant Smith reports that an aeroplane was heard by inhabitants in Greenland after the second American machine had landed and that Esquimaux are searching for Signor Locatelli. The cruisers, Richmond and Raleigh, and the Danish steamer, Island Falk, will continue cruising, using searchlights at night and smoke-clouds in the daytime as a guide for Signor Locatelli.

Later.

While three American cruisers are cautiously beating the coast outside the ice-rim near Cape Farewell for Signor Locatelli, two messages from Admiral Magruder indicate the possibility that Signor Locatelli has landed in an isolated Greenland fjord.

Admiral Magruder declares his intention of remaining as long as there is the slightest hope of finding Signor Locatelli, and has summoned a tanker to replenish the oilfuel of the cruisers.

Lieutenant Marescalchi, who made the preliminary arrangements for Signor Locatelli in Iceland, is suffering tortures of suspense. He says that, if the aeroplane has been forced to alight at sea, the fliers are safe, as the machine is seaworthy and of an all-metal construction and is supplied with food and water for six to ten days. Lieutenant Marescalchi believes that two pilots and two mechanics are on board. He says that the chief danger is that the aviators may have crashed in a mountain fog or have been wrecked by ice if forced down in rough water.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Aug. 24.

The American aviators in Greenland believe that Signor Locatelli, on his hop from Iceland, failed to penetrate the fog and that he has not gone past Cape Farewell. The search is continuing, including a flight to Ivigtit as soon as the fog permits.—Reuter's American Service.

Victoria, Aug. 24.

The British world-fliers are the guests of the naval officers in Esquimalt. Squadron-Leader Maclaren, in an interview, said that his experience had convinced him that certain portions of the world flight were feasible for regular aeroplane trade routes, but the monsoons in the Far East and especially in Indo-China rendered flying there undependable.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Aug. 24.

The Air Service announces that the airmen Capt. Smith and Lieut. Nelson arrived at Ivigtut to-day after a flight of two and a quarter hours.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 24.

The cruiser Raleigh has sent a message saying that she picked up Signor Locatelli and his companions, all of whom are well, at midnight, in Latitude 59 degrees 56 min., Longitude 39 degrees 48 min.

Later.

A despatch from the cruiser Richmond states that Signor Locatelli was picked up by her 125 miles east of Cape Farewell, after the Raleigh had sighted the aeroplane.

Motor trouble forced the Italian airman to alight on the water last Thursday. Unable to ascend again, he drifted 100 miles. He and his companions are uninjured, but are worn out by fatigue.

The aeroplane will be destroyed in accordance with Signor Locatelli's wish.—Reuter.

The Flight Abandoned.

New York, Aug. 25.

It is learned that Signor Locatelli has definitely abandoned his attempt at world flight.

The U.S.S. Richmond found him in the nick of time.

Signor Locatelli after his forced descent made many unsuccessful attempts to rise from the water. He had plenty of gasoline, but the elevators were damaged. Subsequently his machine was buffeted by the winds and waves and began to break up. Dense fog and intense cold added to the airmen's troubles, and they drifted helplessly until picked up.—Reuter's American Service.

An Eleventh-hour Rescue

London, Aug. 27.

Details now available indicate that Signor Locatelli had a very narrow escape.

Reuter's New York correspondent telegraphs that the cruiser Richmond was going out to sea following a fruitless search of the Greenland ice pack, when suddenly flares were observed at midnight. The ship played its searchlights for half an hour before it picked up the aeroplane, which had drifted westward of the probable search zone. The discovery, therefore, was almost a miracle. The fliers had sent up rockets every two hours until their supply had almost been exhausted. It was one of the last which was seen on board the Richmond.

Signor Locatelli says that his original trouble developed 7½ hours after leaving Reykjavik owing to water in the motor. He believed that he could make Fredericksdal, but the fog was so thick that he decided to alight, effect repairs and await clearer weather. He came down unexpectedly, however, in a rough sea. The descent loosened two of the engine supports. After that the mechanics were prostrated by seasickness, and the turbulent weather prevented the machine from taking off again.—Reuter.

Major Zanni's New Machine

Tokio, Aug. 22.

Major Zanni will continue his flight with the spare plane which arrived in Kobe to-day on board the Kamo Maru from London. It will be immediately trans-shipped, probably by the Wakasa Maru, from Kobe to-morrow and will reach Haiphong, to which place Major Zanni has ordered it to be sent, within a fortnight. These plans were announced by Senor Garcia Uriburu, the Argentine Minister in Tokio, who to-day received a cable from Major Zanni informing him of the plane's whereabouts and asking for urgent shipment to Haiphong. Major Zanni cabled: "The plane crashed but I am determined to continue."

Senor Patricio Murphy, Major Zanni's advance agent, who is waiting at Tientsin for orders, has been directed to continue the laying out of the route via Mukden, Pyengyang, Taiku, Hiroshima, Osaka and Tokorozawa.

Whether the trans-Pacific flight will be attempted will not be settled till Major Zanni arrives in Tokio, but Senor Uriburu, Japanese officials and the American Air officers, who assisted the flight of the American airmen, are of the opinion that the season is too late.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, Aug. 23.

Major Zanni's spare plane has arrived at Kobe, but trans-shipment to Haiphong is being delayed owing to a suitable vessel not being available, the Wakasa Maru being too small. The Argentine Minister is invoking the assistance of shippers at Tokyo and Hongkong to provide transport.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, Aug. 26.

Major Zanni's spare plane will be sent to Hongkong to-morrow on board the President Madison. From Hongkong the plane will be shipped to Haiphong by the Chukwa Maru.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A COVENT GARDEN STRIKE

Thousands of Tons of Fruit and Vegetables Held Up at the Docks

London, Aug. 21.

The strike of the porters of Covent Garden for an increase in wages, which has been in progress for a week, is becoming worse. The Transportworkers' Union has instructed dockers not to handle supplies intended for Covent Garden with the result that many thousands of tons of fruit and vegetables are being held up at the docks in London and other ports. Covent Garden employers, on the ground that the men struck without warning, refused an invitation to visit the Ministry of Labour with a view to conciliation and also declined a suggestion made by Mr. Bevin, the men's leader, for a meeting under an independent chairman.

The National Union of Railwaymen has decided to co-operate if necessary with the Transportworkers' Union in stopping the cross-channel supply of fruit and vegetables for Covent Garden.—Reuter.

RED VIEWS OF JAPAN AND AMERICA

U. S. Supposed to Be in Fear of a Russo-Japanese Agreement

Moscow, Aug. 22.

An article in the "Izvestia" asserts that America fears a Russo-Japanese agreement which would create difficulties for American diplomacy in the Far East. Therefore, instead of the recent "knout blow" delivered by America in the shape of the American Exclusion Bill, Mr. Hughes now offers a cake in the form of a loan to Japan with which he hopes to purchase Japan's refusal to come to terms with Soviet Russia, "but the Japanese would prefer to refuse American sweetmeats since it is evident that in future the American knout will be frequently used on Japan, which, by the irony of fate, is made America's rival on the route to the shores of Far Eastern Asia". —Reuter.

BLESSINGS OF DEMOCRACY

A Greek Naval Intrigue

Athens, Aug. 23.

It is semi-officially announced that in consequence of an insubordinate telegram from Captain Colialexis of the cruiser Averoff, the entire fleet has been ordered to be disarmed and the crews given indefinite leave. It is stated that if Captain Colialexis does not obey the order severe measures will be taken against him.

It appears that Captain Colialexis protested against a decision to reinstate officers who had resigned and hinted that the Government favoured a movement against Captain Hadjikyriakos, the former Minister of Marine, in order to facilitate their advent to power.

Later.

Owing to the intervention of Captain Hadjikyriakos, Captain Colialexis and his partisans have yielded and the grave consequences of their action have thereby been averted.—Reuter.

MURDERS IN HONDURAS

British and American Subjects

Washington, Aug. 22.

The State Department learns that an American, George Hamilton, and a British subject, Charles Limmer, were killed in the Puerto Castilla district, Honduras, yesterday morning.—Reuter's American Service.

1,000 KINDS OF POISON GAS NOW FOUND

League of Nations' Report on Terrors of Chemical War-Waging

Paris, Aug. 23.

A report on the dangers of chemical warfare drawn up by a League of Nations sub-committee concludes that, while poison-gas is still a real danger, the risk of wholesale slaughter by means of microbes is not likely in the near future. This is deduced from detailed statements by leading experts of the world, who agree on the difficulty of spreading microbes and the efficiency of preventatives.

On the contrary, the report declares, poison gases are still a terrible menace. Thirty were known at the outbreak of the war but now a thousand have been discovered. Stress is laid on the general ignorance of people of the possibilities of poison-gas warfare against civilians.—Reuter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND DRUG CONTROL

Outline of Schemes to Be Submitted to World Conference

London, Aug. 27.

A meeting of the League of Nations Advisory Committee on Opium Traffic, at Geneva, dealing with the programme of the World Conference on Drug Control, which will be held in November, considered five schemes submitted by Great Britain, the United States, France, the Netherlands and the League Council respectively.

Finally, Holland acquiesced in the agreement reached between Great Britain and the United States, after which the other countries concurred, but the French representative declined to accept the scheme as a draft agreement, reserving the right to oppose it when it comes before the League Assembly shortly.

The scheme contains two main points which America considers essential: (1) that each country shall state its medicinal and scientific requirements in opium, and (2) restriction of production within the limits of these requirements and the establishment of a central board to apply this principle throughout opium-producing and consuming countries.

Sir John Jordan, on behalf of Britain, submitted the suggestion that the quantity of Indian opium exported to States regulating opium-smoking should be reduced by 10 per cent. a year for 10 years, and that the Governments of Japan and Siam and of Powers with possessions in the Far East should be requested to reduce their consumption of opium at the same rate; but the suggestion was opposed by Mr. Campbell on behalf of India, and so it will not appear as a resolution.—Reuter.

THE KU KLUX KLAN

Vigorously Denounced by Mr. John W. Davis

Washington, Aug. 24.

In the second speech of his Presidential campaign, Mr. John W. Davis flatly denounced the Ku Klux Klan and challenged President Coolidge to do likewise. Senator La Follette has already done so. Mr. Davis thus ignored the opinion of the majority of the Democratic Convention against condemning the Klan by name in the Party programme.

General Charles G. Dawes, the Republican Vice-Presidential candidate, opening his campaign in Maine, met the challenge of Mr. Davis by denouncing the Klan although less severely.—Reuter's American Service.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF TEXAS

Large Majority for Lady Candidate in Primary Election

Ballas, Aug. 24.

The primary election to the Governorship of Texas appears to have resulted in a large majority for Mrs. Miriam Ferguson, known as "Ma" Ferguson, the anti-Ku Klux Klan candidate.

Though many districts have not yet reported election results, Mrs. Ferguson's supporters claim that she has won by 75,000 to 100,000 votes over her principal opponent, Judge Robertson, who is believed to be pro-Klan.

Both Mrs. Ferguson and Judge Robertson are Democrats, and in this Democratic stronghold success in the primary election is regarded as tantamount to election, as no effective Republican opposition may be expected in the final election.—Reuter's American Service.

AUSTRALIA AND THE SOUTH PACIFIC

Defence Impracticable Without Naval Base Such as Singapore

Sydney, Aug. 24.

Mr. W. M. Hughes, the former Australian Premier, interviewed today on his return from America said that the American view of the Pacific question was one of defence of the North Pacific and Hawaii. The problem of the defence of the Pacific, as a whole, was not within the sphere of the practical politics of the United States.

The Pacific question to Australia, Mr. Hughes declared, meant the defence of the South Pacific extending northward to the mainland of Asia. It was his opinion that the defence of that area could not be contemplated without reference to the Singapore base, which the British Government had decided against, but he thought that circumstances in this connexion would prove too strong, and added that when a thing must be done, a declaration of intention not to do it was futile.—Reuter.

TRADE UNION REVOLT IN BRITAIN

National Minority Movement Against Present Leaders: Reds Still at Work

London, Aug. 24.

A Conference held here to-day under the auspices of the Red Trade Union International, which was attended by 200 British delegates from unemployment committees, trade unions. etc., decided to create an organization called the "National Minority Movement," in order to pursue the work of organizing a minority movement within various industries as against the present Trade Union leaders.

One speaker at the Conference declared that, to be successful, the international movement against capital must include Asiatic workers, even Chinese.—Reuter.

TWO NEW DESTROYERS, FOR HOLLAND

Acceptance of British Firm's Design: To be Built in Dutch Yards

The Hague, Aug. 24.

It is understood that the Ministry of Marine has decided to build two new destroyers. The work will be carried out in Dutch yards, but, in view of the inexperience of the Dutch shipbuilders in this sort of construction, the Government asked foreign firms to tender designs.

The choice fell on the designs of the British firm of Yarrow & Company, which in conjunction with the Ministry of Marine, will supervise the building of the destroyers.—Reuter.

RESTRICTION OF RUBBER EXPORTS

Little Improvement in Price but Adverse Influence on Cost of Production

London, Aug. 25.

Commenting on the fact that the further reduction to 55 per cent. in the exportable allowance of rubber has up to the present failed materially to influence the price of the commodity, "The Times" says that whether or not the exportable allowance is necessarily reduced, owing to failure of the price average of 15 pence per pound for a full quarter, must primarily depend on the American demand and on production in the Dutch Indies. The journal says that should successive reductions of the export quota be involved, the outlook for all but the most efficient producers will become very unfavourable.

The extent to which the output is now limited is exerting an adverse influence on costs, and if over a lengthy period no compensation is given by a higher price, some planters will begin to wonder if, after all, restriction is simply a means of rendering the inevitable period of strain more prolonged than would otherwise have been the case.

Aug. 26.

The City Editor of "The Times" commenting on the rubber position in the Straits says that, the longer the present situation continues, the greater will be the strain on British companies, and the more insistent will become the call for a reconsideration of the whole restriction scheme.—Reuter.

WHITE STAR LINER IN A HURRICANE

Panic on the Arabic

New York, Aug. 27.

The White Star liner Arabic, which arrives here in a few hours from Hamburg, has sent a wireless message requesting that eight ambulances be prepared for passengers who were injured when a hurricane struck and damaged the vessel last night.

Aug. 28.

Terrible experiences in a tropical hurricane are reported by liners arriving here.

Fifty-two persons were injured on board the White Star liner Arabic, of whom seven have been taken to hospital.

The captain states that a huge wave struck the starboard shaft bridge and threw 100 screaming women, men and children in a heap into a corner of the main lounge mixed with articles of furniture, paintings, tapestries and chunks of class from broken portholes, The flood rushed the deck, crushing lifeboats, twisting stanchions and virtually filling every cabin of the two upper decks. Semi-panic reigned while the storm was at its height. It is stated that rough treatment was required to quieten some male immigrants.

The White Star Liner Homeric was also caught in the storm. She had eight persons injured and suffered damage to her super-structure.

A hurricane of mountainous seas swept the whole Atlantic seaboard driving ships to shelter in New York Harbour, which is crowded with vessels.—Reuter's American Service.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO

Spanish Troops' Successful Operations

AERIAL CROSS-CHANNEL FERRY SERVICE

London, Aug. 26.

British and French experts are drawing up a scheme for an aerial cross-channel ferry, with a half-hourly service between Folkestone and Boulogne. The flying-boats will accoommodate 12 passengers, and make the crossing in 15 minutes. It is understood that the fare will be £1.—Reuter.

ALLEGED LIQUOR SMUGGLER CAPTURED

Savannah, Aug. 21.

The coastguards have seized the Charles Heyde, a turbine-driven schooner, carrying 9,600 quarts of spirits and much absinthe and beer, outside the international limits. Inquiries have begun regarding the legality of the vessel's registry, which is alleged to be Nassau. It is stated that if British registry is found to be authentic the vessel will be released.—Reuter's American Service.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

KING AND AMERICAN LAWYERS

Buckingham Palace Garden Party: Superfluous Spats and Wrong Gloves

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, July 29.

The wise paper nowadays realizes that it is not enough to publish a sober and serious résumé of the events of the day. Even "The Times" sometimes unbends; perhaps the "Daily Telegraph" remains the most austere. All other journals give you humorous articles and humorous illustrations, and when they get the opportunity treat events humorously.

Humour was extracted from the Royal Garden Party at Buckingham Palace at which all the American lawyers and their wives were present. Apparently they all turned up in spats, thinking it was the right thing to do, but, as Judge J. Crawford Biggs of North Carolina remarked: "Between you and me, some of the men in our party hid in the bushes in the gardens at Buckingham Palace, took off their spats and threw them away." He claims to be one of the few Americans who attended the Royal Garden Party with the fewest sartorial imperfections—in other words, he was almost correctly dressed. The Judge did not affect spats and did not carry a cane—neither did the King—much to Judge Biggs' satisfaction.

"If you look round among the American fellows to-days," said the judge from Carolina, "you'll not see a single pair of spats. At the party yesterday every man had them on, white, cream and grey ones. They all thought it was the thing to do. There wasn't an Englishman there wearing them, and instead of canes they were carrying umbrellas. Before we left I whispered to one of our judges: My word if only your Irish constituents could see you in those spats, sir! But he kept them on."

Even Judge Biggs, however, made one mistake—he carried yellow doeskin gloves. The King wore dark grey ones.

"We bought hundreds of pairs of doeskin gloves," he admitted. "They seemed pretty yellow when we saw the King's grey ones, but of course, we had to carry them. To-day we are all out after dark grey gloves."

Then Mr. Josiah Marvel (member of the General Council of the American Bar Association) who was presented to the King and Queen made a confession:—

"I went right up to the bandmaster and offered him my cane," he said 'If I don't call back for this it's yours.' I told him. I kept as far away from that cane as I possibly could. I was particularly struck by the dignified democracy of their Majesties and their interest in American matters."

Judge Biggs added that he had asked the King to go to Carolina, and the Royal reply was "That's fine of you." According to Mr. Charles M. Seymour, of Tennessee, a younger member of the legal profession, there was never such courtesy—or refreshments—as those of Buckingham Palace. "I said to one of the waiters 'I guess you've never had such eaters at the Palace before.'"

Bribing the Building Trade

The Housing Bill has passed Parliament, though very few people believe in it, and it will probably be merely an extra bribe in money which the Building Trade—employers and employed—will cheerfully pocket without giving much in return for it. We have also passed the Agricultural Wages Bill, which provides for the setting up of Local Wage Committees to fix Agricultural Wages. These are admittedly very low, about 25s. in most Counties, and probably the tendency will be to raise the sum to 30s., though what the farmers will do is another matter, because they have always maintained that they cannot pay more than they are now doing. Parliament, however, clipped the wings of Whitehall, which was anxious to allow the permanent officials to have the final voice as to what these wages should be, and the Unionists were strong enough to prevent the incorporation in the Bill of a provision fixing the minimum wage at 30s. If the Labour Party had not agreed to this proposal they would have lost the Bill altogether.

Weather Ruins Sports

All the great sports functions are now ending, and many of them are being ruined by the bad weather, since we are having tremendous local storms. It is, though, curious that when London was deluged on Tuesday there was unbroken fine weather at Goodwood, and so the racing was not interfered with in any way. On the other hand, the Test Match at Manchester will go down to history as having been attended by the most abominable weather. We had the usual Naval Review last Saturday when, for the first time since the War, the newspapers summoned up courage to voice our pride in our possession of the Navy. Hitherto, with the League of Nations before us, we have kept a discreet silence, but now sentiment is changing. Everyone seems to have had a very good day, since the weather was fine, although the Members of Parliament complain they were inadequately looked after and very much cramped in their accommodation, but then, these gentlemen who nowadays travel first-class at the expense of the nation are getting rather exacting.

Controversies for All

Meantime there are controversies enough to satisfy even the most contentious. In the first place, we are threatened with a rise in the price of bread, and there is a most violent denunciation of alleged profiteering, though the importers state that they are the victims of a world shortage of supplies. There is quite a brisk little fight over the annexation by the War Office of Lulworth Cove in Dorset for a Gunnery School. Everybody wants the War Office to get out of the district, which it has occupied since the War, since Lulworth is known as a beauty spot, but the Department, though beaten in the Law Courts, declares it will exercise its powers of compulsory purchase. Personally I think the War Office would be wise to get out promptly, or it will be pushed out. We seem as far as ever from any settlement in the building trade dispute—the whole secret is that behind an apparent demand for increased wages is a political move by the employees to nationalize the industry and have all work carried out by direct labour and not by private enterprise.

The Government on the eve of the Recess has announced its attention of practically nationalizing the State supply of electricity. In principle it has something to be said for it if you can make power cheaper, but a good deal depends on the way in which the idea is to be carried out. It has also decided further to subsidize heavily the Sugar Beet Industry—the British refiners strongly object to the subsidization of refining in this country in competition to themselves, and I rather fancy the Free Trade enthusiasts will be on their hind legs very shortly over this proposal.

The First Woman M. P.

There is quite a brisk controversy over the experimental hanging in the House of a portrait of the first woman M.P. taking her seat. The picture is by Charles Sims and is not particularly good—at all events, from the standpoint of most critics—but this is not the point. It is alleged to have been paid for by Lord Astor and that no official permission was ever given by Parliament for its display. Lady Astor is not very popular, and people do not like a picture of this kind put up in the lifetime of the person concerned.

Historically, of course, Lady Astor did take her seat first of all women M.P.'s, but in ability and personality she is completely overshadowed by the Duchess of Atholl, who is a political "find."

Although we are a Free Trade country the Musicians' Union, who are rather a selfish crowd, are shrieking at the foreign invasion of skilled artistes, even though this form of immigration is drastically controlled by the Minister of Labour. Considering that America is taking all our best actors and actresses, and Germany all our best music hall artistes, we need not be so exclusive in our treatment of foreign art.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LIFE

Kind Hearts are More than Coronets

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, July 31.

I have had always a great regard for railway directors. They look to me so fat and comfortable that I have never been able lightly to think they purposely evolve a timetable which is stuffed with trains most unsuitable to the ordinary traveller, or charge fares which limit journeys to the Very Wealthy. I have always assumed they are the victims of circumstances over which they have no control. And this week I was convinced of the fact. It has been borne in on me that really they are the kindest-hearted men imaginable and as you know—or ought to—kind hear are more than coronets.

It was at Paddington, that cheery station for the West of England where you have a huge barnlike structure and the whistling wind from the W.S.W. It was crowded with belated excursionists, with people who on the Saturday night had either missed their trains or were waiting for them and were looking for them. You are not at your best under such untoward conditions—nor were they.

Music Hath Charms.

Then suddenly out marched the Staff Band, took up its pitch on the large open space at the street end of the structure and started to play. What delicate consideration! Selection after selection—all chosen with, so I am told, due appropriateness followed without a break until peace and contentment was restored and it wanted but little to set the weary travellers jazzing up and down among the piles of luggage.

You see the range of music is so wide that every train can be catered for. "Off to Philadelphia in the Morning" is naturally most fitting for belated boat-train passengers. For those who have lost their connexions altogether till the Monday morning what can be more strongly recommended than Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony or Daphne Hope's "Slumberland Hush-a-Bye?" Then comes the musical appeal to the tired passenger vainly inquiring for the platform from which his train goes or ought to go if he could find it, "Whisper and I shall hear" or "Follow the Man from Cook's." For the Wembleyite wearied out and anxious to get back to his native resort there is Teresa del Riego's. "Homing" and "My little grey Home in the West." After midnight on the Saturday you can switch a little on to the religious such as Schubert's "Ave Maria" or a morsel from Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." Of course you might try "The Night's Afire with Love" only it's a little disconcerting when you still have 200 miles to go and won't get home till three a.m. to have these appeals to sentiment. At that hour you rather want something on the line of "I heard a sweet song" to suggest that the guard will be coming along shortly with his "right away." Anyway all seem to have enjoyed it. Even the porters were cavorting along the platform to the strains of "You should see me dance the Polka" and when the last train having gone for the night poor old Paterfamilias found himself on the deserted boards surrounded by piles of luggage and his family he was quite consoled by the concluding except, "I pitch my lonely Caravan."

Then I wended my way to Euston. Here they have a little structure where on a blackboard they display the number of minutes each train is late and the platform at which it will ultimately arrive. As all trains are in chaos the Kindly-hearted Director realizes that the disappointed train-hunter would go across to the pub. near by if not induced to stop. So he erects a few yards away a very cleverly lighted form of constantly changing views of the line, and other advertisements. The minutes fly quickly when the waiter is thus amused and so he ceases to "cuss" everything connected with the roadway.

Brightening up the House.

These are ideas capable of great expansion. For instance when I went to the House of Commons yesterday I found in the Inner Lobby where the Speaker's procession takes place, about 100 people drawn up ready to witness it at least half an hour before its started and by the time the proceedings cmmenced there would be about 1,000. I felt the need for just a little timely diversion to make the minutes fly. Something in the nature of a few conjuring tricks or an athletic display by the policeman on duty. I suppose it is a little too much to ask for a band though I have always thought this would be most helpful and effective in the debates.

What too about brightening up the Police Courts? A little appropriate music at each case? "A Jewelled Rosary" with some charge of window-breaking at a jeweller's? "Memories of You" for the habitual imbiber? "All adown to Devon" for the sailor rejoining his ship without a ticket? "I dreamed a thousand dreams" for the man charged with sleeping out? You see the possibilities are infinite.

RELENTLESS WAR ON THE BOURGEOISIE

New Declaration from Moscow on World's Middle Classes

Telegraphing on July 12, the "Daily Telegraph's" Riga correspondent said:—The fifth congress of the Communist International closed on Tuesday. At the final session Zinovieff was unanimously elected president of the executive committee of the Communist International. In view of the importance of the occasion a manifesto of the Communist International was addressed to all proletariats. This manifesto is a lengthy document, consisting of six chapters and a conclusion. It is signed by the members of the presidium, amongst them Zinovieff, Stalin, Bucharin, and Trotsky. In the first chapter is given an historical survey, in which it is proved that there has been "a new and gigantic conspiracy on the part of capital against the working classes of Europe and the whole world." It is alleged that the conspiracy is organized by a financial group which has its headquarters in New York and a branch in London. Conciliatory Social Democrats are co-workers in this conspiracy, and help the capitalists in their bloodthirsty plan. Such being the position, an understanding between the Capitalist world and the Soviet Republic is possible, but not a reconciliation. Therefore, the Red army and fleet are indispensable, as they are guarding the arsenal of the world revolution. The Red army is described as the shield of the oppressed and the sword of revolters.

The manifesto further states that the successful fighting of militarism is only possible by a relentless war against the bourgeoisie. To this end it is necessary that Communists should enter Capitalist armies, animated by a secret readiness to direct their weapons against their class enemy, namely, the bourgeoisie. It is also necessary to keep up connexion with military barracks, and to unite all soldiers who are conscious of the Communist movement into small groups, and to establish a revolutionary railway organization by combining the most devoted and courageous proletarian fighters. It is further necessary to turn special attention to military works, and to arrange to have strong fighting groups in all such works.

The proclamation ends with a call to fight the conspiracy of the Capitalistic oppressor, which is known under the innocent name of "the Plans of the Experts," closing with these words:

We Communists address to all the workers of Europe the following advice: "Your happiness lies in an irreconcilable struggle against the plans of the experts and against all those who conduct and defend them It is necessary to clear the road of all Social Democrats, to overthrow the bourgeoisie, and to take possession of power. Then it will be possible to unite all European countries and the Soviet Federation into the Workers' and Peasants' United States of Europe.

Public opinion is being prepared in England by the British Government for the formation of a new technical reserve army to facilitate the mobilization of the army in case of war, says a Home paper. The reserve army will consist of some 2,000 officers and 20,000 soldiers to be picked out from all branches of the military service.

U. S. IMMIGRATION ANOMALY

American Parents with an Italian Son

Whatever may be thought of some of the immigration regulations of the United States, it cannot be claimed that the Americans do not adhere strictly to their rules once they have been made.

Many anomalies have arisen during recent years in regard to the operation of various clauses of the immigration laws, but none, we think, more interesting and proving the utter fallacy of hard and fast rules than the case of Mrs. Theodore Anne Wernher, wife of a prominent, "100 per cent. American," business man of New York.

According to the "Corriere della Sera," Mrs. Wernher, in February of this year, went on a visit to friends in Italy. Her departure for home was delayed and while still in Italy she gave birth to a son.

She and her babe eventually left for the United States, but on arrival at New York she was informed by immigration officials that whle she, as an American and the wife of an American, was free to land, her son, having been born in Italy, was technically and legally an Italian. As the quota of Italian immigrants had at that time been exhausted, her son would either have to be deported to Italy or go to Ellis Island to wait admission with the first batch of Italian immigrants for the next immigration period. It is stated that the mother decided to go to Ellis Island with her child, deportation being presumably out of the question. The whole affair appears exceeding strange, and one is driven to wonder whether Mrs. Wernher could not have registered the birth of her son with one of the U.S. Consuls in Italy and so have guaranteed him American citizenship.

THE REAL CRUSOE

How Selkirk Lived

In "Seamen All" (Heinemann, 10s. 6d.) Mr. E. Keble Chatterton, the well-known authority on the history of ships and the sea, tells number of stories of adventure in all kinds of ships during the last 250 years.

They are true, and most are so amazing that they are far more dramatic and thrilling than the best of fiction. In fact, a real adventure is the basis of one of the finest romances ever written.

"Everyone knows that Alexander Selkirk went out on Dampire's privateering expedition in 1703, and that when the ship touched at the island of Juan Fernandez, off the coast of Chile in the following year, he asked, in consequence of a quarrel with his captain, to be put ashore there. It was from the account of his experiences that Defoe wrote Robinson Crusoe.

Forgot English.

Now, on the last day of January, the island was visited by the frigates of Rogers, a famous Bath privateer, and a boat was sent ashore. It returned with an abundance of crayfish and "a man clothed in goat skins, who looked wilder than the first owners of them. He had been on the island four years and four months. I agreed with him to be mate on board our ship," writes Rogers.

Selkirk told Rogers all about his experiences—how he built himself two huts with pimento trees how he got fire by rubbing two sticks of wood together on his knees; how he lived on crayfish and goat's flesh, how the island was overrun with cats and rats which had come ashore from ships; how, when his cloths wore out, he made himself a coat and cap of goat skin, using a nail for a needle. On coming aboard he had so far forgot the English language for want of use that the frigate people could scarcely understand him."

A curious footnote to the story is supplied by the fact that the Dresden, which escaped after the Battle of the Falklands, was surprised and destroyed by British cruisers at this island of Juan Fernandez.

Crayfish are still very plentiful, and the owner of the fisheries was much annoyed at the invasion of the warships,

THE LABOUR-SOVIET AGREEMENT

How the British Cabinet Came to Terms with Bolsheviks At Last Moment

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, Aug. 7.

Another very fine and unsuspected crisis has been provided over Russia. On Tuesday morning it was announced that the Anglo-Russian Conference had broken up, having come to grief on the proposal affecting the loan to Russia on the guarantee of the British Government. The British Government had contended that any such loan should only follow an understanding between the Soviet Government and the British bondholders, whereas the Soviet Government delegates had insisted that the guaranteed loan should precede any such arrangement with the bondholders. The alleged final Conference lasted over 18 hours and ended at 7.15 a.m. This breakdown did not, we were told, affect recognition, and we were also told that the Russian delegates were going to remain here for some time.

Twelve hours later there was a complete transformation of everything, and we discovered that the Government had performed an extraordinary somersault. An official statement issued by the Foreign Office on May 20 declared, in a report of a meeting of the Anglo-Soviet conference:

The British Delegation repeated that any guarantee (of a loan to Russia) by the Government was out of the question.

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who was Chairman at that meeting, stated in Parliament last night that the Government had decided to submit to Parliament a proposal guaranteeing a loan to Soviet Russia.

Following the official statement made on Tuesday that the Anglo-Soviet Conference (which was opened in London nearly four months ago) had broken down, an agreement was reached yesterday after an all-night discussionn of the position by the Soviet delegates.

The Princpal Points.

The chief points in the agreement outlined by Mr. Ponsonby, and received derisively by Conservatives and Liberals, who described the agreement as a "farce" and a "fake," are:

Soviet Russia is to be admitted into the Exports Credit scheme in return for giving British most-favoured-nation treatment for our goods.

Diplomatic immunity is to be granted to some of the Soviet trade delegates and to their office.

Russia admits liability with regard to the claims of British bondholders with whom the Soviet Government is to negotiate.

A lump sum is to be decided on with reference to miscellaneous claims against Russia.

A Commission will investigate property claims against Russia and decide on compensation.

When miscellapeous and property claims have been agreed they will be embodied in a subsequent treaty.

Arising out of that second treaty, the loan proposal will be submitted.

The Government debts and interventionist claims are "set aside," written down, and put into "cold storage."

Late last night, Mr. Clynes, for the Government, yielded to the obvious hostility of the House to Mr. Ponsonby's statement that the treaty would be signed to-day. "There is no question whatever of signing this treaty in the morning," he declared. After he had consulted the Prime Minister, a motion for the adjournment was accepted and the debate will be resumed to-day.

The amount of the proposed loan is unofficially stated to be between £30,000,000 and £40,000,000.

An Amazing Turn Over.

I will give the "Daily Herald" a free advertisement by quoting from it how the Russian Settlement was engineered, which you can take as being quite right. All I need say about it is that it is amazing that matters can be adjusted in this fashion.

By Our Diplomatic Correspondent.

"The Russian Conference Must Go On," said the "Daily Herald" contents bill yesterday when all the news was of breakdown and failure, and all the talk of the closing of doors.

To-day we are able not only to announce that the Conference has gone on, but that it has gone on to a successful issue.

The negotiations, which were broken off in the early morning of Monday, were resumed yesterday and rapidly ended in complete success.

Everything is now in readiness for the formal signature, which will take place to-day.

Obstacle Removed.

Yesterday's negotiation was opened by a visit from Mr. Gregory, of the Foreign Office, to the Soviet Embassy in Bond-street. Then followed a series of meetings and telephone conversations.

The formula which has removed the final obstacle to a settlement was produced at lunch-time by Mr. Ponsonby.

It provides that in the second treaty, which is to include the guarantee of a Russian loan, there shall be an "agreed settlement" of such claims of ex-proprietors as have not been previously settled by private negotiation.

After a short discussion among themselves the Russian delegation agreed that this was acceptable. Their decision was at once communicated to Mr. Ponsonby, and they were invited to the Foreign Office for the final drafting and revision of the Treaty (there are, in fact, two—one commercial, the other general) in readiness for to-day's ceremonial signature.

It had been a close race against time, but all's well that ends well, and Mr. Ponsonby was able after all to announce last night to the House of Commons that the four months' negotiation had been crowned with success.

The reopening of the doors, which had apparently been closed on the Tuesday morning, was effected with the help of a number of private Labour Party M.P.'s, who used all their influence with both sides to secure a reopening of the negotiation.

When the news of the breakdown became known on Tuesday, a hasty meeting was summnoed, from which a deputation was sent to Mr. Ponsonby in order to ascertain the precise situation. Then, with Mr. Ponsonby's approval, arrangements were made to get into touch with the Russians.

Late in the evening in a private conference room at the House of Commons the British Labour M.P.'s met the Soviet delegates. All the Russians were present. Among the twenty or so Labour members were representatives of every section of the Party, among them several members of the Parliamentary Executive.

An Hour's Meeting.

The conversation lasted for over an hour. Then a few of the M.P.'s went to see Mr. Ponsonby, who had hurried over from the Foreign Office to meet them. Another meeting with the Russians followed, and agreement was reached that the negotiations should be resumed in the morning.

That is, in brief, the story of how the doors were reopened and the way made clear for yesterday's good work.

The thanks of two nations are due to the British Delegation, to the Russian Delegation, and to those private members whose good offices at the critical moment made it possible to turn a heartbreaking failure into a splendid success.

An Electioneering Dodge.

I have confirmed the substantial accuracy of the above story, which does not state that Mr. Lansbury was the chief mover in the whole business. Clearly, the Labour Party think that the signing of the draft Agreement will be a great electioneering card to play, since they imagine that Russia is going to spend all the money which we may be "mugs" enough to provide her with in this country. This, of course, is a pathetic illusion, and besides, Russia has not got the money yet.

There was a rather stormy and acid debate on the subject in the House to-day. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the Prime Minister, said that he intended to sign the Treaty at once, though he realized that this step did not carry with it the sanction of the House. He added:

"It is evident that the Government is most anxious that not a clause, not a provision, not a line of this Treaty should become operative until the House of Commons has sanctioned it."

Hitherto, of course, all Treaties signed by a Government which possessed a majority in the House have been automatically honoured. Now you have a Government in a minority attempting to commit the House to the acceptance of a Treaty which the majority of them, I think, dislike. The Conservatives are opposed to it en bloc, though the Liberals are divided. Hence, when the House meets in September or later there will be another very bitter discussion, and this new move will have a great effect at the coming election. Most people think, like Sir Robert Horne, that the agreement is: "A makeshift, a sham and a pretence," but it is none the less an effort by the Ministry to placate their extremists and to pretend that they are the saviours of the unemployed. It is therefore advisable not to attach too much importance to the Treaty at present.

THE CH'IEN-MEN-WAI

Memories of Peking

Mr. Somerset Maugham introduced the Ch'ien Men to London when he used it as a setting for one of the acts of "East of Suez." The picturesque scenic effect staged at His Majesty's was a pretty faithful replica of a bit of Peking, which is one of the commonest features of everyday life to an Englishman living in the capital. He passes the Ch'ien Men continually on his lawful occasions, be it motoring out to the Racecourse, hacking to the Temple of Heaven, or bound on a curio-hunt in some part of the Ch'ien-men-wai.

The Ch'ien Men, I must explain for those unacquainted with Peking geography, is the "Front Gate" which breaks the wall separating the Chinese and Tartar Cities at a point directly in front of the palace. Ch'ien-men-wai is the name given primarily to the district, but more "outside" the Gate, i.e., southward, in the Chinese City. The street, like most of the principal Peking thoroughfares, runs in a dead straight line for more than a couple of miles, exactly bisecting the Chinese City, through a gate in whose southern wall it reaches the open country. It is a board roadway, comparable to Piccadilly in width, with generous pavements each side.

Whoever has known the Ch'ien-men-wai in all the changing aspects of the Four Seasons—in snow and sunshine, rain and dust—has a pack of memories to choose from. The best perhaps is of those spring mornings when one jogs down before breakfast for a ride in the Temple of Heaven through streets bathed in the clean early sun. First comes the Ch'ien Men itself abruptly facing you, as you turn out of Legation Quarter. Above, it is a massive tower-like structure reared on the top of the 40-ft. wall, the green tiles of its "three-decker" roof shimmering dazzlingly in the sunshine; below, a cavernous piercin the thickness of the wall and casting so black a shadow that one seems to plunge from day in to night as one rides under the archway. On the further side is a cleared space, once enclosed by curtain walls, where the outer bastion of the gate now stands huge and derelict between two railway termini.

Clean Streets.

Crossing the bridge which spans the moat parallel to the wall, one comes to the head of the Ch'ien-men-wai. From the height of one's pony's back one can see down its whole length to where the ribbon of roadway narrows almost to vanishing point at the Yung-ting-men. Northward, could one but see it, the line of the street stretches an equal distance, passing straight through the centre of the Forbidden City, blocked only by the innumerable gateways to abutt at last on the Coal Hill.

Often a string of camels, roped nose too tail, stop your way at this point, cutting across the street on their way westward to the hills to fetch coal and limestone for the city. The traffic from now on is both dense and varied. Besides the inevitable legions of rickshas, there is a stream of mule and donkey carts coming in from the country, a sprinkling of "Peking carts," striking a bright note with their blue hoods and yellow varnished woodwork and white Shantung mules between the shafts, townsmen on bicycles, countrymen on donkeys, and a few officials in motors with soldiers lining the footboards. More likely than not a string of military supply waggons, under mounted escort, comes rattling past on their way to the Nanyuan barracks a few miles south of the city.

The street itself looks unusually clean and bright in the young fresh daylight. The irregular line of housetops on the eastern side throws a crenelated shadow along the middle of the roadway, leaving half in deep shade, while the sunlit fronts of the houses opposite sparkle and gleam in all the pride of their gilded woodwork or moulded stucco. Sad it is that the old carved shopfronts—some of them masterpieces fit to compare with the finest specimens of Gothic roadscreens—are steadily giving place to stucco farades in the barroque style of suburban cinema-palaces with plaster birds and beasts perched on the parapets of the roofs; but at least these manifestations of modern Chinese taste have the merit of ample variety.

Distinctive Side Streets.

The side streets you pass on the way down the Ch'ien-men-wai have distinct characters of their own. First comes the armurers' street, where old-fashioned swords and pikes are still manufactured and sold; then "Lantern" and "Jade" streets—the Mecca and Medina of the tourist—and the fashionable Tashih-la'erh, the Bond-street of Peking, with its high-built houses and forest oof pendant shop-signs. Further down a street cuts across which runs east and west to gates of the Chinese City.

Up to this point there are nothing but better-class shops—curio-dealers and silkmerchants, fruiterers, furriers and moneychangers and other respectable trades. But southward from here a change is evident. We have left the fashionable quarter for a distrct of humbler pretensions. Excepting a few curio-shops which have overflowed the lines the shops are devoted to more plebian trades, such as basket-making and tinsmiths, and above all, pawn-brokers' shops, whose stange assortment of "junk" shills over ontoo the side-walk. A host of curious objects, old stirrups and harness, red and brown leather boxes, bells and gongs out of temples, eunuchs' staves and bits of bannermen's armour are stacked in picturesque piles along the edge of the pavement.

A little further on the Ch'ien-men-wai undergoes another transformation. The houses, already little better than hovels, cease altogether, and the street crossing a stone bridge over a recently filled-up sewer, enters a region of disreputable booths, food-stalls and gimcrack theatres. The last are, of course, doing no business at this hour of the day; the food vendors, on the other hand, are plying a brisk trade with the country carters, a number of whom have left their teams standing by the edge of the road and are congregated round the enormous iron frying pans, where slabs of pinkish beancurd of a nauseous odour sizzle in bubbling fat.

Petticoat Lane.

Back through the jumble of tents and barrows runs "Petticoat Lane," a double line of booths with awnings stretched overhead. The name, though the author's own, is not entirely inapt, for not only have we here the "ole clo' " mart of Peking, but the chief articles for sale are actually petticoats—pretty things of embroidered silk of every colour and shade, the discarded finery of fashionable Peking ladies.

Once past the last of the theatres the road opens out and nothing but bare tracts of dried mud lie between it and the walls of the two temples—on the right the Temple of Agriculture and on the left the Temple of Heaven. A short canter across the mud, dodging a series of rubbish heaps, brings one to the entrance to the latter, and passing the gate into the temple park one escapes from a dustridden world into the fragrant freshness of juniper groves and grassy glades overspread with a tangled mass of "morning glory."—G.E.H. in the "China Express."

MENACE OF THE MOON

Lurid Account of the Final Smash!

That Noah's flood was the result of a collision of the earth with a former moon; that the "golden age" when mankind developed an exceedingly high state of culture on the legendary, now sunken continents of Atlantis and Lemuria, that the cataclysm which engulfed these continents resulted in the acquisition by the earth of its present moon; and finally in an age to come the moon will plunge into our planet involving mankind in a catastrophe of unprecedented magnitude and horror; all this is part of an arresting theory recently developed by the European Astronomer, Dr. Hans Herlinger of Vienna.

A lurid account of the final smash when the moon comes into contact with the earth is given in the World Magazine "Closer and closer" it writes, "will approach the bulging head of the lunar monster, now only some 5,000 miles distant, rushing around our globe seven or eight times in a single day, until its ghastly speed causes it to disintegrate entirely, and all its remaining fragments to plunge headlong into the great equatorial ocean. These fragments, blazing meteor-like on account of the speed with which they dash though our atmosphere, will cause the ocean to boil and seethe like a mighty cauldron, and gigantic tidal waves of steaming liquid will spread out toward the Poles, ebb toward the Equator, and flow back again until the earth once more assumes a perfectly spherical shape, now on account of the added mass of the moon, considerably larger and heavier than formerly. Another terrestrial epoch will then begin." Fortunately there is no chance of the catastrophe occurring within the next million years or so.

DOUGLAS MAWSON MYSTERY

Crew Said to be Murdered and Women Abducted by Party of Blacks

The correspondent of the "Sydney Sun" states that an unconfirmed rumour is current in Darwin to the effect that the passengers and crew of the Douglas Mawson were murdered by blacks, and that the females were taken into capitivity. A native, who is the author of this startling story, describing the happenings, said that the white men were camped on the beach near Cape Wilberforce, and that they were subsequently speared by a large party of blacks. He describes how the men were buried. Two white women were taken into captivity by the blacks. The women are said to be with the natives at Port Bradshaw.

Groote Island natives confirm the story of the "Sun's" informant. It is stated that two white men visited the blacks, and, after taking from them the money which the natives had stolen from the murdered men, departed. The natives were warned not to say a word about the matter, otherwise there would be trouble.

Question in Parliament

In the House of Representatives on July 19 Mr. Nelson (Northern Territory) urged the Prime Minister (Mr. Bruce) to immediately despatch to the Territory an armed party to search for the men and women passengers of the ill-fated Douglas Mawson. Mr. Nelson stated that he had received a telegram from Dr. Wade, the oil expert at Darwin, confirming the story of the terrible fate that had befallen the men and women.

The Prime Minister asked permission from Mr. Nelson to read the telegram, and promised to make a statement later.

It was pointed out in official circles that the fullest search was made in the Gulf waters by the State without avail, and that only recently the Federal police search party from Darwin traversed the coast in the vicinity of Mount Alexander, following the discovery of wreckage there. Cape Wilberforce is north of this point, and also in the Territory. Groote Eylandt is comparatively adjacent to Mount Alexander. It is also pointed out that if such a rumour were current in Darwin, and regarded as in any way authentic, action undoubtedly would have been taken immediately by the Federal authorities there to fully ventilate it. There were three females and four passengers on the Douglas Mawson when she entered upon her last trip in April of last year. The females were:—Mrs. Willett, then 35 years of age. Alice May Willett, her daughter, then 14 years of age. Elizabeth Willett, another daughter, then 4 years of age.

Personnel of the Crew

The names of the crew, as published at the time of the vessel's disappearance, were:—George F. Tune (master), Richard Shewring (mate), Robert D. Thompson (engineer), John Fraser (donkeyman), John Tully and Hector V. Dinte (firemen-drivers), Robert Nixon (cook and steward), James Laird, Archie M'Neill, Christian Neilsen, William Rowe, and William Nugent (able seamen), and Maurice Giese (ordinary seaman). There were also on board as passengers Mr. and Mrs. Willett and their five children, who joined the ship at Normanton.

Another of Hongkong's oldest Government servants has retired and is due to leave for Home very shortly. He is Senior Inspr. R. G. McEwen, A.R.S.I., of the Sanitary Board, whose term of 34 years' service in the Colony came to an end on the 16th instant.

SPECIAL ARTICLES

THE UNIQUENESS OF MISSIONARIES

The Splendour and the Limitation of Those Who Challenge China with an Alien Religion

The following articles from the pen of Nathaniel Peffer, in "Asia," will be read with interest and enjoyment by both missionaries and their opponents alike. Mr. Peffer deals with the missionaries at length, their achievement and their limitations, never unkindly but always justly. Mr. Peffer also deals with the anti-Christian movement in China, its birth and possibilities.

When you are but four days out on a Pacific Ocean liner bound for the Far East, you will find already a note of harmony welded out of the smoking-room and deck gossip. Those damned missionaries! Years later, in China or Japan, the Straits Settlements or India, you will find your one-time fellow-passengers still united in damning the missionaries. Not one in 20 will ever have had an unbroken hour's conversation with a missionary or made the smallest first-hand observation of his work. Wherever they are, they belong to different worlds. Twelve white men will live in the same little town far in the interior, surrounded by yellow or brown men, but, though isolated and starved for companionship, or even conversation, the eight who are missionaries and the four who are business men will remain strangers and mutually hostile.

It is not my purpose here to attempt to say why. I want merely to set down a few uncontroversial observations on missionaries as I have known them in the Far East—observations that may at least throw light on the question. I do so as one of the few non-missionaries, I may say, who have come to know the missionaries in China, and, though aware of their limitations, to like them and even to sympathize with their aims.

The word uncontroversial must be emphasized; for there has flared up recently a new passion of criticism of the missionaries in lands where they have been longest engaged, notably China. Now, however, it is criticism not by their own people, but by those among whom and for whom they labour. The former, the missionary could afford to ignore; the latter, he cannot. The most ardent and convinced missionary cannot conceal from himself the threat to the success of his work from the anti-Christian attitud recently developed among the Chinese intellectual classes.

Where the Blame.

If you were to ask any group of missionaries in China what has been the cause of the anti-Christian movement, most of them, I believe, would put the blame on two men who have visited China, Bertrand Russell and John Dewey. Now, in a sense they are right, but the movement was certain to come in any case. It is in the spirit of the times. It is not an anti-Christian movement so much as a declaration of equality, a throwing off of the inferiority complex by people who had long accepted unprotestingly the rôle of the taught. Partly as a result of critical introspection among western Christians themselves and more because of the light in which the World War revealed the West, the Chinese had begun to voice their already existing inner rebellion against that rôle. But it was a timid expresssion and narrowly confined. Then came from Christian lands two men, distinguished among their own people, whose testimony lent authority to what had been only hesitant skepticism and tentative revolt. Opposition became forthwith more open and confident. Only to this extent can the anti-Christian movement be attributed to Mr. Russell and Mr. Dewey. For the forces are, in fact, sprung from the missionary movement itself, within which, in the 50 years, a basic change affecting both personnel and methods has taken place.

The Missionary Analized.

Before then, missionaries had been recruited chiefly from a restricted class: very young men and women, in little towns, who heard "the call" and went out to redeem the heathen. Their faith was simple, their beliefs were untroubled by doubt, their minds virgin of anything resembling an awareness of comparative religion, their experience in life and their knowledge of the world even more limited. Their methods were in character. They preached to the multitudes in the street, preached parables and miracles, the Bible interpreted with stark literalness. They sang hymns and distributed tracts. They "brought the Word" unto "them that sit in darkness" and on the brink of damnation. It was a message to the emotions, not the head.

Then young men and women educated in the colleges began to come out to the foreign mission field. They were of a generation that had made its peace, or a least its adjustment, with science. They did not fear the "higher criticism"; they had worked out a rebuttal. Having studied sociology, they had widened the frontiers of religious concept far enough to take in the idea of "service." Now, that class is still in a minority; nor are all of the younger generation included in it, but they are numerous enough and intellectually active enough to have large influence. One of the underlying dramas in the life of foreigners in the Far East in the past few years has been the conflict between the two generations, a conflict that extends, indeed, beyond the sphere of religious belief.

As a result of their training and their outlook, the younger men and women brought with them new methods, also. Theirs was not a direct evangelism. They were less insistent on hell-fire and brimstone than on the virtues of the social consciousness. They even indicated what the old-fashioned held to be a dangerous tendency to waive the literalness of some of the Biblical tales. They believed that the Christian doctrine could stand on its own merits, rationally as well as emotionally. They aimed therefore at the educated classes rather than the peasant and the coolie. Nor, since they had suceeeded to their own satisfaction in reconciling science and religion, did they fear science. Out of those two ideas arose belief in the school and the hospital as methods of conversion, and, therefore, an increasing proportion of educational and medical rather than purely evangelical missionaries and of funds devoted to educational and medical work. The work tended to become at once less ecstatic and more efficiently organized. And in equal measure there was widened the split between the older school and the modern.

The Consequences.

The consequences of the newer policy could easily have been predicted. The appeal to the educated classes rather than to the ignorant may have been more mature and pluckier; it was also more risky. When the old-fashioned missionary made his appeal with hymns and hell-fire and Jonah in the belly of the "whale," the peasants, if unimpressed, could retort only with emotional unresponsiveness. When the young missionary elected to make his appeal to the educated on the rational merits of his gospel, he challenged their reason.

The present anti-Christian movement in China is fundamentally only a declaration that the Christian doctrine can no longer be accepted on the missionary's complacent ipse dixit to a rude heathen. It has been opened to examination and argument and even skepticism by the missionary himself. Now, both the spirit of the times and one's own point of view may be in accord with the younger missionary generation, but it is indisputable, also, that in a sense the older school has been vindicated. Its methods, hymn-singing and tracts, brought converts, even if ignorant, or at least produced no organized hostility. The new methods, tainted with intellectualism and unspiritual elements like sociology, economics, philosophy and medicine, have aroused opposition. The older school can point to the result and call it proof that religion must stand on faith alone. Certainly there has been a powerful demonstration of the superior practical effectiveness of the appeal to faith alone as a method of religious propaganda.

It is necessary early in any discussion of the missionary question to distinguish between the missionaries themselves and their work, the latter being understood to include also their theology and their methods. To the missionaries in their purely personal aspect, only the prejudiced and ignorant will refuse an abundant meed of admiration. I have never met any other class anywhere so little moved by personal ambition or desire for gain. I doubt whether another exists. They have found an ideal for themselves and they serve it alone and for its own sake. How heavy a sacrifice it demands, is known only to those to whose lot it has fallen, as it has to mine, to be much with missionaries, to see them in their daily activities and even in some part to share their experiences

The Missionary's Living.

It is a commonplace of gossip in Far Eastern club bars and even in higher circles that the missionary gets a good living out of his calling, a beter living than he could get at home. This kind of talk I believe to be part ignorance and part superficiality. Missionaries live in pleasant, cheerful compounds surrounded by trees and lawns, it is true, and they generally have large and fairly comfortable houses. These advantages, exaggerated as they are, are counterbalanced by numerous deprivations—isolation, lack of all forms of community life, hardships of pioneer conditions.

Sometimes the missionary may be comfortable, and he may have security of income; but for what comfort he has, he pays exorbitantly, and for security he forfeits every chance of financial success, of ever being able to meet more than his barest necessities. I have seen missionaries living in the interior in houses built half by their own labour, using furniture manufactured by themseves and wearing clothes made by the wife and mother, as in the eariest days in America. I have also seen missionaries on tour of their districts, living in primitive native inns, eating native food, spending endless days in racking native carts, enduring the risk of numberless diseases, deprived of everything that is a white man's elemental need and denied fidelity to habits ingrained from birth.

The ordinary foreigner in China or Japan lives in his foreign settlement, insulated against irritating contacts with an alien people and the customs of an alien civilization. The environment of the land of his birth is reproduced for him as far as is physically possible. The missionary, on the other hand, shares the life of the Chinese wherever his is. When there is plague or famine or flood, when death is striking down thousands, the foreigner in the settlement knows of it from the correspondence in his English-language newspapers and remains in his foreignized port, spared even unpleasant sights. But the missionary stays at his post, with death sweeping around him and horror before his eyes in all his waking moments. He feeds the starving with what little he has or treats the stricken with such remedies as are available, and then watches the rest die. Missionaries have told me of going out of their compounds in the morning and finding at the gates the dead bodies of those who had dragged themselves there in the night in the hope of foreign succor. I have myself had to face the inhabitants of a village on their knees around my cart, begging food and beseeching me to buy their children or at least take them away with me. Three weeks of that have sent me back to Peking mentally and physically shattered. And I am satisfied, for myself, that of the missionaries left to confront such experiences through a whole winter, almost helplessly, there was required nothing less than heroism. Right or wrong, the missionary gives himself for a cause and in return asks nothing for himself. He is unique. In his uniqueness there is a certain spendour.

His Defects.

Yet the missionary has all the defects of his qualities, admirable as they are. If he adheres so loyally and gives himself so freely to his ideals, it is natural that he should be unquestioning about them and should take a simple view of all life. And those to whom life is clear-cut, black and white, good and bad, are not always the most comprehending, the most discerning and the most delicate in human situations. Mission work, therefore, is not so easily dealt with as missionary personality. The part of it that may be called for short "humanitarian" is all the word connotes. The campaign against foot-binding, opium and similar evils owes much to missionary influence. To missionaries must be given credit for fighting foreign exploitation of the Chinese, though usually in vain. Through the beneficent labours of medical missions islands of health have been created in an expanse of filth, disease and waste of life. The religious, social and educational work, however, all that raises questions of comparative creeds and comparative civilizations, reflects to a greater or less degree the limitations of missionaries.

I have already touched on the background of the average missionary. It must be understood if he is to be understood; for it explains him. He left his native land young. The chances are that of the stuff of life in his native land he knew but little. In the small communities from which he and most of his fellows came, conformity was the rule. The naked and the raw did not exist or were concealed. Even extreme poverty, with all that flows from it, was seldom found; intensity of passion, almost never. There was the great mean; there was a grand simplicity of conduct, preached and enforced by the local minister and his vestry or deacons. Nor had the missionary any familiarity with the critical literature of his own country. Not even indirectly had his assurance been disturbed.

With such a background young men and women came to China—or Japan or Korea or India—bearing light unto the darkness. In their new countries, however, they did see life in the raw. As aliens, they did not immediately find soft shelter. And, as foreigners, they came with open eyes and critical faculties and prejudice against the unfamiliar. Seeing life naked, without the corrective of knowing life at home in the same way, they of course idealized their own countries and adopted an air of superiority. You have there the explanation of three striking characteristics of Protestant evangelical workers in foreign lands: self-complacency in the face of different social customs and institutions; assumption of their own exclusive theological rightness; rigidity about matters of conduct.

Take merely the word "heathen." The use of that word and the recent decline in its use are both significant. The modern young men of the missions have learned that there are religions and civilizations other than their own not unworthy of consideration. At least some of them concede a certain dignity to Chinese civilization, for instance, if not to Chinese religious tenets. They have learned, too, that life is not all sublime in America either. Even so, such men are a minority. In Korea, I have asked missionaries how many schools there were in a certain town. "Five," was the answer; "two of ours and three heathen." I have asked whether a certain Korean, a man of culture and an accomplished Confucian scholar, was interested in their work. "Oh, no, he's a heathen!" came the reply.

The Patronizing Note.

The same attitude is reflected in print. It happens that much of the literature in English on the Far East has been written by missionaries. Through nearly all of it runs the superior, patronizing, even contemptuous note. The warping of European and American opinion on Far Eastern countries is in large measure due to this literature, the result of the fact that those through whose eyes the West has seen the East have not had the equipment to understand or to judge what they saw. The missionaries have raised their voice against political aggression from the West, but by their disparagement of eastern cultures they have also helped to bring on that aggression.

One of the best books on the Chinese people, for instance, is Dr. Arthur H. Smith's "Chinese Characteristics." It is an excellent work, witty and, on the whole, authoritative. The criticism is, however, tearingly destructive and the conclusion is that, admirable as the Chinese people may be, they need moral regeneration, which can come about only through Christianity. But a Chinese of equal ability and as much knowledge of America might have made a similar examination of American society and American character and, taking into account our industrial and economic system, our political corruption, our slums and commercialized vice, our diplomatic iniquities and our wars for raw materials and markets, might have concluded that we, too, despite many good qualities, needed a moral regeneration, which could come about only through conversion to Buddhism. Or, he might have said, if he wanted to be ironical, through conversion to Christianity. Had Dr. Smith, when he wrote his book in 1890, known as much about the life of a Pennsylvania mill town as he did about his Shantung and Chihli villages, his tone would have been different. In fact, in what he has written in recent years, his tone actually has been different. But Dr. Smith is a scholar and man of parts. The reactions and reports of the majority of missionaries, who are neither, can be imagined.

Once, while staying on Taishan, the sacred mountain in Shantung, I decided to make a trip to Chufu, the home of Confucius, not far distant. There the body of Confucius lies buried in a graveyard that is, I think, endowed with the highest dignity and the most austere beauty of any in the world; and there his descendants, the clan of K'ung, still live. From Duke K'ung, head of the clan in direct descent from eldest son to eldest son and the only hereditary duke in the country by that fact, to the water-carriers in the streets of the dusty village, practically all of the inhabitants are of the K'ung family. And all, whether duke or water-carrier, are, because of their lineage, equally entitled after death to lie within the red walls that enclose the burial-place of Confucius himself. There also the government, whether republic or monarchy, sends its representatives every year to make the nation's obeisance at the birthday ceremonials of the sage. It is in every sense a holy city.

Starting from Taishan, I was accompanied by a missionary, who told me he would stop at Chufu, too, because he had a church there. I expressed surprise at that and asked him to explain. He did. A few years before, his mission had attempted to lease property in Chufu for a station. It should be understood that, directly or indirectly, through a treaty imposed on China by the West after one of its wars of aggression, Christian missionaries have the right to live and work anywhere in China. The irony that inheres in the propagation of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace by the sanction of guns on war-ships I pass over without comment, just as the missionaries do. By virtue of this legal right the mission went to the district authorities, who are elders of the K'ung family, for permission to lease property. The authorities demurred strongly. They pointed out what that city symbolized to the Chinese people in religious sanctity, and they asked that there only, in the city where highest honour is paid to the founder of a great philosophy, older than Christianity, the mission voluntarily waive its right to proselyte. All the rest of China was open to it without hindrance. That one spot it might leave, unmolested, to its memories. The mission neither saw the point nor accepted the rebuff. It did not press the matter further with the authorities. Instead, its representatives went to a sympathetic family in the country, induced the head of it to buy a piece of property and then leased it from him. They built a church. They had won. I have never discussed this incident with a missionary who has not gloated over it or who showed any sensitiveness to the question of taste and feeling involved. I do not say there are no such missionaries. I only say I have never met one.

Missionary Religion.

Something must be said also of the form of religion propagated by the missionaries, though here one treads on dangerous ground. In form, if not in spirit, it is a religion almost as alien to most Americans as it is to the Chinese. It is a simple, unclouded, literal faith and, let us say, entirely anthropocentric. And it is this that has much to do with the wall that separates the missionary and his non-missionary co-nationals. There is, for instance, the matter of prayer. The missionary family prays often and long.

That habit is not a fault; nor is the want of it a virtue. But it marks off the missionary socially; for those who do not pray are to him objectionable, and, on the other hand, they find the necessity of sharing his prayers embarrassing to an extent that makes social intercourse and mutual sympathy difficult. And even in this matter of prayer, there are differences not only between missionary and non-missionary, but between missionaries themselves. The one prays: "Our Heavenly Father, Brother Smith is going home on furlough. Our Heavenly Father, make his trip a pleasant one and bring him back to us refreshed." The other prays; "Our Heavenly Father, give us the strength to be of service to the people, to help them to overcome the evils that now afflict them and to make their society more worthy of Thy name." The psychological difference between those two prayers in as wide as the poles. Nor am I exaggerating. I have heard numerous prayers like the first I have cited. I myself, when leaving missionary compounds in the interior, have been prayed for in that spirit. And though touched by the solemness that prompted such a petition, I have felt a little foolish and a little ashamed at the egotism it implied in me.

After all, when the illiterate peasant's wife burns her incense before the bronze joss in the village temple in supplication for a male child, and a tou-fu shopkeeper pastes a red paper plaster over his door to ward off evil spirits, is either of them acting in a spirit so much different from that of the missionary who prays that I have a comfortable trip in a mule-cart or that Brother Brown recover from rheumatism while in Nebraska? If a cultivated Chinese, who, being grounded in Confucianism, is contemptuous of the spirit-worship of the coolie, hears the Christian missionary's prayer and contrasts it with the coolie's at the joss-house, how is the to recognize the superiority of the one over the other or to concede a higher spirituality to the Christian's?

The Divided House.

And how is he to understand the tangle of sectarian differences among Christians? What is he to make of the antipathy between Catholic and Protestant evangelical workers? And of the multiplicity of divisions among Protestants alone? If a hundred Protestant missionaries were told by a Chinese goldfish-hawker that he would not join any of their churches but contemplated becoming a Catholic, and were asked whether he should do so or remain a worshiper of evil spirits, 99 out of the hundred missionaries, I am convinced, would wrestle with him to refuse Catholic communion.

Chinese, especially my language teachers in Peking, who were on the staff of a missionary-controlled school, most of whose pupils were missionaries, have talked to me much and often on this subject, and always in a tone of perplexity. "Tell me," one of them once said to me, "how it is that there are this Tien Chu Chiao (the Chinese name of the Catholic Church) and the Mei Ih Mei Hui (Methodist Church) and the other huis. They all use the same book and they say that in it is the only truth. Yet each tells us that what the other reads from that book is not the truth. How can that be? They all have the same God; yet they hate each other. They have not even the same names." What could I say?

The third characteristic of the Protestant missionaries is their dogmatism with regard to conduct. Here, too, however, differences are noticeable, not only between them and the non-missionaries, but among themselves. The older missionaries come by their puritanism naturally enough as part of their American heritage, but they have carried it to lengths scarcely dreamed of at home. Smoking, drinking, dancing, swearing are the cardinal sins, for the others are beyond even thinking for those not utterly damned; and all unsupervised relations between the sexes are suspect. "Thou shalt not" is the one sure guide, the safe response to every human impulse. A relentless negativism sets off the missionary body within a wall more insurmountable than any that surrounds a Chinese city.

Most of the missionaries, both men and women, conform to the code laid down. Few of them can resist for long the slow wear of organized social pressure. Not to yield is to leave the mission, and that means a confession of defeat or, what is worse, the shame of desertion. They would have to go home acknowledging themselves untrue to "the call." So most of them succumb and take compensation in idealizing their cause. But not all give up. Sometimes, of late, there has been open and declared rebellion, and both men and women have left the missions, though still sincerely devoted to the work. And always the struggle goes on under the surface.

Up to two or three years ago, it seemed that the younger generation would win, but the older school has obtained support from home through what is known as the "fundamentalist movement." Two years ago a certain rich American went out to China and let it be known that he was willing to make substantial donations to mission work, provided the tainted younger men were either ousted or suppressed. The temptation came at a strategic moment. The Interchurch World Movement, from which the missions had hoped so much, had just collapsed. Monetary considerations were therefore reinforcements to prejudice.

Now comes the anti-Christian movement by way of apparent vindication of prejudice. What the outcome will be is a matter for fascinating speculation. Whether it will be better for people like the Chinese to become Christians is a tempting question but one that does not now concern me. The issue here is the nature of Christian proselytizing in the future. If modernism is scotched and missionary endeavour returns to its ancient and narrower simplicities, converts may be more numerous and there will be less opposition to Christianity. But it may be said also that the spread of real Christianity will be narrowed. The anti-Christian movements may retard the temple of Christianization, but they will make Christianization real when it does come. For then the Christian Gospel will have won by victory over mature opposition and not by default, or with the coercive sanction of warships. It will have been accepted on its merits as superior to other faiths.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF HARA KIRI

BY OUR TOKIO CORRESPONDENT.

When the exclusion clause of the immigration bill went into effect, an unknown Japanese committed "hara kiri." He was acclaimed a national hero by the press and tens of thousands attended the last rites over the mangled corps which was given burial in one of the most select of Tokyo's cemeteries. The letter that this man had written to Mr. Cyrus E. Woods, former American Ambassador to Tokyo, saying that he had committed suicide in grief over the passage of the exclusion clause, was accorded a place of honor in the cabin of Mr. Woods when the latter left for the United States, and beside it, at the former Ambassador's request, a Bible, lighted candles and fresh flowers reposed.

What is this "hara kiri" and what is the significance of this form of suicide on the Japanese?

"Hara kiri" is the shuffling off of this mortal coil calmly and deliberately, according to set custom, to further an ideal or in fulfilment of obligations toward parent, lord or ruler. The phrase is derived from "hara" meaning the "stomach" and "kiri" meaning "cut open." Thus "hara kiri" means to die by disembowelling, and death by disembowelling, after certain prescribed forms of purification have been gone through, is the only correct way of fulfilling this strange sacrament of death.

Nogi's Sacrifice.

The drama, literature and folklore of Japan abound with harrowing griefs and, stoical steadfastness which end in murder and/or suicide, the suicide generally being in accordance with the rules laid down for "hara kiri."

The most dramatic and startling "hara kiri" of modern days was that of General Count Nogi and Countess Nogi. Count Nogi, the brave and grizzled hero of Port Arthur, killed himself on September 13, 1912, at the hour the solemn funeral rites were being observed over the bier of the Emperor Meiji, the object of his "hara kiri" being "to follow in death the master whom I served in life," and "to startle my countrymen to loyalty to the new Emperor as we showed to his predecessor."

Arming themselves with swords, the necessary formalities were gone through. The General first stabbed himself, Countess Nogi simultaneously seeking death by her own hand.

September 13 is drawing close and thousands of pilgrims visit the unpretentious Nogi home in Akasaka to pay homage. Even to-day, for all to see, there are visible on the matting floor the stains of blood of count and Countess Nogi.
